Born of such a healthful stock his daughter allied herself with a family distinguished by the same strenuous virtues and ability. She was married in 1854 to Henry Currer Briggs, the eldest son of Henry Briggs, the founder of the Whitwood Colliery Company, and went to live with him at Outwood Hall, near Wakefield. They spent some years at Dundee, afterwards at Saltburn, and then at Harrogate. From 1879 to 1887 they lived in Leeds. Mr. Briggs was chairman of the Chapel Committee when he died in 1881, and his venerable mother never failed to take her place at our morning service as long as it was possible for her to come out. In 1887 Mrs. Briggs removed to Windermere, but she always kept her name on the chapel list as a seatholder, and was a constant visitor to Leeds.

Her life was full of activity, and through all changes of fortune and fluctuations of trade she was to her husband a wise counsellor and a strong support.

Her first interest was of course in the colliery, and in earlier days, when the number of men employed was not so great as it afterward became, she is said to have known every family, and to have taken a personal interest in their welfare. When she came to live in Leeds she took her part in the good work of the city, and was an active member of the Ladies' Council of Education, and specially concerned in the Industrial Dwellings Company for the better housing of the poor.

But her great work was the promotion of the Ladies' Association for the Care and Protection of Friendless Girls, in the foundation of which she was the prime mover, and in which she took the keenest interest to the very last. She knew every girl who passed through the homes of the Society from 1884, the year in which the first was opened, to the end, and she interested herself in them after they had gone out into service or been married. When she was at Windermere, she founded, and for the last four years supported entirely at her own expense, a Holiday and Convalescent Home for the Girls, and while it was open, from April to October, she had them up every Sunday to her house, to read and talk with them. Her thoughts were with them when she lay dying, and her last act, when she could scarcely hold a pen, was to sign a cheque, in order that her death might not embarrass the Home of which she was the manager.

Her health had been failing for the last six years and an attack of angina pectoris, on June 18, brought about the end in a few days. She died at her residence, Ghyll Head, Windermere, on Sunday the 23rd, having nearly completed her 75th year.

One who knew her well, and who has had a large experience of the world, truly sums up her character and her work in the words:—"She was a good, sweet woman, whose life and work have been a blessing, and a constant bestowal of sweetness on all with whom she came in touch."

We are the poorer for her loss, the richer for another beautiful life which we may claim for Mill Hill Chapel. C. H.

MR. FERDINAND HEILBORN.

THE Unitarian community in Bradford has lost one of its most respected members, by the death of Mr. Ferdinand Heilborn, which occurred with tragic suddenness on June 29, on board the steamer crossing from Folkestone to Boulogne, when he was on his way to the Continent. He was a native of Berlin, and was in his seventy-third year. For over forty years he was head of the firm of Ferdinand Heilborn & Co., woollen merchants, of Bradford. He was one of the best-known men in Bradford, and was esteemed as a man of high character and for his integrity of purpose. He was a generous helper of the city's charities and was a vice-president of the Royal Infirmary, and an active member of the Board of management of that institution. He was also a liberal supporter of Chapel-lane Chapel, and, amongst other institutions, took an interest in the boys' Grammar School and the Philosophical Society. Since his retirement from business Mr. Heilborn had spent much of his time on the Continent. He leaves a widow, two sons—Captain E. G. Heilborn and Dr. Heilborn—both of Bradford, and a daughter, who is married to Dr. Liebert. His remains were interred at Undercliffe Cemetery on July 4, when the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones officiated and gave a short address at the graveside. On Sunday morning, July 7, a memorial service was held at Chapel-lane. At the close of his sermon on "A Good Name," based on Ecclesiasticus xli. 12, 13, Mr. Ceredig Jones said:

"All the time I have been speaking to you, I feel that you have had in your mind one who has left behind him a good name wherever he had any dealings with his fellow men. In this city, and in other lands, Mr. Heilborn's name stands for all that is honourable and just between man and man, and for all that is noble and beautiful in private life. All who stood, with bowed heads, around his grave last Wednesday, had genuine sorrow written on their faces, because they felt in their hearts that they had lost a true friend. He came to Yorkshire forty-nine years ago, a very young man, exceptionally well educated and full of energy; and for over forty years he has been one of the most active and useful citizens of Bradford. His connection with this church dates from the ministry of the late Mr. Pilcher; and he has ever been a consistent upholder of our faith. Of him it might be said that he was 'not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.' He combined in a remarkable degree the man of culture, the devout worshipper of God and the business man. In commercial circles he will long be remembered as one who endeavoured at all times to be just. What he felt to be just between man and man that he did. It was the greatest joy of his life to feel that he had given all men their due, and had gone through the world with clean hands and a pure childlike heart. His presence in this great community has been an uplifting influence all round. There are finer ideals of commercial integrity amongst us because he has lived here. Now that he has gone from his work to his reward all who knew him will think of him as one who put his conscience into all his transactions—who carried out the great poet's advice: 'Be just and fear not.'"

Mr. Jones then spoke of Mr. Heilborn's tenderness of nature, and his many charities, his warm sympathies as a friend, and his unaffected religiousness of nature; and finally of the suddenness of his end: "Painlessly and beautifully he passed from life to life. It was just such a death as he himself would desire. As we think, in future years, of the example which he has set before us, we shall always find ourselves saying with grateful love: 'A good name endureth for ever.'"

MARY CHATTAWAY.

THE Free Christian Church, Leicester, has lost by death one of its oldest members in the person of Mary Chattaway, widow of the late Thomas Chattaway. Her end came on the 4th inst., at the full age of 88 years. Practically from the foundation of the church in 1866 until her death she was a subscribing member, and until the last few years took a keen interest in its welfare. She had a delightful and interesting personality, always alert, full of hope for the success of our cause, and ever ready to assist to the utmost of her power. She was laid to rest on the 6th inst., the interment being preceded by a service in the Narborough-road Church, at which many friends were present to mark their last tribute of respect. The service was conducted by the Rev. G. von Petzold, who, after the singing of the hymn "Hark! hark, my soul!" said—"It has pleased Almighty God to take our beloved friend unto her rest. She has run the race of life nobly, she has finished her course, she has been faithful unto death, and God has given her the crown of life. We, who are assembled here to say our last farewell, rejoice to think that she has lived her strenuous and beautiful life in our very midst; we rejoice to think that she was one of us in every sense of the word. We love to remember how unstintingly she gave us of her devotions, her service, when we first established our fellowship of faith in this ancient town. When we had many a hard struggle and friends were few and far between, she encouraged us by her unflagging zeal and unbounded enthusiasm. She gloried in her Unitarian faith, she had reached it as a young girl through deep thinking and earnest study. She was a lover of books at all times, a strenuous and untiring teacher, and the memory of many a bright hour of study spent in her company still fondly lingers with some of us. She never forgot those early teachers and preachers who helped to build up the church in which she had found the joy and strength of her life."

MR. PETER BIBBY.

THROUGH the death of Mr. Peter Bibby the congregation of Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church, Burnley, has suffered another severe loss. Mr. Bibby was the eldest son of the late Mr. Thomas Bibby, of Burnley, the founder of Bibby & Baron, Ltd., the well-known firm of paper and paper-bag manufacturers, now of Bury. He was brother of Alderman Bibby, whose death it was our painful duty to record only four months ago. He died suddenly on June 28, whilst on a visit to his son, Mr. J. T. Bibby, at Muswell Hill, being 78 years of age. Mr. Bibby will be much missed by his church. He was one of the faithful band of Padiham people who began the Unitarian movement in Burnley, and he never wavered in his allegiance to it, being for many years a member of the church committee, and at the time of his death was the father of the congregation. Born in Padiham, and brought up in connection with Nazareth Unitarian Chapel and Sunday-school, he was at a very early age enrolled as a teacher, a work which he did not relinquish until a very few years ago, when advancing years and increasing infirmity compelled his retirement. He had then, however, made the unique record of 60 years' service as a Sunday-school teacher. He was one of those who were awarded gold medals for long service in the Sunday-school, given by Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, as president of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association. Mr. Bibby prized this decoration highly, and was a familiar figure at many a local and district Sunday-school gathering, wearing the emblem of his long and faithful services. Mr. Bibby never wholly severed his connection with the Padiham Church. He was at the time of his death president of the Padiham Unitarian Sick and Burial Society, a position he had held for more than a dozen years. Mr. Bibby's remains were removed to Burnley on July 2, resting overnight in the church he had loved so well. Prior to the funeral, which took place on the following day, a very impressive service was conducted in the church by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, attended by a large number of relatives and friends. The interment took place at the Padiham Cemetery. Mr. Bibby was one of those men who fill no great place in the world, but whose quiet, persistent, self-sacrificing labours for God and humanity are the very lifeblood of the churches. If all Unitarians were as faithful, as consistent, as devoted, as hopeful as Peter Bibby, it would be well with our churches. J. S. M.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

On the east coast of England, just where Norfolk and Suffolk join, is a little place called Gorleston. The coast is very dangerous, not because it is high or rocky, but because great banks of sand lie off in the sea, over which the water flows, and on to which ships may easily be driven and wrecked. There are the Scroby Sands; the Barber Sands; the North Sand; the Cross Ridge Sand; the Corton Sands. There is now a lifeboat at Gorleston, and no doubt you have often heard what splendid work lifeboat men do: how they are always ready, when a call comes, to leave their homes and families, and when we are all warm and snug in our beds to face the roaring waves, and taking their lives in their hands to launch forth for gallant rescues of poor shipwrecked men. For this the lifeboat men are carefully drilled, and practised in getting the boat out in as few minutes as possible: and one day at Gorleston there was a "demonstration," when a sudden call for the boat was made, to show a number of spectators how quickly and well the men could prepare it, launch it, and put out to sea.

The next Sunday was "Lifeboat Sunday," when a collection was made for the lifeboat; and the parish church of Gorleston was packed from end to end, and 25 sturdy lifeboat men walked in and took their seats, dressed in their familiar blue guernseys and blue coats; and one of them, a veteran coxswain, wearing the silver medal awarded to him for brave and heroic lifeboat work forty-eight years ago. They sang the hymn "Eternal Father, strong to save," and then in the course of his sermon the preacher said:—

"There is something special about your coming here to-day. I am reminded of this by the presence in Church of my friends the lifeboat men. You have hearts, and these hearts beat more quickly when you think of God's mercies during the past years. You wish publicly to recognise that, after all is said and done, 'the Lord is a refuge from one generation to another.' You have felt the truth of this out on the lonely sea and in the midst of the blinding storm. If this old church could speak, what a lot it could tell us of, since the time it has stood sentinel, keeping watch with this old grey tower looking over the sea, like a watchful mother keeping her lads in view as they sail away to their work. The old tower is the first to greet them as they come back into port. The old tower watched the Gorleston lads when they went away to fight England's battle against the Spanish Armada. She has witnessed quite as many events that are not in English history, but nevertheless are worthy to be put side by side with the best when the roll-call of heroic deeds is heard. What hours of anxiety, what feats of valour, are recorded by the mere mention of the lifeboat service here in Gorleston by the volunteer lifeboat. Some of you here saw some of the work last Tuesday at the demonstration. I am glad that the visitors saw how promptly you responded to the call of duty. Seven minutes after the warning gun was fired the boat 'Elizabeth Simpson' was in the water. A few more minutes and she was out of the harbour, like a faithful hound eager to carry out her master's bidding. It was only a pleasure cruise. In the afternoon you were out again and saved a party of people in a boat. If you had not been as prompt as you always are there would have been some sorrowing families in England this morning. I would like to remind visitors that the work is not always so easy as it was last Tuesday. I have seen the lifeboat go out just as promptly, just as cheerily, when there have been no admiring crowds upon the pier to applaud, no one to raise a cheer for the lifeboat, but just a 'Fare ye well' from a comrade, just a fervent 'God help you' from the wife, from her very heart, and then the blackness of night has taken you into its embrace. We ashore have waited and listened, and some of us have prayed. That is the time when the lifeboat is doing real hard service, when most people are safely in their beds. Once, one of our boatmen, looking through the blinding sleet, saw a tongue of flame shoot up from the direction of Corton Sands. There was no lifeboat then, but, thank God, there have always been lifeboatmen here in Gorleston. A terrible sea was running, but the Gorleston men never hesitated. They jumped into a yawl called the 'Breeze.' Amid hail and snow all through the night they thrashed about the border of these sands, seeking hither and thither for the wreck. There was no further signal, and they returned to the shore and waited for day-break. When morning came they discerned a black object out there on the Corton Sands, and went out again. It was a foretop masthead, ten feet of it sticking out of the water, all that was left of a fine ship. To that mast nine men were clinging. Now began a grim fight, and I know of no nobler feat than the daring which this emergency called forth. A strong eddy of water swirled around the sunken ship. Angry seas snapped and snarled as the mast swung from one side to the other. One yard only remained on it, and that acted like a battering ram, dipping first on one side and then on the other, threatening the yawl every moment with destruction. With calm courage and deliberate, superb seamanship, eight men were got off; and then they were told there was a ninth, too frost-bitten to help himself. These brave lads were determined to have that man; there was no suggestion of leaving him. Charles Goodwin Salmon—he is here in this church this morning—and George Fleming, whom we laid to rest a few days ago, got a line attached to the swinging spar, and boldly swung themselves into the cross-trees, where they found a poor fellow, frost-bitten, and well-nigh unconscious with the cruel cold. It would be difficult to describe the position of these three men, perilous in the extreme as it was. Huge waves made savage rushes at them. The mast kept swinging heavily as though it would fling them into the hungry jaws of the sea. But what is it brave hearts cannot do and will not dare? With dogged pluck they stuck to it till they got their man away in safety. The poor fellow died before he reached Gorleston, and his body lies in this churchyard. One by one these brave men who fought the sea to rescue him, have been carried past his last resting-place as they passed to their own. They have gone where there shall be no more sea and where brave spirits are at rest."

After this a lifeboat was provided for Gorleston. It was named the "Rescuer." "One night in December, just about dusk, distress signals were seen on the Scroby Sands, and away went the lifeboat to her work. It turned out to be the wreck of a full-rigged ship, with a crew of twenty-five. They were got into the lifeboat and were almost in safety in the harbour when they were run down by a lugger, and nineteen of the rescued men, with six of the boatmen, drowned. Heartbreaking work, after all their efforts, to lose just on the winning post. But God's ways are not our ways. All these things will be explained when the curtain goes up on another world.

"After the 'Rescuer,' there was another lifeboat, the 'Refuge,' which in seven years saved 125 lives; but she capsized, and once more the sea took heavy toll of the men of Gorleston. How often in the history of the lifeboat have brave husbands and fathers been flung back, bleeding and broken, on the sands at the feet of their wives and families! These are but the bare facts. You know your deeds are noted in heaven, and the Judge of all the earth will reward them when you meet your heavenly Coxswain face to face. Manliness, courage, seamanship, strong hands, and brave hearts are here, eager and ready to spring to duty at whatever hour of the night the call comes to 'Man the lifeboat!'"

A SONG OF SOCIAL REFORM.

Paul, of Jesus.—"Who loved me and gave himself up for me."

Ruskin.—"Truly, the man who does not know when to die; does not know how to live."

Across the beauteous fields of earth

The eager nations call,

"O come and help to win the worth
And joy of life for all."

But when the nations greatly live,

Then every man will try

Himself in worthiest wise to give,
And learn to die.

The blessed peace of brotherhood

Shall hold us in its sway.

The sun of righteousness shall greet

The children of the morning.

True to home and friendship all,

And falsehood ever scorning,

We'll do in faith and honesty
The labour of the day.

March on—march on!

The eager nations call

To win the worth and joy

Of life—for all.

We trust the Holy Power of Truth

To give the people sight,

To guard the generous heart of youth,

And guide our steps aright.

We tread the everlasting way

The brave and true have gone.

In the darkness or the day

March on—march on!

FOR BETTER SOCIAL SERVICE.

THE proposal to hold a summer meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service at Oxford has been fully justified by the experience of this week's meetings at Manchester College, the first days of which are here reported. The attendance has not been large, but quite sufficient for a happy sense of comradeship, and the stimulus of frank discussion and the mutual exchange of experiences, in private converse even more than in set debate among fellow-workers gathered from different parts of the country; sufficient also to show what such a gathering may mean to the fellowship of our churches as a whole. One instance of the earnest purposes manifested in the Union we should like to mention for the emulation of others at future meetings, and that was furnished by a large women's class in an East Lancashire congregation, who subscribed to send one of their number to represent them at Oxford both for her own and their benefit, to bring back to them a report of the week's proceedings. If it had not been for the great enterprise which is taking so many of our people across the Atlantic this summer, there would doubtless have been a good many more of both ministers and members of congregations at these meetings, but a gathering of sixty or more was certainly encouraging for a first attempt on the part of the Union.

The report will speak for itself as to the great interest of the lectures, both in the consideration of fundamental principles, and in the grappling with practical questions of the greatest moral urgency, as in Mr. WICKSTEED's lecture on Gambling and those on Underpaid Labour and the Drink Traffic.

One memory will always be associated with this first summer meeting of the Union, and the work of all the members in the coming days must be touched with a new consecration, because of what they have been permitted to know of KIRKMAN GRAY, the pure spirit, the deep sympathies of his earnest life.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

SUMMER SESSION AT OXFORD.

THE first summer session of the Union has been held during the present week at Manchester College, Oxford, attended altogether by more than sixty members and friends, including residents in Oxford. The happy experience of the summer meetings of Sunday-school teachers in the hospitality of the College has been repeated in this case also, and all the arrangements were most admirably made by Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, who acted as local secretary. One feature of special interest was an exhibition in the library of books and pamphlets dealing with many branches of social effort and reform, arranged under the various headings of Education, The Care and Protection of Children, Temperance, Social Purity, Women's Work, Sweating, Thrift, Peace, Vivisection, Humanitarian Work generally, Socialism, Local Government, Housing, Taxation of Land Values, and Industrial Legislation.

Among those present during the week, in addition to the Principal of Manchester College, the President of the Union (Rev. P. H. Wicksteed), and Miss M. C. Gittins, the Secretary, and Mr. J. C. Ballantyne the local Secretary, were the Revs. W. J. Jupp, F. Haydn Williams, E. A. Voysey, J. H. Wicksteed, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, F. H. Vaughan, A. H. Thomas, and V. D. Davis, Mr. Richard Robinson (Treasurer), Mr. and Mrs. Harrop White, Mrs. Wicksteed, Mrs. Carpenter, Miss H. M. Johnson, Miss Catherine Sharpe, Miss Amy Herford, Miss Alice Lucas, Miss Lucy Brooks, Miss C. Bishop, Miss E. Cooke, Miss I. J. Ogden, Miss Phillips, Mr. S. Haldar, Mr. S. E. Eliot, Mr. F. G. Stevens and several Ruskin College men.

RECEPTION BY THE PRINCIPAL.

The Session opened on Monday afternoon, when Dr. CARPENTER, Principal of the College, received the members in the Library, and, after tea had been served, gave a brief address of welcome. He reminded them that the Union for Social Service had been formed as the outcome of a meeting held in the College in connection with the National Conference, and it gave him great pleasure to welcome them there to the first Summer Session. He referred with much feeling to their late secretary, Mr. Kirkman Gray, and then spoke of the increasing prominence which organised social study had assumed during the last fifty years, and the part the churches were taking in that study. They must strive to discover the true principles of social service, and clearly state them. It was no easy task. The Church had to give men the patience and the moral earnestness to carry out the necessary research and collection of facts, in order that a new Social Ideal might be formed.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, President of the Union, in response, said that the members were grateful to Dr. Carpenter for his willingness to receive them at the College, and doubly so for his words of welcome. The new Economics, he said, must rest on the broader, more complex, and more delicately articulated structure of the new psychology. His friend Mr. Graham Wallas was filled with the same conviction as to a renovated science of politics. The practical sciences of Economics and Politics alike would be inspired now and then by the theoretical science of psychology. This thought connected itself with what Dr. Carpenter has said as to the appropriateness of linking the study of social questions with our church organisations. All economic and political science at the bottom was a study of the machinery by which we are to get what we want, of means to our ends. What, then, do men want? If their ends are inglorious or mutually conflicting, no greatness or joy can come out of improved means of realising them. If our churches stand for anything, they stand for the expression and the fostering of high aims, a true sense of values, a caring for things that are worthy of care; and only if we care for the right things can the study of methods and tools be fruitful and worthy.

MISS M. C. GITTINS, hon. secretary of the Union, also acknowledged the welcome, and said that the work of the Union must be to educate the public mind to want the best and highest things.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

In the evening there was a religious service in the Chapel, conducted by Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, with an address by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham. The opening hymn was Samuel Longfellow's "O Life, that maketh all things new," and the closing hymn "Come, labour on."

Mr. Thomas's address was on the text 2 Samuel x. 12: "Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, for the cities of our God: and the Lord do that which seemeth him good."

To be fellow-workers with God, he said, in the redemption of the world, that is the sublimest privilege of man. To take up the inheritance of our humanity with buoyancy and cheer, that is our divine trust. Courage! is the word of life to us as we look to the future that may contain traitors or allies, ambuscades or re-enforcements.

"Say not the struggle nought availeth,
The labour and the wounds are vain,
The enemy faints not nor faileth,
And as things have been they remain."

If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars;
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers,
And but for you possess the field."

Speaking further of that other heartening word "Play the men," he referred to R. L. Stevenson as a great instance of conquest over self, who fought against the odds of ill-health and the fretfulness of a frail body and turned his very weakness into strength; and he quoted two prayers of his: "Bless to us our extraordinary mercies; if the day come when these must be taken, brace us to play the man under affliction . . . and when the day returns, return to us, our sun and comforter, and call us up with morning faces and with morning hearts—eager to labour, eager to be happy, if happiness shall be our portion—and, if the day be marked for sorrow, strong to endure it." And again: "The day returns and brings us the paltry round of irritating concerns and duties. Help us to play the man, help us to perform them with laughter and kind faces; let cheerfulness abound with industry. Give us to go blithely on our business all this day; bring us to our resting-beds weary and content and undishonoured, and grant us in the end the gift of sleep."

Those, said the preacher, are the deep desires and resolves of a happy warrior. They repeat for us the words "Be of good courage, and let us play the men."

But then the text went further, to insist on the social aspect of real manliness. It was to be "for our people, for the cities of our God." It must look out on the objective world of secular institutions and temporal interests, and recognise the cause of the people as a holy cause. Christian manliness must not only breathe its prayers of private consecration, it must inspire our Acts of Parliament, build up our national and local institutions; it must legislate, administer, judge, educate, reform, destroy, and fulfil—in a word, it must be political.

It would be a great day for England and for Humanity, said the preacher, if Englishmen felt that politics was the social side of their religion, and that to touch their politics was to touch the most holy altar of their faith. Then, indeed, so powerful a spirit of national earnestness would be operative as would drive us all to such a keen study of social problems, to such a service of our fellow-men, to such a glorious rivalry of self-sacrifice as would work out an undreamt-of national regeneration.

Neither theological nor social and political doctrine could be made a test in our Free Churches; but just as in matters of religious faith it was of supreme importance to be free and true and fearless, and a man's doctrine, whatever it was, must be a genuinely, passionately thought-out thing, the product of intellectual seriousness, a strenuous articulated reason for the faith that was in him, so in regard to social and political doctrine, whether Individualist or Socialist, Conservative or Liberal, Free Trader or Tariff Reformer, the supreme thing was that social theories and activities, political doctrines and allegiances should be the outcome of an ardent and prophetic zeal for national righteousness, of a passionate love of the people, and an invincible social faith—of an earnest desire and prayerful yearning to see the God of our hearts rule—honoured, revered, enthroned—in the midst of men.

To make our religion in the best sense political; to make our politics in the best sense religious, that must be the effort of every British subject who aspires to be worthy of his fair and spacious inheritance.

All parties should be one in their passion for the common good. High above our political antagonisms, God sits as King, and in Him we may find our reconciliation and our unity; high above us, and yet within, in the midst of us, our Father worketh and we work. If we cannot bring all our political schemes and ambitions and lay them down at the footstool of His throne, before His Eternal scrutiny and with the expectation of His blessing, then whatever party we may belong to, our politics are worthless, if not, indeed, sordid and corrupt. But if we can bring them thus honestly and unafraid into the very Holy of Holies, then however mistaken our theories and proposals may be, at least our motives will be pure, our intentions disinterested; and though the letter of our policy may be wrong, the spirit of it will be right and sound, and a source of moral sustenance to the world.

That principle, he went on to say, applied to all forms of social service and all the subjects they were to consider during that week.

Let us not forget, he said, in conclusion, the permanent purpose of our meeting here. Better homes, cleaner lives, healthier bodies, purer minds, nobler characters, worthier aims, deeper joys, higher ideals. Be of good courage, and play the men for these! Better government, honester commerce, gladder industries, happier cities, more spacious and more beautifully planned; juster conditions of life and labour, more innocent mirth, more wholesome recreation. Play the man for our people and for the cities of our God!

And having done our best for these and similar social ends, ever vowing our utmost for the Highest, letting nothing blunt the edge of our enthusiasms—then we leave the final issue confidently and faithfully to God. The Lord do that which seemeth good to Him.

We cannot know the far-off results of our conduct. We live in too small a corner of time, and even centuries cannot tell us finally of the trend of everlastingness. The ultimate issue is left to our faith. We anticipate all the proofs and demonstrations. The best is left to our trust, and we wait wisely when we wait in confidence and patience. Into God's hands we commend our spirit and our labour. To Him we may now dedicate ourselves and whatever service it may be given us to render. Let us stipulate for no immediate victories, and be content to serve in the campaign and to take all its risks with a firm faith that for those who love all things must work together for final good.

My friends, I give you a great text. God give us joy of it.

"Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God: and the Lord do that which seemeth him good."

TUESDAY'S LECTURES.

On Tuesday morning a brief devotional service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, of Mansfield, and at ten o'clock the first lecture was given by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed.

IN MEMORIAM B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

It was very fitting that the first lecture of the session should be devoted to the memory of one who had been heart and soul in the work of the Union, and, as one of the secretaries, was occupied at the time of his death with the arrangements for the coming meetings. We published last week a beautiful memorial notice of our friend by Mr. H. B. Binns, and Mr. Wicksteed's memorial lecture largely followed the same lines. That was inevitable, he said, because even his most intimate friends found that they knew really very little of Mr. Gray's past history. He had been very reticent about the past himself, simply because the present was so intensely interesting to him, and the future. But happily he wrote after his engagement a full and beautiful letter to the lady who was about to become his wife, and they had been privileged to make use of that for their record. Mr. Wicksteed then pictured the boy's early independence of spirit and intense love of Nature, the great privilege and happiness of his early home life, and the complete confidence there was between him and his father; then, the stress of his life as a young man of business in London, and the despair which determined him to emigrate, until the influence of his father prevailed upon him to stay at home and help to teach in his school. In that quiet village life, among simple people, and with those he loved, he was brought back to knowledge of a world somewhere near to the ideal of which he dreamed, and for some time he remained a teacher. Having then told how he entered the ministry, and of his experience as a Congregational and then a Unitarian minister, Mr. Wicksteed spoke of what Mr. and Mrs. Gray did at the Bell Street Mission; how, in that sordid but busy centre, they worked with unsparing zeal to bring into it the beauty of their own life. His preaching to those people was of two kinds particularly. He preached Nature to them, that fairyland of peace, and reality, and beauty, took them back to the Mother Earth from which they all sprang, in which our roots are always growing; but then also he struggled with a kind of despair to get them to feel that their sorrows were not essential, absolutely necessary to human life, that if they once got the sense that they belonged to one another and were a class, they could do something to save themselves from that misery. He felt that they alone could save themselves; but their individual troubles were too urgent and absorbing for them to be able to realise that they were not inevitable. He worked on in despair sometimes, but always in the vision of the Eternal; all through that terrible life he carried about with him the deep sense of something more real, more abiding, which it was his business to bring right into the minds of those people. He was a strong man, but he broke down, and he never really recovered. The marks of distress had worked right into his tender soul. He felt it impossible to go on at that price, yet felt that he had given up the real thing for which he was made. Sometimes he wondered whether he ought not to have gone on and died at that work rather than try to do something else.

And finally, Mr. Wicksteed spoke of his thought of God, his vision of the Eternal, of the Divine both in Nature and in the mind of man, and the perfect harmony of truth and deep emotion. The evil in the world he keenly felt, but what he knew for himself of the power of truth and goodness and love made infidelity impossible to him. The perfect life of God he felt must be wrought out in the perfect victory of the spirit of love in mankind. His own life was a joy and inspiration to his friends, daily companionship with him was so wonderful. Blake said that when men converse together in eternity, they enter into one another's bosoms, which are universes of delight. Those who knew Kirkman Gray were able to enter into his bosom and there found a universe of delight.

RUSKIN COLLEGE.

The second morning lecture, at which the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed as president took the chair, was by Mr. Lees Smith, Vice-Principal of Ruskin College, on "Labour and Economics," followed by an account of the College by the secretary, Mr. Bertram Wilson.

Mr. LEES SMITH in his lecture showed how the growth of democratic sentiment had resulted from the economic developments of the last century, and how the labour movement had also inevitably followed upon the same developments; and then, in regard to vital problems of society, he showed the difference between the point of view of working men and that of the comfortable classes.

The old domestic system of industry, as it was called, had been driven out by the introduction of machinery, and the worst evils of sweating now attached to the survivals of the domestic system. Under the factory system the old personal relationship of employer and employed had disappeared, and the change of social structure must be followed by change of political structure. The working classes now lived a life of their own, not dominated by the upper classes. There was a distinct working-class point of view, and democracy had become inevitable. It was better that the relationship of employer and employed should be one simply of contract. If they wished to enter into personal relations they could do so, but it must be as man to man, not as master and servant. Political power had now passed into the hands of those who felt the pinch of the social problem, and they would insist that it must come to the front. The labour movement distinctly expressed the working-class point of view. As to the place of Ruskin College in Oxford, he reminded them of the common saying that the function of the University was to educate the governing classes, and added (amid laughter and applause) that that was just what Ruskin College was going to do. It was the pride of Oxford that all the main currents of the national life were represented in it. Future historians would note that the rise of democracy was reflected in Oxford by the establishment of that College.

Mr. WILSON gave a most interesting account of the College, founded in 1899. Its purpose was to be a school of public administration for working men. The teaching in the College aimed at being neither too academic nor too partisan. They had also a correspondence department with 7,000 members throughout the country, many of whom were women, and many good essays had been written by domestic servants. The average age of their students at Ruskin College was twenty-five, so that the young artisan who came to them had already been engaged in social work—a man who had seen things and felt them very deeply, and was keenly alive to the problems he had to face. He might be ambitious, but rightly so, not to rise out of his class, but to raise his class. A year at the College cost £52, and that meant a great deal when a man came by taking his own hard-earned savings; but the majority came through their trade organisations. The Amalgamated Engineers had sent seven students. They had 105,000 members, who paid 3d. a year for that purpose. The railway servants had that year sent four, the weavers three. Two had been sent by the West Riding County Council—a first application of new powers under the Act of 1902. Other students were sent by private donors, and they had now fifty in residence. It was an education in citizenship they got. They were helped to think out things for themselves, so that afterwards they would be able to stand alone. All the household work of the college, except the cooking, the men did themselves. In their life together they learnt the wisdom of give and take. When they left the College, not one of them had failed to return to his trade, and many of them were active as Guardians, or District or Town Councilors, and even in Parliament. At present the College was in seven houses. They had the site, and hoped to get a building for a hundred students. They got now much sympathy and help from the University. As to their students, they helped them to realise not only their rights, but their duties, to realise what is meant by good and ennobling citizenship.

Mr. Wicksteed expressed the gratitude of the members for the two addresses, and his own pleasure in the friendly intercourse he had enjoyed with Ruskin College, where he had frequently lectured. Both Mr. Lees Smith and Mr. Wilson said how much they valued Mr. Wicksteed's help.

THE ABSOLUTE FOLLY AND INIQUITY OF GAMBLING.

The afternoon on each day of the session was left free from lectures, and on Tuesday a good many of the members joined in a boating party up the river to Watereaton.

In the evening there was an audience of seventy, if not more, when the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed lectured on "Gambling, and its Relation to Speculation, Investment, and Enterprise."

The idea that you can make money in gambling without cheating, he said, was an absolute delusion from beginning to end. He gave a careful demonstration of the two kinds of system in gambling, and showed the utter fallacy of the doctrine of the balance of chances. It was a fatal delusion, which led numberless people to ruin, that if you gamble enough you are sure to win. At the table, and with the book-maker, and in the speculative dealing in shares, he showed how it was the constant dribbling of the commissions which spelt ruin for those who engaged in such practices. Many people quite innocently began to watch the market and speculate in shares, in the hope of increasing their income, not realising that it was simply a form of gambling. In such transactions the people who always gained were the brokers. Those things he clearly distinguished from methods of insurance, which was socially beneficial. Every form of gambling was socially pernicious. It was a vice which got a terrible hold upon people, young and old, men and women. Just as a drunkard in time lost all pleasure in being drunk, but was in utter misery unless he could get the assuagement of drink, so the habitual gambler lost all pleasure in the wholesome interests of life, but all pleasure also in his gambling, and yet was restless and miserable without it.

At the close Mr. Wicksteed was strongly urged to put the substance of this lecture into an available form for the public, and Mr. J. C. Ballantyne spoke with quiet force and earnestness of the greatness of the evil, as he had seen it among young men, and the necessity for putting healthy interests and occupations in its place.

Replying to further remarks in discussion, Mr. Wicksteed said that when betting was defended on the ground that a man ought to be ready to back his convictions, he always quoted the lines from Hudibras: "Quoth she, I have heard from wise old stagers

That fools for arguments use wagers." He also quoted an opinion which one of the Ruskin College men had once expressed to him, with regard to the leaders of the working men in Parliament—that many of them were sincerely religious men, most of them were teetotalers, and not one of them was a gambler. No working man who gambled ever gained the confidence of his fellows so as to become a trusted leader.

WEDNESDAY'S LECTURES.

The devotional service on Wednesday morning was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and the first lecture in place of what was to have been Mr. Gray's second lecture, was given by Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS, who very kindly came down to fill the vacant place.

OPINION IN POLITICS.

"Opinion in Politics" was his subject, and he showed with great force how much more there is than the rational judgment of interests that goes to the formation of popular opinion. In particular he showed from unfortunate recent experience of elections in this country how advertisement, when systematic enough, can create a quite groundless public opinion. It had been proved in the advertising of various kinds of food, and now the art had been taken over ready made by the politician. The poster without pictures was now little good, the caricature was the thing that moved people most. Not reasoning, but appeal to emotions, proved the effective thing. Those who were ready to spend money on an election need no longer do it by direct bribery, a clever advertising campaign would do just as well. This modern experience had led some very thoughtful men, e.g., Mr. H. G. Wells, to the conclusion which Plato reached by a study of the Athenian democracy, that the mass of the people could not be trusted with powers of government, but absolute power must be given to a few trained wise men. But the lecturer did not believe that salvation could come on those lines. The affairs of great nations could not be managed without the consent of the people. As soon as power was thrown into the hands of the small trained bureaucracy they would have to manage the people by the methods of the demagogue, as, indeed, it was with the monarchy. There was no way yet invented short of a Government depending on the vote, by which you could secure that the interests of a poor majority should be considered as on a par with that of the select minority. He felt that at the present time there was grave cause for anxiety, and they did not expect to find a perfect way of doing things. They must, however, make more serious the business of voting at an election. The people must be led to feel the same seriousness about it, in the desire to reach a just conclusion, as there already was in a jury; and at election time there might be a restriction of the worst kind of appeal to ignorant passion. Perhaps one of the main purposes in education in the future might be to protect children against the dangers of advertisement. He referred to Aristotle's phrase as to intellectual virtue, the virtuous conduct of the mind, as needing to be much more definitely realised, if the democracy was to be managed with any reasonable chance of success. Perhaps through religious change the great hope might come. There must be passionate submission to fact, and devotion to truth, to scientific truth, as they saw it in the Japanese, which made them now the strongest and, perhaps, the most hopeful people of the world. Is it possible, he asked in conclusion, that we may develop out of our religion or no religion that submission of the whole man, feeling as well as thinking, to the toil of reason, the slow, close submission and application to the fact, by which alone, in Bacon's words, we can minister to and interpret nature?

THE CENTRAL INDUSTRIAL PROBLEM.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED gave the second lecture on "The Central Industrial Problem." In the course of it he said his ideal was that society should be organised in the interests of the unprivileged many. If there were privileged persons, they must find their justification not in their own beautiful existence, but in the greater beauty they could add to the unprivileged by their privileged existence. And as an example of what he meant, he told of a group of mechanics in the North who studied natural science together, and subscribed to give one of their number a holiday for a week or more every year, with expenses paid, that he might go into the country and bring back specimens; and they did not each go in turn, but sent always the best man for the work. Each one felt that his small subscription had done better for himself and the rest than if he had taken it to use for his own purposes. So when the members of a great Trade Society subscribed 3d. a year that some of their number might have the privilege of going up to Ruskin College, this same principle was exemplified. In that sense he was a Socialist. But if they meant by a Socialist one who held the creed that social regeneration was to be brought about by putting the community into the possession of the instruments of production, he saw no magic in that, and in that sense he was no Socialist.

As to the central industrial problem, it lay in the fact that the more completely a function was performed, which it was a man's business to perform, the weaker his hold on society, and his power of getting the things done which he wanted done.

The progress of a society like ours would not be even all along the line. Every revolution in detail in the industrial world, e.g., the invention of a type-setting machine, or a change of fashion, or the opening up of a great new country, brought an uneven strain to bear on the machinery of production. Things would adjust themselves, it was said. But meanwhile, how about the people who were suffering, and had their own life to live? The Trade Societies showed them the right way in their own practice, they provided for those out of work, yet did not do so well for them as if they were in work. Their teaching, however, was not so sound, when they said it was the duty of the State to find work for all the unemployed, and at the standard wage. The point of attack should be not to accept any scheme which meant stopping the general progress, or cutting at the root of personal forces and stimuli. They showed the way of providing by a great national insurance that the diffused benefit of all inventions should be accompanied by a diffusion of the loss and pressure; that the collective society which enjoyed the benefit should also bear the subtraction of that loss, but should do it in such a way that the individual forces driving every man to seek a place in which he is worth something to someone else should be left to produce their full social effect.

Mr. Wicksteed's further lecture on Thursday was on "The Relation of Collective Enterprise to the Theories of Individualism and Socialism."

TOWN DEVELOPMENT.

In the afternoon, when the thunderstorm allowed, a pilgrimage of colleges was made, and then by invitation a large party repaired to Ruskin College, where they were most hospitably entertained to tea by the members, and some of the ladies afterwards washed up. It was a visit greatly enjoyed.

In the evening Mr. RAYMOND UNWIN, the architect to Garden City, gave a lecture on "Town Development," which was followed by a very interesting discussion. Plans of Garden City, of the Ealing Tenants, and of the Hampstead Garden Suburb were shown, and also a plan of the City of Cologne, as an example of the admirable results of the German powers of municipal control in the laying out of new quarters in a growing city. It was essential, the lecturer said, that the same powers should be given to English municipalities, and when they were building, the artist no less than the sanitary and other authorities, ought to be consulted. Till such powers were gained, much might be done by developing the communal sense, and showing people how they could get more beautiful houses grouped together by common agreement, and the sharing in open spaces. For beautiful houses they had fine models in the old English domestic architecture.

The further proceedings we must report next week.

I think that, in life, not to be cheerful is to blaspheme against God.—W. Mountford.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL SITUATION IN FRANCE.

I.—THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

A YEAR and a half have already passed since the separation between the State and the Churches was effected. We may now recognise that this great reform, which for so long a time seemed a scarecrow to most of us in France, has been generally accepted by the people without serious reluctance. There are, indeed, a great many local difficulties, especially about properties, but nowhere is there a movement tending to re-establish the union between the State and the Churches. These difficulties proceed chiefly from the fact that the Catholic Church did not agree to the Bill as it was voted by Parliament, and thus did not use the means which had been provided for the transference of the properties. But while the Pope condemned the law, and the French bishops, obedient to the Pope (although the majority of them thought it would have been better to comply with its regulations), refused to organise legal associations for worship (associations cultuelles), it seems that their opposition is directed rather against the principle of separation than against the fact. If a political reaction were to arise in France, I feel sure that the Roman Church would not try to restore the Concordat, but would prefer the present independence and endeavour to obtain in its behalf milder stipulations, or even privileges, rather than to forge a new, even golden collar of submission to the State.

The situation, indeed, is very peculiar. The Roman Catholics—except in a very small number of parishes, where the orders of the Pope were not obeyed—have no legal organisation at all. But worship is going on as formerly. Legally, the church building—except in special cases—belongs to the commune or to the State; but it is left by the owners for use to the Roman Catholic people without any rent, because the bishops refuse to pay anything, and the civil power will not assume the responsibility of suspending the traditional worship, and bereaving the Catholics of their cult. With the parsonages, it is different; they cannot be occupied by the priest or even the bishop without paying a rent. So every day Mass is celebrated, and all religious services go on as before. The only difference is that the priest is no more paid by the State. But you must remember that in the Roman Catholic Church people have always been accustomed to pay for religious ceremonies; even before the separation, the largest part of the Church's income was provided by the faithful. As a matter of fact, there is now only one more contribution, for the salary of the priest, and in many places this contribution is borne only by the rich families.

So the people do not feel a great difference between the present and the previous situation. The difference is much more apparent to the clergy, who are now wholly dependent on ecclesiastical authority, the priest on the bishop and the bishop on the Pope. The higher ranks of the ecclesiastical hierarchy cannot but appreciate so complete a subordination of the clergy. They have thus escaped the danger, which they feared so much, of democratic associations for worship, whose members would have had to pass a vote every year to approve or refuse the budget of the parish. A later future will teach us whether the lower clergy, when better informed of their real power, will not appeal to that same democracy which the Pope has kept at a distance to secure their rights, and introduce into the Roman Church the new spirit, which some of its noblest members now diffuse in their papers, periodicals, books, or pamphlets, but which the Church disavows. Two or three bishops, perhaps, would be sufficient to usher in such a reform. The excess of authority would then provide its own remedy. I do not see any other way by which the new Catholicism, of which our friend Paul Sabatier is so fond, can enter into the old Church; for I am too old a historian of ecclesiastical matters to share his illusions about a reform of the Church proceeding from its head.

Thus, in the present state, the Roman Catholic Church in France has lost by the separation a good deal of money and a large amount of property, which the Church claims to be hers, and which the State maintains belongs to it; but in religious and spiritual matters the Roman Church has never been so free as now in France, at least in its interior life. The higher clergy, indeed, have lost their pre-eminent place in official solemnities, and in an ever-increasing number of towns acts of worship are forbidden in the streets: for instance, the processions; in the courts and in the public schools the crucifixes have been removed, or, as the Catholics say, God has been driven out. All those restrictions of public honour and official recognition of the dignity of the Church sting churchmen to the quick; but the great majority of the people do not seem to have been shocked by these consequences of the separation. The only thing the people care for is to be free to attend Mass, to be baptized, married, and buried by the Church. M. Briand, the high-gifted minister who has charge of the application of the Law of Separation, was wise enough to understand this; by his moderate policy he avoids hurting the habits of the populace, and so secures the application of this essential reform.

UNITARIANISM OUT WEST.

THE festival of the American Unitarian Association in the Tremont Temple at Boston, which concludes the anniversary meetings in Whit-week, is always marked by a number of good speeches. They often remind us of the close kinship which unites us with our brethren across the Atlantic, and also serve to bring home to us both the similarity and the differences of our common work, while we realise the greatness of the opportunity in America.

The speech which follows here (as reported in the Christian Register of June 6) was made at this year's festival by the Rev. W. M. Backus, of Chicago, secretary of the Western Conference. After a reference to the Rev. A. S. Crapsey, who was to have spoken, but was kept away by illness, Mr. Backus said:—

You have asked me to speak, because I represent officially the Unitarian part of that great youthful giant that is bustling and beating and finding his own way in the West.

Mr. Ham's report that he made Wednesday was a very familiar one to me. It spoke of isolation, it spoke of great opportunity, it spoke of boundless prosperity. We hear such reports continually in the West; and when I travel over the vast territory which I have to cover, I realise more and more what it is, the opportunity that we have there.

At the Western Conference one of our very successful ministers was speaking very earnestly, and in the course of his speech, he said, "One with God is a majority"; and then he hesitated a while and said, "I sometimes wish the majority were larger."

We of the West do wish that—that it were larger; and yet, nevertheless, we are making progress. Our churches are growing in numbers, and they are growing as well in strength. But I must confess—and it is a confession that I make with mixed feelings—that our success is perhaps more apparent in the pulpits of other churches than in our own.

The fact is that in the West there is great liberality, and the ministers of many churches are preaching doctrines that are as liberal—and in some instances, I think, even more so—as are preached in our own Unitarian pulpits. But, while that is true of the pulpits in the churches of the West, it is not true in the general religious work of the West. There we found that, while the pulpit is liberal, the Sunday-school is almost always teaching the things that are of orthodoxy; and, more than that, that all the activities of the church with the exception of the pulpit are propagating those things which we feel, as Unitarians, belong to the past.

There is something which encourages us in our work, and it is the fact that, if it were not for us, those who go to our churches would not go anywhere. In the West we burn a different kind of coal from what you do here; it is a soft coal, and it comes in lumps. I read a story in regard to the use of this coal that I wish to relate. A family had as a pet a shellback turtle. This turtle had the usual turtle habit of sleeping through the winter, and it chose the coal cellar as the place to sleep. During one of its long resting-spells the family engaged a new servant, and one day along in the spring, the mistress was alarmed by hearing the fall of glass and loud shrieks away in the kitchen. She went to find what had happened, and found that the turtle had awakened from its long sleep, and was crawling about the room, much to the astonishment and dismay of the girl. The mistress said to the girl: "It is nothing but our pet turtle." "A turtle is it?" said the girl. "Why, that's the stone I have been breaking the coal on all winter!"

Our church is the stone upon which the fuel that is to-day warming the heart of Christendom in the West is being broken. But, if the stone proves to be a turtle, and there are signs of life, the people there are very surprised, and they raise a great outcry. They are only willing, indeed, that the church shall be warmed by the fuel furnished, but they are not willing that the stone should have any recognition.

It is a hard, hard struggle in the West. This is a brilliant assemblage, and there is great joy here; but let your thoughts stray out to the lonely frontier, where there is some minister who has the courage of his faith, hundreds of miles from any other minister who believes as he does, standing with a little handful of people, trying to uphold the faith which is popular here in Boston. As I stand here to-night, I hope that with my words your hearts will go out to your brothers who are doing bravely and courageously these hard tasks.

THE BEGINNING OF BOSTON.

It is but little over two hundred and sixty years ago that the spot on which Boston stands was a wilderness, where Indians had their wigwams and wild animals prowled in the woods.

At the time the Pilgrim Fathers planted their colony at Plymouth, various isolated attempts had been made by sundry adventurers and traders to plant settlements further along the coast of Massachusetts Bay. Little had come, however, of these straggling outposts. One enterprise there had been, of a more ambitious kind, begun with all the pomp and circumstance of a company of aristocratic projectors, whose aim was nothing less than the establishment of a principality on the New England coast. Under the auspices of the Court and Church, the expedition, led by one Robert Gorges, set out to take possession of the vast territories allotted to them on paper, and incidentally to swallow up those insignificant little dissenting colonies in and about Plymouth.

But Gorges and his company were not of the stuff of which colonists are made; they could not stand the hardships and privations of the wilderness and weather. It was "out of sight out of mind" with their friends at home, and before long nearly all of them had straggled back to England ruined and disheartened. The two or three who did manage to hold on, helped, perhaps, by their Pilgrim neighbours, settled down on the very spot where Boston now stands.

Meanwhile, some of the Puritan party at home were coming to see that there was little chance of bringing about the reforms they wanted in England. With Laud controlling the Church and Strafford the Army, there seemed no place for religious and liberty-loving men. They determined, therefore, to try and establish a settlement in the New World, where they should be free from what they regarded as tyranny and oppression.

Though the company formed was ostensibly for trading purposes, the leaders of the movement were no mere traders or seekers after adventure, but gentlemen of high standing, merchants well born and wealthy, and their followers came from the yeoman farmers and thrifty mechanics and shopkeeper class. Among the leaders were such men as Endicott and Winthrop, Johnson (who had married the daughter of the Earl of Lincoln), and a minister, Wilson. They obtained a charter for the possession of lands in New England, and, preceded the year before by John Endicott and a number of others who planted the town of Salem, the main body of emigrants—between eight hundred and a thousand—set sail in April, 1630, to found their new state. Before they started they addressed a letter of affectionate farewell to those they left behind, and to their "dear mother church."

After a voyage of seventy-six days they anchored off Salem, where Endicott had settled down. This place, however, did not seem suitable for the needs of the larger body of colonists, and Winthrop led them further south along the coast to that spot at the mouth of the river Charles, where they planted the town of Charlestown, now part of the larger city of Boston. It was intended that this should be the capital of the new state, and here the colonists appointed Winthrop as their governor, with a court of assistants, and here was drawn up and signed the Covenant of their Church.

But before long it became evident that they still had not got to the right spot for their purpose; for one reason, there was great scarcity of water, and Winthrop cast about to find another site.

It happened then that one of the survivors of the ill-fated Church and Court expedition came to the Governor and invited him to come across the river to the tract of land opposite, where he had a cottage, and where there were excellent springs.

Of this man, whose name was Blackston, very little is known, except that he had been a clergyman and must have been a student, for it is told of him that he had laid out a farm on the slope of a hill and built a cottage to which, somehow or other, he had contrived to bring his books; and there he seems to have lived in peaceful solitude till the new colonists arrived. The Indians had called the place Shawmut, but he had re-christened it Tremontane, from the three small hills which rose from its shores.

Winthrop, finding that this spot was indeed a good one for the future town, the removal took place.

"Thither," says the old record, "they moved the government and the frame of the Governor's house, then in preparation, and people began to build their houses against the winter; and this place was called Boston." For so they re-named Tremontane, after the old town, from the regions round which, most of the leaders of the new colony had come.

The settlers had no idea that this town would grow into such a great city, or else they would not have chosen a site the natural limits of which were so contracted. This place to which they had removed was a sort of peninsular joined to the main land by a narrow strip, called even now the Neck, though the process of filling up on either side which has gradually taken place has deprived the name of any meaning. On the west and south were great salt marshes, covered with water at high tide. Beyond these the river Charles divided the peninsula from the mainland, and on the east was the sea. The needs of a growing population have dyked and filled in the salt marshes and covered them with dwellings; the tide of fashion and wealth have set that way, and now this is the most beautiful part of the city, though still going by its old original name of the "Back Bay."

The first winter was a very hard one, and the colonists suffered greatly. Food was very scarce, and even the Governor was seen giving "the last handful of meal in the barrel unto a poor man distressed by the wolf at the door."

But no privations and tribulations could stop the tide of emigration which now set in. Within the next ten years more than twenty thousand Puritan Englishmen followed Winthrop to New England. Houses began to rise rapidly on the slopes of the hills, and wharves to stretch out into the harbour.

It must be borne in mind that Winthrop and his friends were not Separatists like their forerunners who settled in Plymouth, who first fled from persecution to Holland, and then later went out to America. The Puritans who founded Boston had no quarrel with Church and State as such. They were simply men who thought that England was being led away from her old ways of freedom and Protestantism. Here in the new country there was no Church to reform, and they were free to build up a new one after their own ideals.

They did not try to copy the elaborate system of the English establishment, but proceeded to draw up their Covenant as the simplest and best beginning they could make in their new surroundings. Side by side with the Covenant went the order, as the old records have it, "To the end that the body of the commons may be preserved of honest and good men, it was ordered and agreed that no man shall be admitted to the freedom of this body politic but such as are members of some of the churches within the limits of the same."

"By this act," says Lodge, "Church and State were not only united, but actually made one. Only religious men and good men were to be freemen and voters in the new commonwealth, and religion and goodness were determined by membership of the Church. Within the pale of the Church it was a very democratic government, where everyone was equal in the sight of God and the law. But to outsiders living under the government of the company the rule was that of a religious oligarchy giving to the clergy an enormous power both in religion and politics, which made them a dominating influence in the community for more than a century to come."

About this time, too, the records tell how another important principle was adopted: "It was agreed that Brother Philemon Pormont shall be entreated to become schollmaster for the teaching and nourtering of the children among us." And shortly after a free school was opened to be maintained by public subscription. Some three years later the General Court set about the foundation of Harvard College. "And thus," continues Lodge, "the Puritans, making a narrow creed the only test of citizenship, placed it between a democratic system of government and free schools, unaware of the profound contradiction. The history of the commonwealth is the history of the development of these three principles, and the final triumph of the two which made for freedom over the one which repressed all liberty except within its own narrow bounds."

When Winthrop brought his people to the shores of Massachusetts he found a wilderness. Twenty years afterwards, when he died, he left in its place a fine thriving town, a good description of which is given in an old diary of that time:—

"The chiefe Edifice of this City-like Towne is crowded on the Sea bankes, and wharfed out with great industry and cost, the buildings beautifull and large . . . and orderly placed with comly streets, whose continual enlargement presages some sumptuous city. . . . But now behold the admirable acts of Christ: at this his peoples' landing, the hideous Thickets in this place were such that Wolfes and Beares nurst up their young . . . in those very places where the streets are full of Girles and Boyes sporting up and down. . . . Good store of Shipping is here yearly built. . . . This Town is the very mart of the Land; French Portugalls and Dutch come hither for Traffique."

The next Governor was John Endicott, and it was during his time of office that trouble began to arise between the narrow government by creed and the spirit of toleration and liberty which a democratic commonwealth and free education had naturally fostered. The Puritans had not come to Massachusetts, as Lodge says, "to obtain for everybody 'freedom to worship God,' but to get freedom to worship God in their own particular way." They maintained that they had the right to keep out of their commonwealth any people whom they thought harmful to their Church or State. This was all very well as long as the community was all of one mind; but presently there came the Baptists, and then the Quakers, and later on the Episcopalians, to try conclusions with the Puritan system of repression.

Meanwhile, the Puritan settlement had increased so fast, and become so important, that the attention of the English Government was attracted to it, and a sharp demand for the return of the Royal Charter was sent out to what, too late, was seen to have grown into an independent State.

But the people had no idea of giving up their Charter; on the contrary, they were prepared to defend its possession with their lives. And, after much parleying and some little diplomatic playing of the "waiting game" on the part of the colonists, Providence came to their aid. Parliament and the King found that the Puritans at home were likely to give them even more trouble just then. The point was waived for the time being, and the Puritan State was left to follow an independent career for another fifty years.

UNITARIAN CHURCHES IN CANADA.

DURING the first sixteen days of September, three representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, C. J. Street, and W. G. Tarrant—will be busily occupied in conducting religious services and addressing public meetings in connection with several of the Unitarian Churches in Canada. The dates of the week-day public meetings are as follows, when all three representatives will take part in the proceedings:—Toronto, Sept. 4; Hamilton, Sept. 5; London (Ontario), Sept. 6; Ottawa, Sept. 12; Montreal, Sept. 16.

Sunday services will be held on Sept. 1, 8, and 15, when one representative only will be at each of the foregoing places.

The Unitarian ministers in Canada have written in the warmest terms of appreciation of the arrangements made by the Association in sending official representatives to visit the churches. The Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association, writes that the visits will be a great help and encouragement, and that the plan is an excellent one. The Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope will visit, preach and lecture at Winnipeg, as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Rev. W. S. Barnes (Montreal), Rev. C. W. Casson (Ottawa), Rev. R. J. Hutcheon (Toronto), Rev. W. D. Smith (Hamilton), Rev. V. J. Gilpin (London, Ontario), will be glad to give ministers, delegates, and visitors from England any information or guidance in their power if they will make themselves known. It will be advisable for visitors to present their certificates of membership of the International Council when calling upon Unitarian ministers in Canada or the United States. Everyone is doubtless already provided with one of these certificates.

THE smoke nuisance, culminating in dense fogs, is one of the recognised problems of town life. It is hardly necessary to dwell on its harmful effects on the general health, its destruction of public buildings, its expensiveness in making necessary artificial light, disturbing traffic, and wasting time. The Hon. Rollo Russell put down the cost to the metropolis alone at £5,200,000 a year. Something has been done in recent years to abate the evil. But its cure can hardly be accomplished till a more complete and economical combustion of fuel is established, and the million chimneys cease to emit each its contribution of waste to the general gloom. In a pamphlet before us it is claimed that by the invention of coalite the very desirable reform is made practicable.

It states that by a patent process coal can be so treated in bulk that the smoke-producing element can be removed, leaving an easily ignitable fuel retaining all the advantages and cheerfulness in burning of ordinary coal, but emitting no smoke. Coalite is to be less expensive than coal because the by-products removed from it are many and commercially valuable. That which is now worse than wasted, sent into the atmosphere to poison the air and obscure the sun, is to be collected and used, and houses and towns are to be cleaner and healthier. Coalite has been tested and found satisfactory by experts appointed by the Coal Smoke Abatement Society, which reports that "as it is absolutely smokeless, it considers it an efficient remedy for the smoke nuisance." A company, "Coalite, Ltd.," has been formed to work the patent process. If the results are as promised by the pamphlet before us, no one, surely, will begrudge a moderate profit to the inventor, Mr. Thomas Parker, of Wolverhampton, and those associated with him.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, S.E., earnestly appeals for funds to convey the children of the Deptford Sunday-school for a day's trip from the slums to the country. Donations may be forwarded to above address, or to the hon. secretary, Mr. H. J. Jones, 78, Malpas-road, Brockley, S.E.

Accrington.—The Oxford-street Unitarian Free Church has lost one of its oldest members through the death of Mrs. Hannah Greenhalgh, which took place on the 4th inst., in her eighty-second year. Her husband, Frederick Greenhalgh, who pre-deceased her about thirty-nine years, was one of the original founders of the congregation, and an active worker when the services were held in the Town Hall and elsewhere before the present church was built. After her husband's death Mrs. Greenhalgh started a business of her own, and was very successful. She brought up two of her sons to the medical profession, one of whom is Dr. Handel Greenhalgh, of Bury, who is also an Alderman of Bury Town Council, and Dr. Arthur Greenhalgh, medical officer of health for Accrington, who is a member and trustee of the Oxford-street Church. Three other sons also live in Accrington, and are members of the Oxford-street Church. The interment took place at the Accrington Cemetery on Monday, the 8th, the Rev. J. Islan Jones officiating.

Ainsworth.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, July 7, by the Rev. A. C. Fox, of Manchester. There were large congregations. The collections amounted to £36 11s. 9d.

Bootle.—The annual flower and anniversary services were held on Sunday, July 7, in the Free Church, and there were good congregations. In the morning the Rev. J. Morley Mills preached from the text, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." In the afternoon the children's flower service was conducted by Mr. T. Hughes, of Hope-street Church, and in the evening the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton, preached a most helpful sermon on "The Sunday-school."

Bridgend.—On Sunday evening July 7, the Sunday-school choir rendered the "Flower Service of Praise and Prayer," published at Essex Hall. The Rev. D. G. Rees preached an appropriate sermon, and the flowers brought in for the service were afterwards sent to the Cottage Hospital and the Union Infirmary.

Bridport (Farewell Presentation).—On Monday evening, July 1, a meeting was held in the Rax-lane Schools to bid farewell to the Rev. H. S. and Mrs. Solly on their removal to Poole, after a ministry of nineteen years at Bridport. In the absence of Mr. T. Male, the senior warden, through indisposition, Mr. H. S. Suttill presided, and Mrs. T. A. Colfox first spoke with warm appreciation of Mrs. Solly's work, especially as founder of the Mothers' Meeting, and then Mrs. Abbott, the senior mother, presented to Mrs. Solly a pair of silver candlesticks with an address, which she gratefully acknowledged. Mr. Colfox, following the chairman, said he had been deputed on behalf of the congregation to ask Mr. Solly's acceptance of an address and a purse of gold, to which practically every member of the congregation had contributed. It was difficult for him to say what he should like to say on this occasion. As a congregation they had had a long roll of ministers of whom they had been proud, and this year Mr. Solly's name would be added to that list, equally honoured and respected, for he had maintained the traditions of those who had gone before, fully and entirely. He proceeded to speak very warmly of Mr. Solly's work as their minister, and referring to his public work said that as inhabitants of Bridport they desired to thank him most warmly for what he had done in the town, more especially in regard to the literary and scientific institute, the general schools, the secondary schools, and other educational work. He had also taken up the public baths, and in many other ways had done much to advance the interests of the town. The address was also in terms of warm and grateful appreciation, and

Mr. Solly acknowledged the presentation with much feeling. He thanked them all for the generous support they had always given him, and for the encouragement he had received, without which it would have been simply impossible to have carried on the work. It had been work very dear to him, and it was quite true that he was often painfully conscious of the difficulties of it at times. He was glad to think the distance between Poole and Bridport was not so great but they might sometimes see something of one another. A musical programme followed, and a very successful evening was brought to a pleasant close. There were about 300 present.

Coseley.—On Sunday, July 7, the 103th anniversary of the establishment of the Sunday-school was celebrated at the Old Meeting House. At the morning and evening services the Rev. J. A. Shaw, of Wolverhampton, officiated; and the preacher at the afternoon service was the Rev. T. J. Pennell, of Ebenezer Chapel, Coseley. Anthems and special hymns sung by the children enriched the services. All the congregational hymns for the services were specially written by the venerable pastor, the Rev. Henry Eachus, who through continued ill-health was unable to attend the celebration. The collections for the day amounted to £14 15s. 6d., an increase on those of last year.

Manchester: Bradford.—The annual flower service was held at the Mill-street Free Church on Sunday, June 30, the address being given by the Rev. H. Dawtrey. The orchestral society of thirty players, and the choir, under the leadership of Mr. F. Whittaker, rendered effective music. There was a record attendance and collection.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—Mr. Leonard Clarkson, jun., a librarian at the Sunday-school and devoted member of the congregation, recently gained his B.A. (Honours) degree at Manchester University. His success in the special study of modern languages has given great pleasure to his many friends at Lower Mosley-street.

Mottram.—On Sunday evening, June 30, at the close of service, Mr. Irvin Swindells, who has been chapel secretary for the past seven years, was presented with a marble timepiece on behalf of the congregation, as an expression of good wishes in connection with his recent marriage, and of appreciation for his faithful services. After a few words by Mr. F. Wild and Mr. E. Gee, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith made the presentation.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The annual picnic was held at Mottram on Saturday, July 6, and was very successful, in spite of the unfavourable weather, over 200 sitting down to tea. A special committee meeting was held immediately after tea, when the holding of a musical festival was approved. Mr. J. H. Elkin acted as leader in a ramble through some of the most interesting scenery of the district. Near "The Hague" a halt was made, and several hymns were sung, under the leadership of Mr. W. Woolley. At the request of the President (Rev. B. C. Constable), the Rev. H. E. Dowson moved and Rev. W. Harrison seconded a cordial vote of thanks to the Mottram friends for their arrangements, which was carried with acclamation, and to which Rev. H. B. Smith fittingly responded.

Nottingham: Christ Church.—A tablet to the memory of Mrs. Jesse Hind, who died at Bordighera, on March 27, has been placed in the church, bearing an inscription, which after the name and dates has this record: "This tablet is erected by members, Sunday-school children, and friends of this church to commemorate their love for her, their admiration of her high character, and their appreciation of her devoted sympathy and helpfulness with every movement for the welfare of the church." Mr. Jesse Hind and the other members of his family were present at the unveiling, which was performed by Mrs. Mallett. The Rev. C. Sneddon, minister of the church, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas took part in the proceedings.

Walsley, near Bolton.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 30, when the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, preached to very large congregations in the afternoon and evening. In the morning also he gave a very helpful and inspiring address to the scholars, when the Rev. E. E. Jenkins took part at the service. Special hymns were sung by the children at each service. The collections amounted to £58 11s. 9d., an increase on that of the last few years.

The thrifty woman who knows how to economise and manage household affairs to the best advantage is decidedly a woman worth marrying. Such a woman will be sure to favor the use of the "Dalli" Box Iron or "Dallinette" (a smaller Dalli). To use them is the best, most simple, and most comfortable way of ironing. Self-heating with non-inflammable fuel without noxious fumes, therefore no risk from fire. Healthier and safer than any other iron.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE report of the Summer Meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service is completed this week. The second of Professor Réville's articles on the Ecclesiastical Situation in France, dealing with the Protestant churches, also appears; but we regret to say that the Carmarthen Address has still to wait another week.

THE Rev. Frank Walters has accepted an appointment under the Quaker Trust, as preacher and lecturer in Scotland for the three closing months of this year. On Sundays he will conduct services at our churches, and on week evenings he will deliver lectures in various places as may be arranged.

THE Church of England Training Colleges have for many years had nearly four-fifths of their total revenue granted from public funds. Yet when Mr. McKenna insists that non-church students may be educated in them on application, it is said that grave injustice is done to Churchmen. On Thursday, last week, the President of the Board of Education had this and other reproaches to meet, among them that he was usurping the powers of the legislature, and so on. All this because, in addition to assisting all classes of the public to benefit by institutions mainly promoted by public funds, he has actually provided some relief for parents in districts where only one school exists, and that a sectarian one; and, worst of all, he has begun to apply the law against schools which are unfit for children to be taught in. "Reprisals" are threatened when the other party comes into power; but few practical men are greatly affected by the threat.

LETCWORTH must be a busy place just now. On the 19th, the Marquis of Salisbury was to open the new Urban Housing and Homesteads Exhibition; and on the 27th, members of the Garden City Association and shareholders in the First Garden City are to meet there and realise the progress already made. Cottage-building is now proceeding apace, and must continue for many months if it is to satisfy the needs of the new printing and binding factories. The population has risen to 4,000, and its rapid growth brings many social problems in its train. To meet one of these a Girls' Club has been built by the generosity of a friend, and will, it is hoped, be a centre for much social life during the ensuing winter. The interesting temperance experiment of the "Skittles Inn" continues to prosper.

THE Garden City ideal is spreading, and spreading among practical men. The latest city at which a scheme has been publicly promoted is Leeds, where the Fearnville Garden Association has secured the option of a site at Roundhay for 500 semi-detached villas to cost not less than £300 each. The site extends over 70 acres. Bungalows will be allowed. While these various scheme at Leeds, Birmingham, Hampstead, Wolverhampton, Manchester, and elsewhere for Garden Suburbs are being promoted, it is of utmost importance that the promised legislation earnestly desired by housing reformers of all political parties giving local authorities the power to determine the general plan of the new suburbs that arise around the existing towns, should become law. Otherwise the Garden Suburb will be but an oasis in the desert of new buildings, and those who speculate in adjoining land and building will, as at Bournville, provide an unhappy contrast while gaining by the proximity of a better district.

SOME of the evidence which is being given before Sir Thomas Whittaker's Committee in the House of Commons, is very painful reading. Mr. Graves, chief factory inspector, stated that in Birmingham there were some 15,000 to 20,000 homeworkers engaged in the boxing and carding of hooks and eyes, in the button trade, electro-plating, and French polishing. Over a thousand women were occupied in the first-named of these, and, working ten hours a day, could rarely earn more than from two to three shillings a week. In one case, a woman and five children only earned 2s. 7d. a week, the maximum earning was 4s. 3d. The same low payment was given to some 700 other women employed in the button trade. The Inspector added that children of three to five years of age helped their mothers, and that the sanitary conditions of the homes was generally bad.

THE holding of Summer Schools has now become a settled habit in the Society of Friends. During June one was held at Bryn Mawr, near Philadelphia, in which the chief lectures were devoted to "The Religious Message of the Bible" and "Mystic Movements in Church History." At the end of the month, two others were held in this country, one at Maidstone, to which Professor R. W. Rogers, of Madison, N.J., the well-known Assyriologist, lectured on "Creation Stories," and "the Story of the Flood"; and another at Bridport. A fourth school will be held, near Philadelphia, by members of the so-called Hicksite branch of the Society, at the end of August, and an attempt is now being made to establish an American "Woodbrooke," or settlement for religious study, in connection with the same body. These Summer Schools indicate the widespread interest which is being felt by Friends in the problems of religious thought, and especially of Bible teaching in their adult and Sunday schools.

LAST May a miracle happened. At the beginning of the week the fruit trees bore brown and greenish buds. At the end of the week they were robed in bridal garments of blossom. But for weeks and months the sap had been rising and distending the cells and maturing the tissues which were half ready in the fall before. The swift unfolding was the culmination of a long process. Perhaps these nineteen centuries of Christian influence have been a long preliminary stage of growth, and now the flower and fruit are almost here. If at this juncture we can rally sufficient religious faith and moral strength to snap the bonds of evil and turn the present unparalleled economic and intellectual resources of humanity to the harmonious development of a true social life the generations yet unborn will mark this as that great day of the Lord for which the ages waited, and count us blessed for sharing in the apostolate that proclaimed it.—Professor Walter Rauschenbusch of the Rochester Theological Seminary, N.Y., Conclusion of his "Christianity and Social Crisis," 1907.

DR. CAMPBELL MORGAN is reported as saying that the world at large on the matter of religion is passive, unresisting, uninquiring, indifferent; and, further, that the Church of Christ, as a whole, lacks emotion, enthusiasm, energy; that it is devoid of joy and singing. After so serious a charge one is inclined to look further down the speech to find suggestions for a remedy. The remedy, it seems, is to insist on these absolute verities:—

(1) Man is wrong; he cannot help being wrong; he goes on being wrong whether he lives in the slum or the suburb, the University or the penitentiary.

(2) Jesus Christ is a perfect and absolute Saviour. (He adds, "If this is not believed then the preacher had better clear out and stop preaching.")

(3) In the Bible we have a record which is a revelation, authoritative and final.

These, he says, are the certainties.

It would, perhaps, not be labour lost to ask whether the preaching of these certainties is not largely responsible for the indifference of the worldly, and the lack of joyous emotion in the men of the Church. The man who, with no pretence of religious faith, knows what it is day by day to lead a clean and dutiful life may well be indifferent to the message which begins by telling him man is wrong. The man who has any acquaintance at all with the actual lives of Christian believers and with the documents that are grouped together in the Bible, may well be halting and joyless if he has to describe the Bible as authoritative and final, or to declare Christ to be a "perfect and absolute" Saviour. May he not recover a sense of freedom and the gaiety of soul which he has lost as soon as he feels at liberty to honour simple human virtue; when he has neither to limit Divine inspiration to the Bible, nor to find it in those pages where it happens to be conspicuously lacking; when, even in speaking of Christ, he feels no temptation to speak in bombastic superlatives, but is willing so to speak that Christ, hearing him, might not blush or be ashamed?

DR. TOWNSEND, of the Methodist New Connexion, has recently explained in the Methodist Times the basis of membership in the group of churches to which he belongs. Attendance at class meeting having become a difficult and almost impossible test of membership, the rule was relaxed so as to allow alternative methods of becoming attached to the church, and in 1896 the rule was so enlarged as to admit active members of Christian Endeavour Societies to membership. Dr. Townsend believes that the greater latitude has worked well not only numerically but spiritually. "As to the success of the Endeavour movement, there can be no doubt. It is the class meeting with new and living interest imparted to it, and preserves among the rising generation of our churches a healthy fellowship of the most helpful kind."

GLADNESS can scarcely be a solitary thing: the very life of praise seems choral; it is more than one bounded heart can utter. Surely when one has once entered into the blissful secrets of harmony, the note seems to suggest the chord, to ask to be built up within it.—Dora Greenwell.

WILLASTON SPEECH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, July 10, was speech day at Willaston School. There was a large gathering of parents and friends of the boys, and of others interested in the school. A most excellent musical programme was provided by the boys. So striking and unusual, indeed, was the skill of the boys that those who do not know the work of the school might be excused for wondering if the boys had time for anything else. Those who do know something of the work of the school are convinced, however, that the teaching of classics and of biology is quite as good as the teaching of music.

It was with great satisfaction that we heard from Mr. Dowson, who took the chair in the regretted absence of Mr. Steinthal, that the son of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Coventry, of Sutton, has gained an open biological scholarship at Magdalen College, Oxford. He is the first Willaston boy to gain an open entrance scholarship at one of our Universities. Only two such scholarships were awarded: one was gained by Coventry, and the other by a Harrow boy. He has done honour to his school, to his science teacher, Mr. Tobler, and to himself; and we were glad to hear from Mr. Dowson that the Governors had decided to give him a leaving exhibition for three years in recognition of his ability, in addition to the scholarship which he has gained at Magdalen.

Mr. Dowson expressed, on behalf of the Governors, high appreciation of the work of the Headmaster and of Mr. Tobler. He had the firmest faith in the future of the school. It was an unsectarian public school, based on broad religious principles. It aimed at a free and full development of body, mind, and spirit, and it would be, he hoped, a model to many schools which would come after it. He mentioned the strong desire of the Headmaster for a school swimming bath, a desire heartily shared by the Governors, and commended the consideration of this need to any generous friend of the school who may be willing to help it with a gift of far-reaching importance.

The Headmaster, Mr. H. L. Jones, in his reply, made a speech which must have impressed everyone by its quiet humour, its strong common sense, its grasp of the principles of the school, and its enthusiasm for the work.

He spoke, of course, with much satisfaction of Coventry's exhibition, and of the scientific teaching of Mr. Tobler, which had much to do with Coventry's success. He referred to the inspection of the music of the school by Dr. Walker, of Balliol College, the successor of Dr. Farmer. The following remarks from the inspector's report must be quoted:—"The percentage of boys individually taking part in it is most exceptional. The teaching is excellent, and the average of attainment is much higher than that ordinarily reached in schools. Indeed, I know no school which has a better general musical atmosphere. The material available must, of necessity, fluctuate in quality, but a tradition of the kind that is becoming rooted here is something of permanent value."

The Headmaster referred to the fact that seven boys had entered for the higher certificate in the Oxford and Cambridge examination, to be held in the following week, and spoke hopefully of the prospects of the candidates. He referred to the flourishing condition of the Debating Society, the Literary Society and the Scientific Society. He spoke of the great importance of the classics in a liberal education, and said, with emphasis, "The classics will not take a second place here as long as I have anything to do with the work of this school." Much stress continues to be laid on games and on outdoor work. He was glad to report that one or two sporadic infectious cases had been at once checked. Epidemics had been a failure, due, he believed to good food, fresh air out and indoors, and plenty of soap and water, combined with strong precautionary measures. In conclusion he asked: "What do we wish boys to have learnt at Willaston? (1) His first care is his body, and neglect or indulgence of the body renders it unfit to be the tenant of the soul. (2) True knowledge must be won by sweat of the brow. Interest must stimulate but cannot supersede effort. (3) Besides body and intellect man has a soul. Unreasoning creed and dogma starves the soul, while thought and inquiry increases his faith. (4) Responsibility is given us for the good of our fellow men. It is the ideal of Willaston to take its place among the other public schools of the country in producing honest citizens and true sons of God. In doing this we believe that we shall be fulfilling the intentions of Philip Barker, the founder of the school."

Six new boys, we understand are coming up to the school in September. Willaston should be better known, but we believe that the good work being done, and the satisfaction felt by all the parents in its influence upon their boys must bear fruit in time, and that this school, under Mr. Jones, with the valued help of his wife and the teaching staff, will have a growing and a lasting success.

THE London Fabian Society will open a Summer School on July 27, at the village of Llanbedr, near Harlech, and seven miles from Barmouth. They have secured an old and roomy mansion called Pen-yr-Allt, with accommodation for about forty guests, and among the distinguished Fabians who will visit the place and lecture are Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. Hubert Bland, and the Rev. R. J. Campbell. Dr. Lawson Dodd, of Tunbridge Wells, has been actively engaged in its organisation. Others besides socialists will be admitted to residence and non-residents may attend lectures.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.—London, July 10, 1907. The Rev. David Fowler Stewart, M.A., of Felix Villa, Tonbridge, who desires to enter the ministry in this province, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness. Signed: W. Blake Odgers, chairman; James Harwood, secretary. Note.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL SITUATION IN FRANCE.

II.—THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES.

If the Roman Catholic Church did not accept the regulations of the Law of Separation, the little Protestant flock in all its varieties has tried to comply with them. But here the internal divisions of Protestantism rendered the work so intricate that even the French Protestants are often at a loss to make out what is the present state of their organisation. How shall I, then, make it clear to our foreign friends?

Even before the separation, there were different Protestant Churches in France:—(1) The Reformed Presbyterian or ancient Calvinistic Churches, by far the most numerous; (2) the Lutheran Church, or Eglise de la Confession d'Augsbourg, which was recognised by the State as well as the Reformed Churches; (3) several little groups of Free Churches, like the Union of Free Evangelical Churches, the Baptist, the Methodist Churches, and others of no importance. The churches mentioned under No. 3 had no connection with the State. They were already separated; they had thus nothing else to do than to suit their existing organisation to the practical regulations of the Law of Separation. The Lutheran Church, with its two synodal circumscriptions of Paris and of Montbéliard (near Belfort and Basel) and its general synod at the head, was able to maintain the whole machinery of its organisation, because there was a spirit of tolerance which united the orthodox and the liberal members in the same communion. They had only to accommodate their statutes to the new legal situation.

But with the Reformed Presbyterian Churches it was another matter. Legally they were one body, but really since 1873 there were two; the orthodox or synodal churches and the liberal churches. The Government did not recognise that division, and continued to regard all the Reformed Churches as one denomination.

When the Bill of Separation was to be voted, there was a strong impulse throughout the public to secure the union of all Reformed Protestants in one and the same organisation. It seemed greatly preferable for such a small Protestant minority in a Catholic country not to divide itself once for all, nor to waste its means and strength in competition. I have no doubt that most of the Reformed Protestants wished that some attempt might at least be made in that direction, especially that a General Assembly of representatives of all the Reformed Churches might be called together to deliberate on the ways and means for a possible single organisation. But the leaders of the orthodox party did not desire such a union. The orthodox Reformed Churches had already a complete synodal organisation—with district synods and a general synod, with a compulsory confession of faith; it seemed to them unfaithful and impractical to imperil their own house by consulting a general assembly of all the Reformed Churches. But a large minority of their own General Synod was favourable to the union plans, and at the session of Reims, in 1905, it was decided by a majority of one voice that the General Assembly should be summoned after the separation, without prejudice to the existing private organisations. Even this decision was too bold for the leaders. The board, on which they had a majority, interpreted the vote so that the General Assembly should be called together only when the separation had been realised, i.e., when the Reformed Churches would have been reorganised, and that it would have to deliberate only on the opportunity of a confederation of the separately organised groups of Reformed Churches. Meanwhile they worked hard at the re-organisation of the orthodox group according to the regulations of the Separation Bill; a great deal of money was gathered amongst the rich members of the orthodox churches, and at the synods of Orléans (1906), of Montpellier (January, 1907), the separate organisation of the Union nationale des Eglises réformées évangéliques was sanctioned. And now at a synod of Paris (May, 1907) this orthodox Union invited the other Reformed organisations to hold a General Assembly, where the separate organisations would be represented—and not directly the churches themselves—to debate on what points they could work together.

The Liberal churches from the beginning had declared themselves in favour of the union of all the Reformed Churches, and they made many concessions for that purpose (Liberal Synod of Montpellier, November, 1905). But when it became unquestionable that the orthodox group had decided to repel any kind of common organisation, they were obliged by practical needs to work out their own government, with district synods and a general synod. Intending to make it clear that they wished not to create a dogmatic group, but a liberal and tolerant one, they chose the name of Eglises réformées unies.

But this is not the end. Amongst the minority of the orthodox group the strange interpretation of the vote of the synod at Reims by the leading board, together with many other causes, provoked such grievances that a part of them decided to turn aside from the group and to appeal to all reformed Protestants of France, to constitute on a broad evangelical platform a large body of Christians, above and beyond all party spirit (en dehors et au dessus des partis). These union men, whose leader is the pastor of Rouen, Wilfred Monod, recently elected minister at the church of the Oratoire in Paris, invited all those who shared the same principles to the meetings of Jarnac (October, 1906), and there they laid the groundwork of the Union des Eglises réformées, which held its constitutional synod at Paris, some days ago (June 1907). Here, also, there will be district synods and a general synod, so that we shall have henceforth three different kinds of district synods, and three different general synods of the Reformed Churches in France; those of the Union nationale des Eglises réformées évangéliques (orthodox), those of the Eglises réformées unies (liberal), and those of the Union des Eglises réformées (of no party). And, as all these synods have their meetings sometimes in the same towns (for instance: Montpellier, liberal synod in 1905; orthodox, 1907), one does not know what organisation is meant, unless you mention the exact titles and the exact dates.

There is still another cause of confusion. The men of Jarnac, or of the Union des Eglises réformées, claim to be above all party spirit. They have appealed to all reformed Protestants, who pursue the same aim and profess the same principles of faith and liberty on an evangelical basis. They profess thus the same ecclesiastical principles as the liberals, although many of them have not quite the same theological opinions. So it has happened that a great many of the Liberal churches have given their adhesion to the group of Jarnac. At present more than half the churches of the Union des Eglises réformées are already also adherents of the Eglises réformées unies.

It would have been much more logical to amalgamate the two organisations; but then the men of Jarnac, who intend to be of no party at all, would have seemed to go over to the liberal party. Now many of them have still prejudices against the liberals. Moreover, they think that they would recruit no new members amongst the moderate orthodox churches of the Eglises réformées évangéliques, if they could be said to have united their cause with that of the liberals.

But practical reasons will oblige the two organisations of the Union des Eglises réformées and of the Eglises réformées unies to associate together before long, so that there will remain only two distinct denominations of the Reformed Churches, one with a dogmatical basis with about two-thirds of the churches, and another with an evangelical undogmatic basis gathering one-third of the churches, amongst which indeed will be many of the most important.

The General Assembly of representatives of all the Reformed Churches will not meet, because the orthodox party has not accepted its principle. But there will probably be a conference of representatives of the different organisations to strengthen the federation of the different Protestant denominations, already existing, and to concentrate all the Protestant forces for the defence of the common cause, without any interference in the government of the denominations themselves. I feel sure that the cause of union between Protestants will make progress in the near future.

JEAN RÉVILLE.

AMONG the American ministers who are, or are about to be, in this country this summer may be mentioned the following—all of them friends of repute amongst Unitarians on this side:—The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, of Arlington-street, Boston, one of the Executive Committee of the International Congress; the Rev. Frank L. Phalen, of Fairhaven, Mass., who is to preach at Essex Church, Kensington, on Sunday; the Rev. G. W. Kent, of Providence, Rhode Island, who is to preach at Newport, Monmouth; and the Rev. W. R. Lord, of Rockland, Mass. Among the arrivals in August we look for the Rev. Robert Collyer, on his way to open the Keighley Library and to receive his doctor's degree from the Yorkshire University; and the Rev. Dr. Cressy, who is to officiate at Effra-road, Brixton, during September.

JUDAISM.*

THIS is one of a series of small hand-books on "Religions Ancient and Modern," and it differs from most of the other members of the series in this particular, that it is written by an adherent of the religion described in it. The author explains, in the preface, that "he is himself a Jew, and thus is deeply concerned personally in the matters discussed in the book. The reader must be warned to keep this fact in mind throughout. On the one hand, the book must suffer a loss of objectivity; but, on the other hand, there may be some compensating gain of intensity. The author trusts, at all events, that, though he has not written with indifference, he has escaped the pitfall of undue partiality." The book itself well bears out the promise of the preface. The reader feels at once that he is under the guidance of a man who has first-hand knowledge of his subject, and a knowledge not merely gained by study, but developed from personal experience, his own and that of his ancestors.

The Judaism described is that of the Hebrew race since the Christian era, though it really dates from the reorganisation after the Babylonian exile, and the true founder of it was Ezra (B.C. 444). The writer is not concerned with pre-exilic Judaism; but he points out that post-exilic Judaism took over "a syncretism of the whole of the religious experiences of Israel" in the past, from the earliest times down to the exile. Nothing that had come down was rejected. The ancient literature contained much which in itself was not in accord with the highest and best ideas of the post-exilic Judaism; but all was taken over, and was interpreted in the light of the later ideas. "Like the Bourbon," says our author, "the Jew forgets nothing; but unlike the Bourbon, the Jew is always learning." And he goes on to add that "But for St. Paul's attitude of hostility to the Law, but for the deep-seated conviction that the Pauline Christianity was a denial of the Jewish monotheism, the Jew might have accepted much of the teaching of Jesus as an integral part of Judaism." Which is true enough; but it seems to show that there are some things which not even the tolerant spirit of Judaism can assimilate. Contradictions there were, and are in plenty, in Jewish religious belief; and there never has been a self-consistent system of Jewish theology—a fact which does not trouble the Jew, so long as he can somehow fit those contradictions into his general scheme of life.

Of post-exilic Judaism, the predominant type is Pharisaism, for that alone survived the two great shocks of the fall of Jerusalem with the destruction of the Temple, and the revolt of Bar Coch'ba. The Sadducees perished with the Temple, for whose corruptions, as denounced by Jesus, they and not the Pharisees were mainly responsible. The Essenes were not unrepresented in the age after the final destruction of the Jewish State, but their influence was seldom more than that of an individual here and there. The Pharisees were the main stock, and from them has proceeded the whole of what Judaism has since become. Our author notices, with approval, the suggestion of Professor Burkitt, that the fall of the Temple may have "produced within Pharisaism a moral reformation, which drove the Jew within, and thus spiritualised Judaism." Burkitt made this suggestion in order to account for the difference between the Pharisee as shown in the Gospels and the Pharisee as he appears in the Talmud. The suggestion, whether well-founded or not, is a vast improvement on that harsh judgment which condemns the Pharisees as always and everywhere hide-bound pedants and unspiritual formalists. The Pharisees, of course, were those who worked out to its fullest extent the principle of nomism in religion. The Torah, to the Pharisee, was the full and final expression of the will of God. And as being embodied in a series of precepts it might be called Law, as it usually is. But law does not fully represent what the Pharisee meant by the Torah. He was not content to obey the precept merely as the expression of an external authority; he sought always to get to the meaning and intention of the precept, as an expression of the mind of God, who gave it. He obeyed the precept because he owned God as perfectly good and desired above all things to do His will. And not only so, but as our author points out, the Pharisee "identified this imposed Law with the law which his own moral nature posited. . . . The Law was in large part a correspondence to man's moral nature."

The natural consequence of applying the principal of nomism to religion, is the multiplication of rules, and the casuistry of subtle distinctions; and our author candidly admits that to some extent Judaism suffered, through the placing on the same level of obligation the ritual and the moral precepts. "It is possible," he says, "to find in co-existence ritual piety and moral baseness. Such a combination is ugly; and people do not stop to think whether the baseness would be more or less, if the ritual piety were absent. But it is the fact, that, on the whole, the Jewish codification of religion did not produce the evil results possible or even likely to accrue" (p. 21). And elsewhere he makes the acute remark (p. 69), "But in discussing Judaism, it is always imperative to discard all à priori probabilities. Judaism is the great upsetter of the probable. Analyse a tendency of Judaism and predict its logical consequences, and then look in Judaism for consequences quite other than these. Over and over again things are not what they ought to be. The sacrificial system should have destroyed spirituality; in fact, it produced the Psalter, the hymn-book of the second Temple. Pharisaism ought to have led to externalism; in fact, it did not, for somehow excessive scrupulosity in rite and pietistic exercises went hand in hand with simple faith and religious inwardness. So, too, the expression of ethics and religion as Law ought to have suppressed individuality; in fact, it sometimes gave an impulse to each individual to try to impose his own concepts, norms, and acts, as a Law upon the rest." I have given that long passage because it throws so much light upon the inner aspect of Judaism, a light which is very seldom vouchsafed to the Christian outsider. And for the sake of the same Christian outsider I would add what a modern Jew conceives to be the sum and substance of his religion; but the passage is too long to quote. It will be found on pp. 37, 38, and is taken from a tract entitled "Essentials of Judaism," by N. S. Joseph, and issued in London by the Jewish Religious Union.

There is matter in every one of our author's chapters upon which I should like to comment, if space allowed, or if I thought that the readers of the INQUIRER would be interested in them. For those who are interested, the book itself, to be had for the very modest price of one shilling, will be better than any comments of mine. They will find in it chapters on "Articles of Faith," "Some Concepts of Judaism," "Some Observances of Judaism" (in which there is no mention, so far as I can see, of the distinctive sign of the covenant), "Jewish Mysticism," "Eschatology," and "The Survival of Judaism." The last gives our author's version of the Messianic hope. "Amid all its trust that the long travail of centuries cannot fulfil itself in Israel's annihilation, amid all its particularism, there soars aloft the belief in the day when there will be no religions, but only Religion, when Israel will come together with other communions or they with Israel. . . . Modern Judaism claims no finality but what is expressed in that hope. . . . Modern Jews think that in some respects the Rabbinic Judaism was an advance on the Biblical; they think further that their own modern Judaism is an advance on the Rabbinic. Judaism, as they conceive it, is the one religion with a great history behind it which does not claim the religious doctrines of some particular moment in its history to be the last word on religion. It thinks that the last word is yet to be spoken, and is inspired with the confidence that its own continuance will make that last word fuller and truer when it comes, if it ever does come."

So, Israel also, even in these latest days, is "saved by hope."

HENRY KELSEY WHITE.*

WHEN our friend and brother, Henry Kelsey White, passed away, less than a year ago, we felt that there was lost to our churches a minister of exceptional enthusiasm, large ability, and unusual promise. Particularly in his later work at Ashton-under-Lyne he gave evidence of zeal, courage, fidelity, and determination which seemed to make certain the future welfare of his congregation. His Ashton friends are taking steps towards the preservation of his memory in connection with their new church; and all his friends will find a way for themselves. What is likely to be his best tangible memorial is the little volume just published by his friend Mr. Tutin, of Hull—for whom he edited several interesting anthologies of seventeenth century poets—and edited by another friend, Mr. Lionel S. Birch, of Urmston. The work of Kelsey

White, apart from that of his ministry, was considerable, in quality, if not in quantity, and of the manuscript material left behind Mr. Birch has brought together in a neat book of a hundred pages what he regards as the best and ripest portions, such as fully merit publication, and should win appreciation "not only among those who knew the writer, but in a wider circle of literature lovers." These consist of three papers on Shakespearean subjects, one on "Literature and Social Progress," and thirty poems, including ten sonnets. The essays witness to a considerable depth of reading, and contain, even where the material is somewhat fragmentary, good suggestions on certain aspects of Shakespeare's genius, and here and there a passage of arresting force and beauty; the fuller essay, of which we have given the title, is very indicative of the wealth of its subject and a good contribution to it. Of the poems, we like best the sonnet-paragraph of a passage of Lessing and most of the fine lines of "Passed," an elegy on the death of Tennyson. The blank-verse pieces are well-sustained, and have not a few sections of great beauty, of plaintiveness of feeling and clearness of description. As one closes the book, the sadness of the thought of rich promise cut off on the very threshold of attainment lies heavily upon one. How much for us and for many might have been!

The issue of this book is limited to 500 copies, for it has not been intended as a marketable thing, but chiefly as a simple memorial, a little treasure some of his friends may wish to keep. It has for frontispiece an excellent portrait.

SHORT NOTICES

A Plain Man's Faith brings us in contact with a strongly religious personality—an anonymous author—whom many readers will be glad to meet. His somewhat remote manner will indeed be an obstacle to his influence, for, like other writers of the present moment, he has steeped himself in a literary culture that has made him fastidiously averse to the common handling of religion. And in thinking to arrive at theological results without theology (a common phase with those who consider themselves "plain men") he arrives, not at clarity, but merely at an uncertainty of emphasis on points where we want to be sure of his meaning. He is all in favour of literary and spiritual interpretations of religion as opposed to crude, dogmatic statements. His plea for an all-comprehensive Church will find a ready welcome in our own denomination, while he will appeal more effectively than we can do at present to the larger Christian communities, because he is so genuinely in touch with the living Christian consciousness which they preserve in spite of their dogmas. He appeals for more honest speech. "It is indisputable that to save some poor old woman's peace, to prevent some youthful doubt, to buttress, as they think, some manly faith, the real working of the Holy Spirit, the true teaching of our Lord and Saviour, the clear purpose of our God and Father, are kept back by those who know these things." He handles in a fresh and suggestive way the mystery and entanglement which are incident to the use of words as vehicles of the Spirit; and this may be illustrated by his own remarks on the personality of Christ. "Neither before nor since his time has such a Son of God appeared, and the marvel is that as we progress from stage to stage towards God and find out the way of pleasing Him, we may even hear the Master's whisper: 'Have I been so long among you and among your churches, and ye have not listened, though I told you that at first?' . . . No more inspiring gospel can be conceived—at least, as yet, though I think that this is one of those ideals which is never superseded except in the knowledge of details as they grow—than this of working among mankind with God, in Christ's steps and name, till we are all one." And, for beautiful though somewhat elusive writing, take this from the closing paragraph: "And one by one, no two alike in their ideals and their personalities, all reach the veil of death and pass in silence through. There at least all seem to expect to be alone with God. Falstaff called upon Him, and Mistress Quickly, under her rôle of hostess, admitted that she would do so at the proper time. It is no dishonour to the Creator that we leave His earth with some reluctance, however weary we may be—the sunsets and the birds, the flowers and fruit and stars, the poetry and science, the sweet companionship of home! But those that know their Father, from their very thankfulness for earth, expect from His hand some better thing at least, and, first, something of satisfaction for those who missed it here." W. WHITAKER.

Broken Shells Gathered on the Shores of Thought, by F. T. Mott, author of "The Benscliff Ballads," and other books not unknown to some of our readers, is a little collection of suggestive fragments of thought dedicated "to all who prefer the contemplation of beauty and the earnest pursuit of goodness to the farce and frivolity of society." It contains both prose and verse. Here is the first fragment: "If any man would buy Wisdom let him pay for it with Love; or Peace, let him exchange for that rare pearl the gauds and trappings of Luxury. If any would rejoice, let him open the eyes of his soul and be thankful. There is no joy like that which waits upon Thankfulness, which is true worship, and lifts a man into the very presence of his God." The second is in verse:—

"O World that art so fair and true,
My heart leaps out with joy between
The lovely over-arching blue
And thy sweet floor of green.

* * * *

"Here I stand beneath this bower
Of ivy sprays and budding rose.
Heaven breaks upon my soul! The Power,
The Love, the Beauty round me closed!"
Mr. Mott is a thorough-going optimist, and his determinism, which in former days he has often championed in these columns, bears him calmly over many rough places of moral stress. Thus of God he says: "He is the One only Spirit of the universe, and in that universe is no evil, no wrong, no backsliding, no degeneration." And, again; "We call one man good and another wicked. But to the eye of God they are all beautiful, and the small variations only make the total beauty or the garden richer and more perfect." Human life does not quite appear to us in that guise, nor do we think that it is merely "sentiment" that is on the side of freedom in the matter of human responsibility and the unfolding moral life of man. (Gay & Bird, 1s. net.)

Mr. J. R. BEARD'S Secret Fancies of a Business Man will only come as a revelation to those who sceptically divide between the poet and the practical life. For many a year the author of these verses has been known as a careful writer and a forceful speaker; it needed but these pages to prove that, to his other gifts, is added that of a sensitive feeling for rhythm and an ear for true rhyme. Gentleness, shrewdness, noble thought and honest humour mark out his pieces from the dull average of verse writing. He shows his skill in many modes and sings in many keys; but the dominant spirit is that of a true manly nature, devout and earnest one while, playful another. Manchester may not be Parnassus, but a rill evidently flows that way; and we expect the author's many friends will become more numerous now he also is found among poets. (Sherratt & Hughes, pp. 107, 2s. 6d. net.)

The reprint of the late Mr. Samuel Sharpe's Historic Notes on the Old and New Testaments is more than an act of filial piety. Although the work was written half a century ago, and that half century the most fertile in Biblical research, its independent and sagacious spirit commends it still to serious attention. The fact is, that the author, while pursuing his own lines of investigation, was in many of his critical conclusions on the right track, and so far ahead of the rank and file of commentators that many of them are not up to him yet. Two types of reader will probably appreciate the book most—the unlearned, who is making his first venture into open-eyed study of the Scriptures, and the man of scholarly mind who is most competent to add the corrections and supplements necessary to bring it abreast of the latest science. There is certainly a great store of acute observation and reasonable interpretation in these pages. The hand which has added paragraphs here and there, judging by the marks of parenthesis, has done good service in a modest way. (Elliot Stock, pp. 312, price 6s.)

An Exposition of the Gospel of St. Mark, by the late William Kelly, edited, with additions, by E. E. Whitfield, contains little that is fresh or valuable. Neither the author nor the editor shows any sympathy with modern exegetical views and methods, and, referring to these in the preface, the editor exclaims, "May God deliver us from the present widespread apostasy!" (Elliot Stock, 5s. net.)

Me and Myn, by S. R. Crockett, is an amusing, pleasant, idle tale, in which those who appreciate the romance of stamp-collecting will find a special interest. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

The Case for Women's Suffrage, edited by Brougham Villiers, contains contributions by Mrs. Fawcett and Mr. Keir Hardie, and a number of well-known champions of the cause, including Florence Balgarnie, Eva Gore-Booth, Margaret McMillan, and Christabel and Emmeline Pankhurst. As an appendix two speeches of Mr. I. Zangwill's are given, at the Exeter Hall demonstrations on February 9 and March 8. (Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.)

A View of Life. By Margaret E. Thomas.—The various papers of which this little volume is composed are marked by deep religious feeling, and by much beauty of thought and expression. Some of them have obviously been suggested by the writer's experience as a nurse, and they may all be said to be reminiscent, more or less, of vigils in the sick chamber, where the heart is chastened and the mind naturally looks upon things sub specie æternitatis. The author is painfully conscious of the social evils of the time, of "the ever-increasing irony of silk and rags, of brightness and squalor," of "the problems which one may never solve but which it seems cowardly to drop"; and she insists on the need of personal effort and sacrifice, on each one doing his or her best to bring about the realisation of God's kingdom on earth. COLONIAL BOSTON.

ALL through the time of the Commonwealth the colonists were left very much to themselves, but with the Restoration it soon became evident that a new state of things was approaching. The new Government viewed with rising anxiety, and some jealousy, the attitude of independence and assurance which these hitherto insignificant colonies were beginning to assume.

King Charles and his ministers began to manifest their intention to take a much more effective control over their domestic affairs, and one pretext after another was seized upon for pressing the claims of the Crown. Since the earlier attempts of this kind the colonists had suffered severely in long contests with their Indian neighbours, and besides this there were among them a growing class of rich and prosperous people who were disinclined to any course which involved disturbance, and who, though they still held to their religious and political opinions, were perhaps a little tired of the extreme severity and dulness of life under Puritan rule.

With this condition of things among them the colonists were no match for the Home Government, and as the latter pressed its claims they receded step by step, until in 1686 the precious charter was relinquished, and a new, royal governor appeared to show that the old system was at an end.

One of the chief points of the religious system of the Puritans was the combination of great religious devotion with a total absence of all outward ceremonial. Ritual and set prayers were abhorred by them, and until now they had been able to keep all signs of such things out of their city.

The Puritan government had made life restricted and uncomfortable for all those unfortunate people who, though they lived under its jurisdiction, did not fall into line with Puritan ideas of what a church should be. But in spite of discouragement, there were an increasing number of such people, and among them not a few Episcopalians whom the authorities had allowed latterly to hold services in a part of the Town House. Now the first thing the new governor did was to make a peremptory order that one of the chief churches should be granted for the holding of Episcopalian services, a proceeding that was regarded with intense dislike by even the most moderate. But not only were they shocked by the spectacle of an English church service in one of their own meeting-houses, for presently some one was married with the aid of the English prayer-book, whereas till now marriage among the colonists had been made into a purely civil rite, and their dead buried in solemn silence; and then the governor proceeded to intrude into the Puritan calendar various Popish holidays, with all sorts of worldly sports, and it was no wonder that even those best disposed to the new rule should protest and feel wounded in their tenderest feelings.

Under the old charter, Boston had grown from a scattered settlement on the edge of a wilderness into a flourishing town; it now increased rapidly, and in 1760 had twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and was quite the largest and most prosperous town on the continent, and known in England as the most important town in the British colonies. It still had an English look, its streets were called by English names, the materials of some of the houses had even been brought over from England and the people loved to plant English trees and flowers in their gardens.

The town made a fine show in those days, as it spread itself out from the harbour's edge, while down on the shore, as befitted a town that got its prosperity largely by seafaring was a fine wharf called the Long Wharf, of which the inhabitants were very proud, crowded with great warehouses. From this ran the principal street, called King-street, afterwards to be re-christened with Republican fervour, State-street, and at its head stood the Town House, one of the few pre-revolutionary buildings standing now. In it, all Government affairs were transacted, and its history is full of exciting incidents. From the balcony the news of the Declaration of Independence was read, and here the constitution of the State was planned. From its windows Washington received an ovation from the people and reviewed a long procession.

Until then, the roof was adorned with carved figures of the Lion and the Unicorn. These were torn down and burnt in the first year of independence; but when, in later years, the old place was restored, the city fathers, feeling that they could afford to indulge their antiquarian tastes without compromising Republican independence, had copies made of these old heraldic animals and placed them on the roof again, where they may gladden the eyes of the traveller to this day.

Faneuil Hall is another relic [of those colonial days, and the scene of many a patriotic outburst of feeling. It used to be called the "Cradle of Liberty," and to-day is always used for any gatherings of citizens in times of public excitement. It is forbidden by the city charter to be sold or leased and is never let for hire, but can be obtained on the application of a certain number of citizens for public meetings. On its roof is a gilded grasshopper, supposed to be taken from the arms of the Frenchman who gave the building to the town, but in reality copied from that on the top of our own Royal Exchange in London.

Still another building of note is the Province House, where all the royal governors lived in turn. It was a fine large house set round with lawns and trees, and over the doorway were the British arms. But all its glory has departed from it. Only some of its walls are standing, and though there is its old name, Province House, still on its front, it decorates a common lodging-house up a shabby back street.

In the early days there had been few rich and no poor, but now differences had grown more marked, and the existence of a poor-house showed less welcome changes. But there were other and pleasanter evidences of the march of progress. The number of school houses had increased too, and the influence of the Puritan's faith in education showed itself in the unusual number of printing presses in the town, and, indeed, at a time when in all Virginia there was only one printing press, in Boston there were already five! Besides this there were already several newspapers, and some periodical publications. In fact, one of the most interesting survivals of colonial times is known to-day as the "Old Corner Book Store." It stands at the junction of Washington and School streets, and any one reading the list of its successive owners since its erection in 1712, will find the names therein of many an honoured Boston citizen. It has for generations been the centre of the intellectual life of the town, and is regarded by all the Bostonians with a veritable feeling of affection.

To us the most interesting relic of the colonial days of Boston is the King's Chapel. It was erected by the first royal governor—he who so greatly offended the stiff old Puritan citizens, by demanding the use of one of their own churches; and here he and his successors attended the services of the English church as long as there was any royal governor. It is a quaint old place, and though mainly rebuilt, it keeps its old appearance, and, in fact, reminds one very much of some of our own old London city churches. They show you the place where the governor's pew used to stand and point out the organ emblazoned with the royal cypher, and in the pulpit I believe is the old prayer-book King George himself presented to the chapel.

I think the most distinctive feature in Boston, and one of which Bostonians are most proud, is the Common. There is an old record which tells how, in the very early days of the settlement, "a piece of land was set apart as a trayning field, and for the feeding of cattell."

The common is still a "trayning field," but the "cattell" have ceased to graze there. From the first care was taken to keep it in order, and in 1657 it was ordered "yt if any person shall hereafter anoy ye comon by spreading stones or other trash upon it, these shall be fined twenty shillings." In this order the settlers showed their good sense, and their descendants have had the wisdom, while leaving the beautiful open space pretty much as nature made it, to take good care that it should be preserved from defacement, or the encroachments of greedy city governments. Within its confines have been enacted many of those events which go to the making of history. It was here that the British troops encamped behind their trenches, waiting through the long bitter winter to besiege the town, and here in modern times, John Andrew, the beloved "war governor" of Massachusetts, reviewed the troops which the State sent out to take a share in the civil war. Intersected by paths and covered with fine old elms, it has a piece of water in one part of it which there has been many an attempt to rechristen, but which still goes by the homely name of the Frog Pond. Against one side of the common the waters of the Charles River used to lap, now in its place runs the broad thoroughfare called Charles-street, and beyond that, where used to be the salt marshes, is the fine West-end of fashion and wealth.

There must have been by the middle of the eighteenth century nearly twenty churches, or rather meeting houses, for, according to Puritan notions, it was the Church that worshipped in the meeting-house, and the term as applied to the edifice itself was regarded as a relic of popery. Of these the majority were congregationalist and were maintained by the State. Chief among these was the meeting-house of that "First Church in Boston" founded so soon after the landing of the colonists. The first building had only mud walls and a thatched roof, and very likely presented, like most of its contemporaries, more the appearance of a fort than a sacred building. Its floor was simply the earth beaten down, and its roof was very probably used as a store-house for powder and ball. Later on it was rebuilt, and then became a large brick building, still standing as late as 1808. The building of those churches was always a matter of public concern, for each citizen was obliged by law to contribute to "razing the meeting house," while a tax was levied on every householder for the maintenance of the minister.

At first, while the colonists were poor and materials hard to get, there was very little outside church decoration, and in any case it would have been considered a piece of vanity and extravagance. Later on, however, perhaps paint was cheaper or the belief in ugliness as a part of holiness not so enduring, for it became the fashion to paint the meeting-houses in very lively colours indeed. Mrs. Earle, in her "Sabbath in Puritan New England" describes one, of which the main part was a bright orange, its doors chocolate colour and its corner boards and weather boards white, while still another was so gorgeous that its congregation boasted that they had "the newest, biggest and yallowest church in the county." UNIVERSITY COLLEGE has a scheme for establishing a Hall of Residence for students at the new Garden Suburb at Hampstead. At present, nearly 300 men students are living in lodgings. The proposal is for a hall that would accommodate 50 or 60 residents at charges not exceeding £20 a term, the necessary capital to be provided by a limited liability company. A plan of self-government by the students, dispensing with a Warden, is advocated by Sir William Ramsay, and is viewed sympathetically by the Provost of the College, Sir Gregory Foster.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE SUNNY SIDE.

ONE of the sayings we all know well is, "What can't be cured must be endured." It is a very true saying, but when we have said it we haven't finished with it, we have to decide how it is to be endured. Some of us like to put on a gloomy expression to let the world know it is hard work, and that we have a right to grumble. I know a little girl who came down to breakfast very cross one day—she was rather a spoilt little girl—and no one taking any notice of her, she at last said, very irritably, "I may scratch my back all day, and nobody cares." I am afraid everyone laughed, and she did not get the kind of notice she wanted.

I begin to think that old saying ought to be altered into "What can't be cured, must be enjoyed." But you will say there are things that can't be enjoyed, illness or pain, for instance. No! We can't enjoy them actually, but we can bear them so that it will be a pleasure to look back on the way we bore them.

When I was a little girl, my father wanted to pull one of my teeth out. It was a quite loose front one, and if I had only trusted him, and bravely borne it, I should now enjoy the remembrance of being good, and think pleasantly of the pretty presents given to me after. But, sad to say, I remember how I kicked and screamed, and had to be held down tightly on a table, and my father's troubled face, and I still have the uncomfortable feeling that I did not deserve the presents. I have grown wiser since then.

Now I will give you the advice, taken from her own experience, of some one who managed almost to enjoy a painful illness:

First make up your mind you are going to like it, if only a very little bit, and that you won't mind if things are horrid.

Now, if nurse is a long time away when you want something, instead of thinking about it, look round your pretty room and see what there is to while away the time. Perhaps the curtains have a pattern on them, and, if you look, you may see a funny face laughing; or a scroll will turn into a squirrel nibbling a nut, and, maybe, a monkey is close by teasing it. Or the wallpaper may have hidden in it funny pictures. The time will go so fast like this, that nurse will be back before you have thought of her again. I have done that when tired with pain and waiting, and found myself actually laughing over the queer things I saw.

Then, if a cat keeps you awake, or motor-cars keep whizzing by, compose a little story and make them fit in, and you will be asleep before you know.

And, above all, try to look cheerful. Oh! the difference it makes to everyone in the house whether the invalid smiles generally or looks miserable! To smile makes others smile, and that makes you smile again, and so it goes on. But a melancholy face makes every one look sad, too, and then a cloud seems to settle on the whole house. And you know it does not hurt more to smile than to frown.

So, when we think it over, there can be a "Sunny Side" to even illness (as well as to everything else) if we only bear it well, and think of others as well as ourselves. And by doing these, we make everyone love us, and then we must be happy. This is what a poet says about the "Sunny Side":—

Wherever it goes, the darkness glows,
And men and women sing;
If fills their eyes with a glad surprise,
And stays their sorrowing;
The heart is atune, the world is June,
Nothing is old or gray,
As it passes along with the swell of a song,
Like a musical break of day.

Spirit of Love, in the blue above,
Who makest the sun to flame,
Who guidest the light of the planet bright,
And callest the stars by name,
It is thou dost hide in the "Sunny Side,"
And creepst from heart to heart!
And, soul or clod, we share the God
Who comes—and the shadows part.

JULY Young Days has a dialogue between the Oak and the Elm in Mr. Livens's delightful series of papers, "Listening to the Nature Folk." These papers should not be overlooked either by the children or their elders, and we hope some day they will make a little book. The Guild work this year is "Just a Verse Each Week," to be learnt by heart. These are the verses for the four weeks of July:—

HAPPY THOUGHTS.

The world is so full of a number of things,
I'm sure we should all be as happy as kings.
R. L. Stevenson.

ON LOAN.

"With some of us sick, and with most of us sad,
It hardly seems proper for one to be glad!"
Well, come, needy neighbour, at least you can borrow!
I'll lend you a smile—you can pay me to-morrow.

W. G. Tarrant.

HE PRAYETH BEST.

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

Coleridge.

TRUE WORTH.

True worth is in being, not seeming;
In doing, each day that goes by,
Some little good—not in the dreaming
Of great things to do by and by;
For whatever men say in their blindness,
And spite of the fancies of youth,
There's nothing so kingly as kindness,
And nothing so royal as truth.

WITH the broad Atlantic rolling between our ministers and delegates and their churches and homes it will certainly be a convenience to be able to cable to a registered address. Arrangements have been made by which messages may be cabled to "Unitarian, Boston" (the name of the recipient, of course, being prefixed). Such messages will be delivered at the offices of the American Unitarian Association, 25, Beacon-street, Boston. No doubt intending visitors to the International Council, and their friends at home, will make note of this very useful provision.

OUR FATHER'S WILL.

LOOKING back upon the proceedings of the summer meeting of the Union for Social Service, held at Manchester College, Oxford, the report of which is completed this week, we find much cause for gladness and thankfulness. Certainly those who were there will have very happy memories of that week of conference and fellowship; and what they experienced, though their numbers were not many, bears the promise of much greater things in the years to come.

Here we are at the heart of religion, of that living faith, which must control the future, for the welfare of the world. This is the lesson all the Churches have to learn. As to doctrine we can only know the truth, and the power of that truth, as we are doing the will of our FATHER who is in heaven. And that will is the true life for all the children of men, in the world as it is, here and now. It is in the facts of common daily life that God is with us, and in our deeper understanding of its meaning, in the purest impulses of trust and reverence, the passion for justice and fellow-feeling, the motions of His Spirit are to be recognised, making His will known to us. The Kingdom of God is to come here in our very midst; it is the right ordering of the affairs of the world, that justice may prevail, and righteousness be the strength of the people, and peace and brotherly love make gladness in every heart; that there may be liberty for all alike, with differing gifts and differing opportunities of service, to enter into the fulness of life. We have to find better ways of doing the world's work, to share its good and beautiful gifts, to make peace prevail, and break down the barriers of an evil selfishness and hardness of heart, to guard the unprotected and the feeble against cruel wrong, to take the unfit, and touch them with the quickening breath of wholesome strenuous life, and make them fit for a place in the great field of honourable service.

Here is the chief concern of our religion, to be doing the world's work in the spirit of a true brotherhood, thus proving by the demonstration of our common life that this is indeed God's world, in which it is true that love is the greatest of all, and that by His grace we have the power more and more completely to overcome evil with good. Every call of human need, every stirring of better hope and aspiration, makes clearer to us what we have to do, and every kind of helpful service touched upon in the conferences of the Union form a part of the Divine purpose, which it is for us to fulfil. Each one in his own place, according to his own strength, and all in the one Spirit, we have to throw ourselves into the service of the common good, and the more completely we can do this, the more surely shall we know the strength, the quietness, and the joy of an abiding faith.

The PRESIDENT, in summing up the work of the summer meeting of the Union, quoted lines from WORDSWORTH'S "Recluse," as exactly expressing for us the ideal which we seek to attain through the efforts of our Union for Social Service. What WORDSWORTH set himself to sing we have to realise in the service of our life:—

"Of Truth, of Grandeur, Beauty, Love, and Hope,
And melancholy Fear subdued by Faith;
Of blessed consolations in distress;
Of moral strength and intellectual Power;
Of joy in widest commonalty spread;
Of the individual Mind that keeps her own
Inviolate retirement, subject there
To Conscience only, and the law supreme
Of that Intelligence which governs all—
I sing.

* * * * *

—Beauty—a living Presence of the earth,
Surpassing the most fair ideal Forms
Which craft of delicate Spirits hath composed

From earth's materials—waits upon my steps;

Pitches her tents before me as I move,
An hourly neighbour. Paradise, and groves

Elysian, Fortunate Fields—like those of old

Sought in the Atlantic Main—why should they be

A history only of departed things,
Or a mere fiction of what never was?

For the discerning intellect of Man,
When wedded to this goodly universe

In love and holy passion, shall find these
A simple produce of the common day.

—I, long before the blissful hour arrives,
Would chant, in lonely peace, the spousal verse

Of this great consummation:—and, by words

Which speak of nothing more than what we are,

Would I arouse the sensual from their sleep

Of Death, and win the vacant and the vain
To noble raptures."

There is a good motto for our Union in the thought of that one line,

"Joy in widest commonalty spread."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

SUMMER SESSION AT OXFORD.

II.

WE reported last week the first three days of the summer meeting of the Union at Manchester College. The remaining days were no less full of interest, and were rendered the more delightful by the beautiful summer weather that had come at last. Thursday afternoon will long be remembered as a time of ideal pleasure and happy comradeship by those who were fortunate enough to join in the excursion down the river to Nuneham, and Friday afternoon also had its special interest in the visits to Dr. Murray's "Scriptorium," the laboratory of the great English Dictionary, and to the Clarendon Press printing works.

THURSDAY'S & FRIDAY'S LECTURES.

The devotional service in the College chapel was conducted on Thursday morning by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, and on Friday morning by the Rev. E. A. Voysey.

UNDERPAID LABOUR.

The first lecture both on Thursday and Friday morning was by Miss Clementina Black, on "The Public Conscience and Underpaid Labour." On Thursday she made a statement of facts, taking as an example the box-making trade, in the investigation of which she had just been engaged. Fuller information on the whole subject will be found in Miss Black's book, "Sweated Industry and the Minimum Wage" (Duckworth & Co., 3s. 6d. net). It was a serious fact, she said in the course of her Thursday lecture, that the number of trades which provided a living wage for girls was diminishing year by year. For instance, in the cardboard box making industry the average weekly wage sixteen years ago was 15s., now it was only about 10s. And this was for skilled labour—she did not believe anyone present could turn out boxes that would pass muster with some of the firms, or make them fast enough to earn 4d. a day. Wedding-cake boxes, for example, were retailed at 1s. 6d. per dozen; the price paid to the makers was 2s. 7d. per gross, and out of this they had to find their own glue and the wrappings in which to send them to the wholesale house. One gross per day was the very fastest rate at which they could be turned out, and every one had to pass fifteen times through the operator's hands before it was complete. The box making trade was becoming a machine trade, but girls were only being paid 10s. a week for full factory hours to tend the machines. The people who were labouring under these conditions were by no means worthless—they were in the true sense of the word, respectable, and, in spite of their adverse condition, were rarely heard to complain. The truth was that when all was said and done, modern civilisation practically rested on a basis of slave labour, and the taskmasters were starvation and family affection. The employers, more often than not, could not help themselves, nor could the consumers individually do much to remedy the evil. The state of things was the result of many individual actions, by themselves well-intended, but collectively producing very evil effects; and it was only nationally, collectively, that a way could be found out of the muddle. But there was one thing they could and ought to do as individuals, and that was to learn to acquire a knowledge of the facts and study to find a solution that could be applied.

In her second lecture (on Friday morning) Miss Black asked how the evils she had described might be remedied. It was desirable for us all, she said, that commodities should be cheap, but not that labour should be cheap, for that meant human misery, which was bad not only for the sufferers, but for all. Apart from the question of humanity, it was a fact that the underpaid did bad work. Underpaid labour was not really cheap. If labour were better paid, she affirmed that the trade with which it was concerned would be improved, and she instanced the cotton trade. When the child-labour, which had been a national disgrace, was abolished, and factory legislation was introduced, the trade made immense progress, and when the trade unions raised the rate of wages, the quality of the work also improved, so that England now commands the markets of the world. The same principle, she was sure, would apply in other trades. When the employers could not press down the rate of wages they were obliged to improve machinery and in other ways secure their profits by better work. The Factory Acts had been passed, not on industrial, but on moral grounds, but once more it had been proved that the way of righteousness was the best way. Much had been done for the regulation of the hours of labour, and she believed that the time had come when something might be done as to wages. She then gave a most interesting account of what had already been done by the Wages Board in New Zealand by the method of arbitration between employer and employed, and also at Melbourne, and urged that the same principle should be applied in this country. She did not suppose that a minimum wage would bring the Millennium, but it would bring the same kind of advantage in the matter of pay that had been secured by the regulation of hours. In the matter of starvation wages the public conscience must intervene and speak through the Legislature, and every individual consumer could help by getting to know the facts and then pressing the matter upon Parliamentary candidates, in order to secure reform. In conclusion, she urged them all to join the Anti-Sweating League.

COLLECTIVE ENTERPRISE.

The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed gave the second lecture on Thursday, following up the subject of his previous lecture on "The Central Industrial Problem." The subject was announced as "The Relation of Collective Enterprise to the Theories of Individualism and Socialism." The lecturer dealt with many of the fundamental conceptions of political and social economy, money, bankruptcy, the relation of book-keeping to industrial fact, and so forth; but the portion that dealt especially with the relation of municipalised industries to the theories of individualism and socialism may be summarised thus:—

In the industrial world we have to find out what we can do that some one else (who likewise has or can do something) wants done, and by doing it to get from him some general command of the services and commodities in the circle of exchange; and we then proceed to select, up to the measure of our command, the things we desire to possess or to get done. This is individualism. It rests on a man's direct and primary consciousness of the things he wants (not necessarily for himself), and the fact that in order to get them he must do what some one else wants. A man's economic or industrial worth depends on the relative importance to anyone else (whom he can directly or indirectly find out) of the things he can do. He is therefore under direct and constant pressure to find out what other people most want and get it for them, for in no other way can he get what he wants made or done. This is the strength of individualism. It is a force which constantly impels a man to find out what he ought to know because of the unrelenting urgency of the things he knows.

But it does not cover all the ground. There are communal needs which must be collectively dealt with, such as the need for roads, in which it is impossible to establish this direct relation between the worth to others of a man's effort and the means given him by others of accomplishing his own purposes. And this is the natural field of communal enterprise. There are also revenues corresponding not to the output of individual effort, but to significance of things, or forms of matter, which are legally possessed by individuals, but owe neither their existence nor their significance to assignable individual effort. The communal direction of communal resources to communal purposes may reasonably be called collectivism or socialism. But if an elected body of persons gathers capital, pays wages, and sells the produce—that is to say, exchanges it for what it is worth to individuals—this is a case of certain public-spirited persons performing some of the easier and more routine functions of business for nothing; but the whole transaction remains essentially on the individualistic basis. If it is successful, an economy of effort is effected, but no revolutionary principle of organisation has been introduced. Yet an immense amount of what is hailed or dreamed as Municipal Socialism is no more than this.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

On Thursday evening addresses on "The Drink Traffic—Disinterested Management" were given by Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree and Miss H. M. Johnson, followed by discussion.

Mr. B. S. ROWNTREE said that as temperance reformers they must agree that there were three conditions which ought to be carried if legislation was to be effective. In the first place, they must materially reduce the total consumption of alcohol, and not merely drunkenness. Secondly, they must destroy the social and political menace of the trade. Thirdly, he believed in order to do that they must take away from the trade their war fund, the monopoly profit of the drink trade granted by the nation. It was that monopoly profit which enabled it to be what it was—the most powerful fighting organisation which there was in England at the present day. The profit of the public-house trade amounted to twenty millions a year. With regard to present policy, there were certain things they wanted—they wanted to restore the power of the magistrates taken away by the Act of 1904. They also wanted to introduce a time-limit—that is to say, the expiration after a certain number of years of every licence in the land. The licences should lapse, and only be granted again as new licences which paid the full monopoly value to the State. As to further measures of reform, he thought the power of local veto ought to be given, but experience had shown that while in sparsely populated districts it would be successful, in large towns it had always failed, and in England 77 per cent. of the people lived in towns. Then, as practical reformers they had to ask what could be done to meet the evil, and he strongly advocated the system of disinterested management, under which a company would take over the public-houses and manage them, not with the object of encouraging, but of discouraging, the sale of intoxicants. The profits should go, not to the lessening of local rates or to local charities, but to the national exchequer, to be distributed impartially throughout the whole country, in proportion to population, for providing counter-attractions to the public-house. That was how intemperance must be fought. It was a question of the right entertainment of the people.

Miss JOHNSON, on the other hand, was strongly opposed to disinterested management. She felt it to be inconsistent for a temperance reformer, even from the best of motives, to engage in the drink trade. If they were convinced that alcohol was a poison, and that the use of it, even in what was called moderation, was entirely harmful, they had no right to take part in distributing what they felt to be an evil thing to the people. They must do everything they could to restrict the trade. And she believed that the local veto had been far more of a success than Mr. Rowntree admitted. She gave instances of experience in Norway, where there were more prohibition than Samlag towns, and of the astonishing spread of prohibition in the United States, where thirty-three millions of the people were now living in prohibition areas. She was confident that the local veto would make its way in this country, and would be welcomed first by the working men.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

On Friday evening a lecture on "The Need for Social Service" was to have been given by Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., but he was prevented by his public duties from being present. No other lecture was arranged, and the time was most profitably devoted to a kind of experience meeting, in which a number of members present told of the work in which they had been engaged. Thus Miss GITTINS recounted her experience in connection with the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society in Leicester, and what opportunities of helpful sympathy she found in meeting the women who came out of gaol. Miss CLEPHAN told of what can be done for deficient children, and of what unexpected capacity was often found in children supposed to be stupid when they were properly treated. Miss H. M. JOHNSON told of her work in Liverpool, in calling public attention to the cruel wrongs suffered by children served with drink in public-houses, of how the magistrates were led to take action, and the movement had spread throughout the country. They ought now to work, she said; to get the age raised to eighteen, below which it would be unlawful to serve young people in public-houses. Mr. J. C. BALLANTYNE spoke very earnestly on the subject of Social Purity, and urged all the members to join the Social Purity Alliance (17, Tothill-street, Westminster, S.W.). Dr. HELEN C. PUTNAM told of what had been done in New York State in the Elmyra Reformatory, and a similar institution for men, and urged the frankest teaching of the facts of our physical life, no less than the moral, in schools. Mr. WATKINS, of Ruskin College, pleaded that the hopelessly long hours of railway men in the goods traffic were due to a vicious social system, which must be abolished to secure for the men healthier conditions of life; and Mr. F. G. STEVENS, of the Great Meeting Mission, at Leicester, spoke of the right spirit of sympathy and perfect frankness in which the young people must be met. They must be cared for for their own sake, not with any ulterior thought of "the church."

The PRESIDENT, who was in the chair, in closing the meeting, said they had during that week been in no danger of losing contact with the facts of life, and he felt that that meeting had been one of the most helpful of all. He concluded with the lines from Wordsworth which we have quoted in our leading article.

SATURDAY MORNING.

A closing conference was held on Saturday morning on "The Work of the National Conference Union for Social Service."

The President took the chair, and first the following memorial resolution was passed, the members standing in reverent silence.

In Memoriam B. Kirkman Gray.

"THIS summer gathering of the members and friends of the Union for Social Service, arranged and organised by Benjamin Kirkman Gray, secretary of the Union, desires to record its sense of lasting debt to him for all that he did for it, and yet more for the spirit he impressed upon it. The wisdom and insight of his plans for the Conference have been amply vindicated by the impression it has made upon the hearts of all those who have shared its counsels, and, while mourning the loss of his continued guidance and support, his friends and colleagues here gathered together wish to express their deep sympathy with Mrs. Gray, and their own sense of gratitude for all that they have received, and can never lose, from the devotion of their lost companion."

The PRESIDENT then announced that Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, who, during the week, as local secretary, had won their confidence and affection, had consented to act as colleague to Miss Gittins in the secretaryship of the Union, and, on behalf of the members, he welcomed Mr. Ballantyne to that office. They were not passing any formal votes of thanks, but he felt sure that they would all wish the thanks of the Union to be expressed to all their lecturers and to other friends, including the men of Ruskin College, who had done so much to promote the pleasure and success of this meeting, and not least to the authorities of Manchester College, for their hospitality to the Union.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, the treasurer, spoke of the representative character of the Union, and urged that in every province there should be an affiliated local union, as there was already in the Midlands and in Manchester. It would be their aim also to co-operate as far as possible with similar unions in connection with other religious bodies. He went on to urge members to pay special attention to the question of underpaid labour, and also to the subject of Social Purity. In that matter he thought there had been great improvement in the last thirty years. In Liverpool that progress would always be associated with one name very dear to them all. The law in that matter was generations behind public opinion, and it was flagrantly unjust, as being not equal for men and women.

Mr. J. HARROP WHITE, urged the importance of bringing to notice the laws that exist, and the steps that should be taken to put them into operation. Too many of their laws were only permissive, but much could be done, by calling attention to them, to induce local authorities to adopt them. The Union would do good work by publishing leaflets explanatory of the law on various subjects.

The PRESIDENT referred to the very helpful work of the "Poor Man's Lawyer" in connection with some of our Missions, and said their Union might act as Poor Man's Lawyer to their people generally.

Dr. CARPENTER called attention to the importance of making the Union better known among the churches.

Mr. J. C. BALLANTYNE gratefully acknowledged the trust that had been reposed in him by making him one of the secretaries of the Union. He told how he had come to Manchester College two years ago eager for more light on our social state, and now he had come to feel that the moral regeneration of the people was the greatest need of all. That regeneration might include socialism, but he looked for a higher harmony that might include the ideals of both socialism and individualism. He referred to the stimulating teaching of Professor Henry Jones, who had led him to see that there was an open-hearted, progressive attitude to be taken up towards all social problems, and he felt that he was neither socialist nor individualist; but, according to the inscription over the door of that College, he was simply one who was seeking for truth, liberty, and religion. That, he thought, should be the motto of their Union also. He urged them all to turn once more to Professor Henry Jones's articles in the Hibbert Journal, on "the Working Faith of the Social Reformer," which were lectures he had delivered in that College. They contained just the proclamation which that Union wanted to make, and he wished they could be separately published as a book. He once more urged the publication of the President's lecture on "Gambling."

CLOSING SERVICE.

After the Conference a closing religious service was held in the chapel, in which the President, Miss Gittins, and Dr. Carpenter took part.

The PRESIDENT in the course of an address referred to Bonaventura, and a saying of his in which he had put together three texts about "heavy burdens," "except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees," and "my yoke is easy and my burden light." In answer to the question of what they implied, he said that the additional commandment was that of love. It added to the weight of the burden, but only as wings add to the weight of the bird, wheels to the weight of the chariot, and sails to the weight of the ship. The wings bear the bird aloft, wheels make the heavy burden roll lightly, and sails carry the ship singing across the sea. The grievous burden becomes light and easy when the added weight of love is thrown upon it. They must take care, however, not to give way to an idle sentiment of love, which it was so easy to indulge, quite apart from the misery, oppression, and horror of life. A sentimental, self-complacent love would not do, and the conventional sentimental Christ was of no use to them. But they had above them in that chapel, whether by happy accident or divine instinct, a robust Christ. It was a young Christ, with his sheep over his shoulders, in a robust and businesslike way, doing his task and rejoicing in it, not sentimentalising, but doing his work and caring for his sheep. Do we care? asked Mr. Wicksteed. Many of us know we ought to care, and get little peace from our conscience, if we do not. But when we really care, the higher voice of love sounds within us and guides us. Robust, brave, cheerful, not in the spirit of self-sacrifice, but of self-realisation, we go for the thing we want to have, we seek the thing for which we care, and our social sense is broadened. We cannot separate ourselves from our surroundings, our race, we can but live in the social life of which we are part.

Our lives do not satisfy us, unless we can get them into some kind of intelligible relation with the lives of others, conscious not only of the misery around us, but of the joy, the open door of life, the gospel of the glad tidings of life's possibilities. Then for our terrified flight from the hounds of conscience, our shrinking from the lash of duty, our groaning under the heavy burden, comes the light and eager step, the light burden eagerly borne, the new youth, the sense of life, under the added burden of love.

After prayer Miss Gittins read the hymn:—

God of the earnest heart—
The trust assured and still,
Thou, who our strength for ever art—
We come to do thy will!

To draw thy blessing down
And bring the wronged redress,
And give this glorious world its crown,
The spirit's Godlikeness.

Thou hearest while we pray;
O deep within us write,
With kindling power, our God, to-day,
Thy word—"On earth be light."

Dr. CARPENTER, having also offered prayer, gave the final address. It had been his privilege, he said, to offer them a word of welcome, and now also the word of farewell. What, he asked, is it that we carry with us from these memorable days? Some have received much information on matters on which we were ignorant; some have gathered out of public conference and private talk suggestions for personal action which we may carry out in our own ways in our own spheres; some have, perhaps, won some clearer insight into complicated relations of the life, in which we have our share and must do our part. All this is on the side of the intellect. But we have also surely come closer to one another, with quickened feeling, with a deeper sense of our relations to each other and to those who are struggling and suffering round about us. And out of this realising of the unity of our life comes lastly the quickened purpose, the gathering energy, the sense of power, where we are strong not in our own strength, but in that of the mighty Life that beats through us and uplifts us, to which we give the awful name of God. And as we go back to our various tasks we surely take with us this stronger faith, this more earnest realisation of the common ground and support of all our lives.

Speaking further of the work of that Union, he said it surely was not necessary to justify their action, as part of the great movement, which had taken place in the last generation to bring religion to bear effectively on the problems of our common life. So long as religion remained in its present divided condition, expressed in various groups of churches, it was inevitable that they should organise for the purpose of carrying out what they believed to be the will of God in their own spheres, with the aid of that supporting life which the church nourished. Not in the temper of self-seeking, to promote the interests of their own churches, must they do that work, but in the temper of Jesus, which sought to lay the healing of sympathy and help on the sorrows, the wounds, the sufferings, the guilt of men. As they strove to promote the service of that Union, there might, indeed, be in their hearts the desire for co-operation in the common work as far as was possible, that might carry them out of their own church associations and unite them with their brethren, whether in Christ or out of Christ, at least in God, the ultimate ground and unity of all. There were the roots of their common life, there the reconciling spirit that would ultimately bring harmony among all churches and make real in the life of the people at large that which they felt to be their strongest help and support. Let them make the work of that Union, he said in conclusion, an expansive, uniting, sympathetic work, that will bring us into accord with that larger life through which the Spirit of God is training us as members one of another. So may this gathering be a seed-plot of helpfulness for many hearts and lives!

Then followed T. H. Gill's hymn:—
Our God! our God! thou shinnest here,
Thine own this latter day;
To us thy radiant steps appear;
We watch thy glorious way.

Come, Holy One! in us arise;
Be this thy mighty hour!
And make thy willing people wise
To know thy day of power!

With the singing of this hymn and the Benediction, the service, and with it the Summer Meeting, was brought to a close.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

REAL summer weather has at last brought a better record for the Vans, and the workers are more than ever convinced of the need and the great opportunity of this Mission. Of one experience, which may be taken as typical of a good many, Mr. Page Hopps tells in a separate article; but other much happier experiences are also recorded.

Thus, from No. 1 Van we hear that on the last evening at Pontefract, after an address by the Rev. Ottwell Binns, the ex-Mayor, a Wesleyan, moved a vote of thanks, which was heartily accorded. The lowest attendance at Pontefract was 250, the highest 476.

No. 3 Van, with which Mr. Capleton was at Luton and Dunstable, is that of which Mr. Page Hopps tells. Later in the week it was at Tring, with the Rev. F. Summers, and was joined on Wednesday by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who will be at work at Hemel Hempstead and St. Albans (returning home, however, for Sunday's services). Then next Thursday the Rev. J. A. Pearson, of Oldham, will visit Hertford, and afterwards Hoddesdon. Lay preachers and others, who are willing to assist in the work that has to be done in and around London during the next few weeks, are requested to communicate with the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, 1, Valley-road, Streatham, S.W.

No. 4 Van had a run of fine meetings at Stafford, and both the visiting missionaries, the Rev. W. Wilson, of Oxford, and Mr. Steel, of Belfast, were strongly of opinion that the work should be followed up in the town.

From Stafford the Van moved to Stone, and thence to Longton. At Stoke, on Thursday, the Rev. W. Holmshaw took charge. On Monday the Van moves to Newcastle, and next Thursday the Rev. B. C. Constable takes charge at Hanley, moving afterwards to Burslem.

The Scotch Van (No. 2) has been at Ayr, where the Rev. J. Forrest reports bad weather at first, but he and Mrs. Forrest were busy distributing literature and talking to passers-by. This week a beginning has been made at Prestwick, with better results.

Do all things like a man, not sneak-ingly;
Think the King sees thee still—for his King does. — George Herbert.

AN EVENING WITH THE VAN.

It was at Dunstable. The van was very prominently placed on a broad space in the High-street. First came about a score of children, then a few working-men and women, most of whom had been rather shyly looking on at a distance. Then good Mr. Bertram Talbot (who does everything, from cleaning the van and washing up the tea things to addressing the audiences) played two pleasant tunes on a sort of mechanical organ, after which the people gathered round, faced by Mr. Capleton, who read from the Bible, called for a prayer, and made an opening speech. By this time about 400 people were present, and I spoke on the subject of salvation, asking for a wider range of thought than that afforded by the Bible, and pointing out that everything in human life was governed by God's great law and method of evolution, which applied as much to religion as to science and politics and sociology: this making it necessary to bring all the results of modern ethics and modern civilisation to bear upon the solemn question of man's fate in a future life.

The address was followed by questions, and then there was a revelation of extremest interest. In the very centre of the audience there was a band of chiefly youthful questioners, with some older men, all as full as they could hold of the Calvinism of a hundred years ago. They knew only one standard of appeal—"The Word of God"; and it was all in vain (at first) to point out that this "Word of God" attributed to Him such shocking things as the command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch (a spirit medium) to live." They were quite certain, hilariously certain, that the first man was made by God out of dust, and that the first woman was made out of one of his ribs. They were confident, violently confident, that God could not forgive anybody except through faith in the blood of Christ. They knew perfectly well that if a boy failed to go to a Sunday-school, or if a man failed to meet with a missionary or a minister who could persuade him to "accept Christ" he would infallibly go to hell and its burning for ever and ever; and when gentle Mr. Talbot ventured to suggest that possibly "the lost" might have "another chance" on the other side, the suggestion was received with half-laughing shrieks of contemptuous incredulity. Then, when the speaker cited the words of the Psalmist, "The Lord is good to all, and His tender mercies are over all His works," the only response was, "That is here. There is no hope after death for the unsaved." On the speaker asking, "Don't you wish it were true that the poor hardworking costermonger who never had a real chance here should have one there," there was a positive yell of "No!" though a good many gravely said "Yes."

One very sorrowful thing occurred. Over and over again during question time it was asked, "If the unsaved will have another chance of getting to heaven, and eventually be equal with the saved here, what advantage has the good man?" And, in the van afterwards, half-a-dozen young men pressed that question hotly: but, to their credit, it ought to be said that eventually they seemed to be impressed by this other question: "Even suppose there were no future life, and no after reward for being good, would you not prefer to be a noble man rather than a beast?"

On the whole, I felt that this meeting was an overwhelming answer to the always rather poor question, "Is it right to disturb the faith of these people, and go away?" For my own part, I would have liked at Dunstable to put a pound of intellectual and spiritual dynamite under the whole mass of pernicious rubbish and blow the entire thing, for preference, into the clean air of agnosticism, if only for the vindication of the righteousness of the Ideal God.

With the majority of these theological survivals there is no question of saving them from unhappiness. They are perfectly happy, as happy as they are egotistical, and as egotistical as they are sure of Heaven. They glory in "the blood of the Lamb;" they cling to their devil; they are quite satisfied that there should be, for others, a hopeless hell. It does not seem possible, but it is true. Any way, Dunstable alone abundantly justifies the putting on the road these rational Gospel vans; and at Dunstable I believe something has been left behind which will give the preachers a great deal to do.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN URGENT PROBLEM.

SIR,—Once more I must decline Mr. Roberts's well-meant offer to provide me with a précis report of my words. The unqualified phrase "Jesus as absolute" is not mine. The danger of this snippety, catch-word theology is that everybody conceives that he knows quite well what "absolute" means; and therefore such phrases simply darken counsel. "Jesus is absolute and presumably perfect" is another instance. "Perfect" is understood in such connections in a quantitative sense, and also as tantamount to "sinlessness"; and both these notions seem to me worse than useless when they are applied to Jesus. The only proper use of the word "perfect" as applied to a human being is when it becomes the language of adoration and devotion. "Perfection" is not a positive or descriptive idea, but a "limiting conception," and is so used properly of God. But any attempt to apply the word precisely to Jesus, and not in the affectional manner I have mentioned, drags us back to the old notion of holiness and salvation as a sort of fixed quantity, and sin as another sort of fixed quantity, Jesus having one and we the other; whereas the modern view of the spiritual life turns our attention entirely to the power of the Master (whoever he may be) to suggest and inspire deeper and ever yet deeper fountains within us of spiritual good, and has nothing to say about these factitious theological quantities.

There is the same need of discriminating and of avoiding the crude lumping together of ill-assorted notions, when we enter upon the question: To what extent was Jesus anticipated in his great utterances about loving God and our neighbour? That Jesus had his roots in the past, certainly I, who insist so much on the more earnest, if also the more intelligent, acceptance of "development," can never dispute. But in the first place, the fact that Luke makes the lawyer, and not Jesus (as in the earlier account of Mark), enunciate the two great commandments, loses all its force when Dr. Carpenter cites this very passage as an instance of Luke's "adaptation" of incidents taken from an earlier source, after "remembrance of their original significance became confused." (First three Gospels, pp. 302, 315, second edition.) And apart from this, the whole pith of Luke's passage is not the presence of the formula, "love thy neighbour," but the fact that the lawyer, "willing to justify himself" and his Jewish, non-Christian ideas, said, "Who is my neighbour?" Whereupon Jesus gives his new interpretation of "neighbour" in the parable of the Good Samaritan. Indeed, if the ethical attitude which the New Testament uniformly describes as originating with Jesus had been the common possession of Judaism, why should the Sermon on the Mount have been necessary?

It is true again that the formula "Love thy neighbour as thyself" is found in one place in the Old Testament. But in one only (Lev. xix, 18). And by a common, if not general, interpretation of it, it was quite compatible with hating one's enemies (Matt. v. 43; and the cursing Psalms). I am glad to recognise in the Old Testament and in Judaism those dim and dawning anticipations of Jesus such as "Love thy neighbour." But if I am to have an intelligent grasp of history, I must observe grades and distinctions. Because Jesus seized, as by a lightning intuition, upon old phrases which he could transform into a new beauty, that is no reason for blurring over the whole process of growth. Mr. Wicksteed has said in his essay, "The Place of Jesus in History" (Studies in Theology), that the two "great commandments," as they are found in the Old Testament, are involved in the "fundamental, all-pervading, aggressive" national exclusiveness of Israel; and he commends to us the motto, Duo idem cum dicant non est idem. Moreover, these two "great" laws are combined for the first time by Jesus. In the Old Testament they are separated as widely as Deut. vi. 5, and Lev. xix. 18. What shall we say of the spiritual genius which first saw how closely their internal meaning formed a great unity, and furnished forth the human ideal? If, in one sense, there is nothing new in the world, then the only things in any sense new are created by selection and re-combination of the old. Consider what Jesus selected from! If all this is still too obscurantist for Mr. Roberts, he may be referred to Renan's fifth chapter for some striking remarks on the originality of Jesus. But it would be more worth while to read Dr. Drummond's illuminating comparison of Old and New Testament ideas on the Fatherhood of God (Hibbert Lectures, pp. 172-6).

On the general question of religious development, I think that Mr. Roberts's difficulties would all be overcome if, instead of evolution as a process of mere indefinite changes, we thought of it as having a specific character of its own. Thus when Mr. Roberts asks why the experience of the Christian centuries should be specially connected with Jesus, whereas we do not impute his experience to Isaiah, what he has in mind is a mere flow of successive experiences, like that of a stream. Now, to say the least, religious development is something higher than such a mechanical flow. It is, at the very least, organic; one stage grows out of another. Also there is no dead level of succession; as in living organisms, there are here also special "growing points," and an Englishman is much more at home in the Universalism of Jesus than Jesus was in the Particularism of Isaiah. That is, development is always development according to some specific standard, and within some defined area or limit. Jesus took for the limit of his ideal, humanity; nothing less and nothing more. Isaiah and other leaders have had their own standards and their own specific kinds of religious development, but the light of their stars was merged when the sun rose. It remains, then, only to ask what ought to happen when the ethical ideal has been made, by one bold stroke, identical with the human ideal. Of course, there will be continual improvement in detail; and this is all that Mr. Roberts's statement can really mean:—"A purer intellectual conception of God, however incomplete, is not without effect on the moral conception." Progress in goodness can in future mean only finding new ways to love. But apart from the exclusively moral side of the matter, our view of religious progress as being at least organic growth, will supply some general reasons for thinking that the main advance will be more and more Christian. (1) H. Spencer taught us that evolution ever becomes increasingly definite. It keeps on certain lines. The religion of the future, however different from that of the present, will start from the highest that exists at present—will not descend out of mid-air. Even an animal species progresses only in so far as it integrates itself more and more, develops more strenuously the properties it already possesses. Thus, e.g., if Christianity has (through its redemption doctrines) stressed "solidarity," further progress will depend on our not dropping this, but developing it still further. In short, we must make our choice. There is no such thing as "religion in general." Evolution will see to it that we become something, higher or lower. (2) And we can go further. Religion is on a somewhat different footing from intellectual theories, in respect to evolution. It is more than an opinion. It is a way of life, a working scheme for existence in the human world, an organisation of lives and activities. And, therefore, while mere opinions easily change and merge into others, a religion is of necessity more stable, and any changes that come to it will usually be of the nature of re-interpretation. If it cannot stand these, there will be revolution rather than evolution; witness Judaism. Now, we have seen why Christianity is capable of quite indefinite reaches of re-interpretation. And this is why it is the world's desire. (3) This progress differs from all others in being conscious progress. Mere lapse and merging belongs to lower evolutions. The higher a religion becomes, the more does it intensify men's consciousness of themselves, and their relationship to one another; and therefore its perpetuation becomes more and more a matter of preserving the fellowship, and less and less a matter of accidental change. And, as Dr. Mellone says, the gradual spread of the ideals of Jesus will not mean a diminishing reverence for him who was their personal source.

W. WHITAKER.

CHRISTIANITY v. UNITARIANITY.

SIR,—I was much affected by a reflection in your Leader of the 6th, in which you expressed your own opinion that in what you designated as "our undogmatic churches" the name Unitarian can be tolerated only because of the assurance that the word means just free and catholic and undogmatic! a representation which assuredly is only too commonly vociferated amongst us by blind leaders of the blind! It is in the highest degree consoling to hear that you do not sympathise with that ascription.

Surely those who think so are mistaken. The term never did mean that, and does not really mean it now, and we are bound to insist on the repudiation, and stand clear and free—for a free Gospel.

The word was most certainly, in its first use and application a dogmatic controversialism and nothing else. It was emphatically anti-trinitarian and, so far as the spirit was concerned, truly a most beneficent declaration of the supremacy of the one, sole, undivided God.

As for its peculiar popularity amongst the disciples of Mr. Lindsey and Mr. Belsham in London and the South there was certainly in their hands, however touched by their peculiar sense of enfranchisement, genuine religious impulse and association, and in "Unitarianism" the challenge to liberal and rational thought exertion and profession was complete. This led in time to organisation of distinctly denominational energy, and by and by to congeneric development in the North. In each case the characteristic denominationalism has always been used and flaunted precisely in the sense of a sectarian dogma and distinction. But, so far as I know, it never heard of the modernised so plausible translation. [Within two months I myself have heard two eloquent preachers exult in the special distinction of the denominational position and aims, as a peculiar distinction with a special merit of segregation.]

But all this is for me comparatively superficial, and fairly liable to criticism and more precise rejection.

Nevertheless, to my mind, the case with regard to the popular and perhaps more particularly the clerical or ecclesiastical use of the name is exactly that of the party of the new Christians whom Paul had to distinguish from his own broader followers when he went up to Jerusalem with Barnabas and Titus; that is to say, from those who sought to bring him and his party into subjection: "to whom we gave place—no, not for an hour!" that the truth of the Gospel might prevail.

Thus I venture to declare that for us now the use of the name "Unitarianism" is not the truth of the Gospel, but just in its very limitation an un-Christian superstition of Circumcision.

We entreat our old friends and colleagues, giving us their right hands of fellowship, to come out free from that bondage, while we heartily agree to let James, and Cephas, and John in all good fellowship go to Essex-street, and in the Van—if they think fit, all being nevertheless children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision; but a new creature. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them and mercy and upon the Israel of God."

R. D. DARBISHIRE.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE forty seventh annual meeting of the Missionary Conference was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, July 4. After the usual devotional services, the President, Rev. J. Channing Pollard, took the chair, and about fifty members answered to their names. The annual report stated that the membership stood at 116, and four members admitted later in the day brought it up to 120. The report further set forth the circumstances under which the Van Mission, initiated by the Conference, had been transferred to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Services had been held by the Conference at Windermere and Douglas during the summer months. The balance-sheet showed a small sum in the hands of the treasurer. The Rev. J. E. Manning was elected the new President, and the Revs. W. R. Shanks and T. P. Spedding were re-elected secretary and treasurer respectively.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

THE PRESIDENT devoted his address to the Signs of the Times and the Missionary Aspects of the Church. Having spoken of the significance of the "New Theology movement, and the great importance now felt to attach to social questions from the point of view of religion, he went on to welcome the larger interpretation now generally given to Christianity. The mistake of the past, he said, was that it concerned itself chiefly with the individual soul, and ignored the conditions of the human race. The danger of the present is lest in our concern for the race the individual is forgotten. But one of the most cheering signs of the times is its larger interpretation of Christianity, which is at once recognising the mistakes of the past, and is alive to the danger of the present. Professor Rauschenbusch, in his book "Christianity and the Social Crisis," says: "There are two great entities in human life—the human soul and the human race—and religion is to save both. The soul is to seek righteousness and eternal life; the race is to seek righteousness and the kingdom of God." This wider and truer interpretation of religion is gradually becoming the ideal of all churches. It has long been our ideal, and accounts for the activity of our individual members in all that concerns the progress and well-being of our civic and national life. What is leading to this truer conception of religion is the gradual breaking away from the old theological beliefs. If the old theology be true, the attitude of the churches in the past to race conditions is explicable and was correct. For what mattered this ephemeral existence here? What matters the conditions under which we live this brief span of life in a sin-cursed and lost world, in the light of the infinitely greater question of whether we are to be eternally blest or cursed in the life hereafter. So far-reaching and disastrous in their ultimate effects are theological opinions that there should be no uncertain sound or timidity in the delivery of our message, no parleying with false opinion, no temporising in our missionary propaganda, no bartering of the truth for the sake of mere amiability or a passing harmony. Our speech must be with the boldness and power of the man who is thoroughly convinced and feels burdened with a message that God is calling upon him to deliver. There can be no social questions for the man who really believes the old theology. One neutralises the other. This Mr. Campbell feels, and in this he is right. As to the thousands who are out of touch with the churches because they are not sufficiently sympathetic with their aspirations for the application of the Christian ideal to social questions, I believe that this is but a temporary phase that will pass away, and is passing away; because, as I have said, the churches are at last slowly realising that "there are two great entities in human life—the human soul and the human race—and religion is to save them both." Referring to the great need for religious reconstruction in which our churches must do their part, Mr. Pollard said that in this work Dr. Martineau nobly led the way. Facing the problems of the newer knowledge of our time, falling back upon first principles which can be verified by the personal experience of one's own soul, and by the concurrent testimony of human race in all ages, he placed religion upon a solid and impregnable basis. And our special mission is to make our churches and missionary activities so many centres of this larger affirmation which shows that the newer light of knowledge is replacing the old ideas with grander, and making religion not less true, but more and in every sense more uplifting, helpful, and inspiring. This is just the message so many thousands of the unchurched are waiting to hear. If we can find them and they us, they will be with us. Our mission is especially to the emancipated minds of the time; it is to prove to the world that our intellectual freedom is quite compatible with reverence, worship, and the full development of the religious life. On this point a great conflict is impending which will probably be the last one of all—the conflict between the forces of religious liberty and ecclesiastical despotism. In the meantime it is for us to show that there can be a church based upon the principle of freedom without appeal to external authority, a church in which the worshippers need not sacrifice their freedom of thought. That is doubted. It is a part of our mission to prove it.

A discussion was initiated by the Rev. J. A. PEARSON on the desirability of the Conference appointing [a missionary to help vacant churches, to open up new ground, and to look after the services at Douglas for which the Conference is responsible. A lengthy discussion ensued, and the matter was finally referred to the Committee to consider and report.

MISSIONARY AIMS AND METHODS.

The Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS read an eloquent paper on missionary aims and methods. He expressed great hopefulness of the signs of the times. Our churches, he said, are growing in the missionary sense, and of this he was inclined to say better late than too soon. We had much to learn as to the wise economy of our forces, and he pointed out how much more missionary work might be done if the body of our regular ministers were better distributed and enforced by lay help, so that the best preachers could be sent where the need was greatest, and congregational selfishness gave way before the eagerness to spread the light. He advocated the appointment of a special minister at large, who should be free to help in the Van Mission and in other preaching, quite apart from the effort to build up churches. He referred to "that Wesley of Unitarianism," Richard Wright, who began his missionary labours in 1806, as the type of missionary minister he had in mind, though the method of his work would necessarily be modified by the changed conditions of the present time. He concluded with an ardent expression of his faith in the greater future now open to such missionary faithfulness.

The Conference took special note of the absence of the Revs. G. Knight and S. H. Street. On the motion of the Rev. C. Peach a vote of sympathy was passed with them in their sickness, coupled with the hope of their speedy restoration. The Conference also sent respectful greetings to the Rev. J. C. Street, one of its most devoted members, whose absence this year from the meeting was generally deplored.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bedfield (Suffolk).—A very successful sale of work has just taken place in aid of the new club-room which the Central Postal Mission Committee are putting up, to provide more convenient accommodation for social purposes and for refreshments. The room is to adjoin the mission chapel, and to communicate with it. The villagers have been very eager for its erection, and determined to do all they could to raise funds for this object. They formed a sewing circle, material was bought and made up, until sufficient articles were accumulated to justify the holding of a sale of work. This sale took place in the Bedfield mission-room, on Wednesday and Thursday, July 10 and 11. Mrs. Frank Youngman, of Hope Hall, opened the sale, and at the close Mr. Newell announced that the receipts amounted to £11 16s. This result of local effort was most gratifying, and quite up to all expectation. Mr. H. Pearson, M.P. for the Eye Division, sent £1 11s. 6d., and half a guinea for the children's annual treat. On the following morning Mr. Newell received a welcome letter from Mr. Cuthbert Grundy, of Blackpool, promising to contribute £10 for furnishing the new room. The building is to cost £55, and a sum of £20 is still needed, if the room is to be opened free from debt. The hon. treasurer of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union, Miss E. C. Lake, Alaska, York-road, Sutton, Surrey, will be pleased to receive further donations for the building fund.

Birmingham : Moseley.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last at Dennis-road school, the minister, the Rev. Thomas A. Gorton, being the preacher morning and evening. In the afternoon there was a children's floral service, at which Mrs. George Titterton gave a helpful address. In the evening a very large congregation assembled, and were greatly cheered and helped by the presence of the Lord Mayor of Birmingham (Mr. H. J. Sayer) and Miss Sayer. The choir was considerably augmented for the occasion, and, assisted by an orchestral band, rendered special music. The collections were most gratifying, and the musical portion of the services will be repeated next Sunday.

Bristol : Lewin's Mead Mission (Presentation).—On Monday last a garden party was held at Rodney Lodge, Clifton, when about 50 members of the Mission were present. The opportunity was taken to give to Mrs. Broadrick some useful gifts. Mr. Worsley in making the presentation spoke of the services Mrs. Broadrick had rendered to the Mission, and how much they all regretted her resignation. Mrs. Broadrick, in thanking the Sunday-school teachers, the members of the Mission, and Mother's Meeting for their kindly gifts, said how difficult it had been for her to leave them; she had loved her work, but it was impossible to think of undertaking the arduous duties for another winter. She promised, in reply to a resolution of the congregation, to give a ready and willing help when required to the new missionary, Mr. Graham. A hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. and the Misses Worsley for their generous hospitality and kindness.

Cirencester.—Successful anniversary services took place on Sunday last in the old chapel, when excellent practical sermons were preached by the Rev. John McDowell, of Bath. The collections were good.

Dundee.—On Sunday, July 14, the Rev. H. Williamson referred, at the close of his sermon, to the death of Mrs. H. C. Briggs, to whom, and to her late husband, that church had been very greatly indebted during the time of their residence in Dundee. In fact, it was due to their coming to the town in 1865 that a successful effort at last was made to secure a building for the Unitarian congregation. Mr. Briggs laid the foundation stone, and both he and Mrs. Briggs took a warm interest in the welfare of the congregation. She held a class for factory girls in her own house. At the close of the service a resolution was unanimously passed of sympathy with the bereaved relatives, and a request to the committee to prepare a scheme for the erection of a permanent memorial to the family.

Greyabbey, co. Down.—Mr. I. Munn, who has just completed his course of study at the Unitarian Home Missionary College, has received and accepted a call to Greyabbey, co. Down, Ireland.

Glenarm.—On Sunday, July 7, a re-opening service was held in the Old Meeting House, which has been recently renovated at a cost of a little over £200. The building, which is a very old one, dating from 1762, has been put into a thorough state of repair, having been cemented and painted, and a new porch added. The special preacher was the Rev. J. A. Kelly, Dunmurry, who delivered an eloquent discourse from Hebrews xiii. 8, to a good congregation, which included some members of other denominations. The following gentlemen kindly acted as collectors:—Messrs. James Morrow, J.P.; S. Magill, U.C.; P. Crawford; G. P. L. Larne, G. W. Tweed, J.P.; C. C. Cairncastle, J. Thompson, U.C., Glenarm. Including £175, previously collected, the total amount realised was £215, which, after paying all expenses, leaves a balance of £15 in the treasurer's hands. For this satisfactory result thanks are chiefly due to James Morrow, Esq., J.P., manager, Ulster Bank, Larne, who has throughout his successful career shown a warm interest in the affairs of the Glenarm congregation. In addition to raising the greater part of the money, Mr. Morrow has, at his own expense, had a handsome tablet of polished marble placed in the porch bearing the names of the ministers of the church from its foundation in 1622 to the present time. Mrs. Morrow very kindly presented a rich silk gown for the use of the ministers of the Old Meeting House. Thanks are heartily tendered to her and her husband, and all who have helped.

Manchester: Dob-lane (Appointment).—The Rev. Albert Thornhill, M.A., has received and accepted a call to the pulpit of the Dob-lane Chapel, in succession to the Rev. G. Knight.

Sunderland (Appointment).—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower service was held on Sunday, July 14, conducted by the Rev. William Lindsay (late of Christ Church, Nottingham), who has been appointed minister of the joint pastorate of the Sunderland and South Shields churches. The services were much appreciated by fairly good congregations.

Todmorden (Farewell Presentations).—The departure of Mr. Thomas Graham from his native town to take up the work of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission in Bristol, has been marked by public presentations of a very gratifying nature. Mr. Graham has been for more than twenty years junior superintendent of the Unitarian Sunday-school, and a devoted Band of Hope worker. He has also done much good work in connection with the Todmorden Band of Hope and Sunday-school Unions, in which the friendliest relations are maintained between members of different denominations. On Monday, July 8, a joint meeting of the two Unions was held in the U.M.F.C. Schoolroom, under the presidency of the Rev. W. Dickinson, superintendent of the Knowlwood Primitive Methodist Circuit, for the purpose of making a presentation to Mr. Graham of a handsome sectional bookcase. The meeting opened with a hymn and prayer by the Rev. A. W. Fox, after which the chairman, who is president of the Sunday-school Union, told of the origin of the meeting, and the great regret felt in the town at Mr. Graham's departure. The presentation was made by the president of the Band of Hope Union, and Mr. Graham, in acknowledging the gift, spoke with much feeling of what he had gained through the happy work which they as members of different churches had been able to do together. On the following evening the members of the Unitarian church and schools held their own meeting and made farewell presentations to Mr. Graham of a fine roll-top desk and revolving chair, and a set of Chambers' Encyclopædia and the Encyclopædia Biblica. The Rev. A. W. Fox, who presided, spoke with much feeling of the good work which Mr. Graham and his sister, Miss Graham, who also goes to Bristol, had done for the church and school. Other friends bore warm testimony to the same effect, and Mr. Graham in his reply appealed to them, and especially to the young people, to show that the good work could go on quite well without him. He referred with great satisfaction to the fact the congregation had asked the Rev. A. W. Fox to remain with them for another (seven years' term. He urged the young men especially, to whom Mr. Fox had been so true a friend, to rally round the church. The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday week by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, an afternoon scholars' and flower service being taken by the Rev. A. W. Fox. The collections amounted to £55 11s. 1d., about £3 in advance of last year.

Whitby.—Rev. F. Haydn Williams re-opened Flowergate Old Chapel last Sunday, after decorations, including the painting like life of the oak statue presented last year by Mrs. Tattersfield. The same lady is about to present a series of busts of great men, including Socrates and Jesus.

"'PUBLIC OPINION' was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read," said Dr. W. R. Nicoll in the "British Weekly," May 2, 1907.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that during August, September, and October all correspondence may be sent to the office of THE INQUIRER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., and nothing to his private address. He will be in the country during August, and is to sail for Boston by the White Star s.s. Republic on September 11, to return by the same boat, all being well, leaving Boston for Liverpool October 23.

VISITORS to the International Meetings at Boston are requested to note that everyone should present his or her membership certificate at the Unitarian Headquarters, 25, Beacon-street. The list of those who have procured their tickets at Essex Hall has been forwarded to Mr. Wendte, also the list of officially appointed delegates. Any further correspondence, applications for membership, &c., should now be addressed to the Rev. C. W. Wendte, 25, Beacon-street, Boston, Mass., U.S.A. As to sailings and tickets for overland travelling, apply to Messrs. Thos. Cook & Son, Ludgate-circus, London, E.C.

WE publish this week the third of Miss Helen Brooke Herford's pleasant articles about Boston, completing the series with "A Morning's Stroll about Boston," such as many of us hope before long veritably to take. At the same time we are glad to call attention to an article in the July Century Magazine by Dr. S. M. Crothers, on "Outdoor Boston," with some drawings by Jul's Guérin.

"AMONG our big cities," says Dr. Crothers, "Boston is peculiar in not thrusting its bigness upon us. Its outward demeanour is demure. At its portals Liberty enlightening the world would look out of place; we should rather expect the Puritan maiden Priscilla to stand as door-keeper. The evidences of commercial prosperity are present; but they do not stare us out of countenance. They are not concentrated in any one spot, but are 'a good diffused.' Here and there an incipient sky-scraper attempts to lift its head, only to be severely snubbed, and sky-scraping is considered architectural lèse-majesté in the presence of the gilded dome of the State House. Old Boston, with its narrow, winding streets, has many curious survivals of the past, but the Greater Boston has advanced further than any of our communities toward the city of the future, which is to be not a city at all, but a thickly settled country."

DR. CROTHERS then shows how the "Garden City" ideal has been largely realised about Boston by a natural evolution. It is encircled by such communities, not merely suburbs, or "bedrooms for Boston," but each with a life of its own—Milton, Brookline, Cambridge, and the Newtons. Each of these also has a history running back to the beginnings of New England, while now the villages of the old time are merged in the great urban community. "The new Boston gives the impression of breadth and openness. One may ride mile after mile through a pleasant park-like country interspersed with houses. It is the twentieth-century idea of civic development. Every year, as the facilities for rapid travel are improved, the citizen goes farther afield, and demands more space about his house."

OLD Boston, however, remains rich in historic interests, and while, as Dr. Crothers says, the city of the Puritans has become cosmopolitan, its fine tradition still persists. As to its literary reputation, and extreme devotion to "culture," "Boston suffers the fate of the precocious child, who, when he grows up, has all his early feats of intelligence thrown up at him." "Even so keen an observer as Mr. H. G. Wells," says Dr. Crothers, "allows himself to see Boston only through the spectacles of the literary tradition." Such an impression might be got from drawing-room talk, but outdoor Boston is more characteristic. How that is so, readers may see from Dr. Crothers' article.

It concludes with a reference to the statue of that Irish-American Bostonian, John Boyle O'Reilly, "Poet, Patriot, Orator," as he is described on French's monument. "Once Boston represented only the spirit of the English Puritan: To-day the Irish Catholic is too important an element to be ignored. In Boyle O'Reilly we see the two lines of tradition merging. The newcomer lifts his voice in praise of the Pilgrims of Plymouth and of the men of the town-meeting. New England ideas are garnished with Celtic wit. Perhaps nothing in outdoor Boston is more significant than the monument which recognises that the new element entering into the city's life is destined to modify it profoundly."

THE result of the Colne Valley election last week came as an awakener to a good many people. Mr. Victor Grayson, who has won the seat rendered vacant by the elevation of Sir James Kitson to the peerage, and won it, not only against the Conservative, but against the Liberal candidate, Mr. Philip Bright, stood independently "for pure revolutionary Socialism." He is quite a young man, a native of Liverpool, the son of working-class parents. For two years he was a student of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, until the pull of his political sympathies became too strong for him and he resigned. Since then he has worked as a journalist and lecturer. He is an eloquent speaker, full of boundless good spirits and enthusiasm, and a man of a very winning personality.

As to the significance of this election, especially for Liberals and the work they should do for the sound education of the people, last Saturday's Westminster Gazette wrote with commendable moderation. Mr. Grayson stood independently of the recognised political parties. "How has he contrived," asked the Westminster, "to get 3,600 working-class voters to support him on these lines? The answer is that, whether his politics are good or bad, he has made them his religion, and for two years past has worked as a missionary might at the labour of converting souls. He is young; he is zealous, sincere, personally acceptable, and well educated. It is only a few years since he was a student at Owens College, Manchester, and the profession which he had intended for himself until he took to politics was that of a schoolmaster or a Unitarian minister. But his work in the Valley absorbed him, and, for all his theories and visionary ideas, it had a strong practical bent. Our correspondent tells us how, in a recent dispute, Mr. Grayson and his friends took up the cause of the men very strongly, and secured a rise for the 'fettlers' of four shillings a week—that is to say, to the amount which was paid in Huddersfield, only four miles away. A lad of twenty-four who can do this, and who at the same time makes the picturesque appeal of the idealist and dreamer, is clearly a very formidable candidate against opponents who come into the field as ordinary politicians with the backing of political parties. And wherever the same type of man appears, the political parties will have to look out, for they are dealing with a personal force which is stronger than politics, even than the politics of the Independent Labour Party. There is a good deal in Mr. Grayson's theories which strikes us as wild and mischievous—though his actual proposals as they appear in his election address, are somewhat milder than his theory seems to require—but we should like very much to see the older parties cultivate his spirit and his method, and take their politics with the same zeal and wholeheartedness. One of the leading morals of the election is, indeed, that we need to find men of this kind who will make their public work part of their personal association with the poor, and who will be able to supply the sympathy and knowledge without which political doctrine becomes a dead formula to the working-class."

THE result of the Soap Trust libel case will be received by social reformers and friends of purity and honourable dealing in public life with unmitigated satisfaction. Mr. W. H. Lever, of Port Sunlight, obtained the £50,000 he claimed as damages, with costs, from the proprietors of the Daily Mail and Evening News, with the most ample and unreserved withdrawal of all imputations on his character, and apologies for the libels which day after day for a long period were circulated in the newspapers mentioned. The settlement applies also to the libels published in the Daily Mirror. After the scathing and indignant opening remarks of Mr. Lever's counsel, Mr. Edward Carson, and Mr. Lever's own deportment in the witness-box, the defendants had no defence to offer. There was no compromise, but a complete vindication of Mr. Lever.

THE matter is of public importance from two points of view. Mr. W. H. Lever is widely known as a keen-sighted and warm-hearted social reformer, seeking better industrial conditions, and the persistent libels have with many people shaken faith in his integrity in proposals for social betterment, and have reflected on the enterprises in which he was concerned. The case also shows how irresponsible journalism may deliberately blacken the reputation of opponents, and do far-reaching damage to the country. It is some satisfaction to find that there is still a legal means of redress.

THE Wesleyan Methodist Conference met last week, and on Friday there was a pleasant innovation in the customary proceedings. A deputation of dignitaries of the Church of England, headed by the Bishop of Stepney, and including Canon Scott Holland and the Archdeacons of Westminster and Middlesex, paid a visit of friendly greeting to the Conference, the Bishop of Stepney bearing a letter from the Bishop of London, which he read, as follows:—"I cannot allow you to assemble in the City of London without sending you a word of welcome and of God speed. Although you and we are divided upon important questions, we are at one in holding great truths of the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord, the guidance of the Holy Ghost, and in attaching value to an ordered and reverent service. You have, moreover, set an example to us all, by your missionary zeal, and by the evidence your people have given of a fervent love of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I pray that some day the causes which divide us may be removed, and that in God's good time we may be united as members of the historic communion to which your leader and teacher, like ourselves, belonged. Meanwhile, dear brothers, rest assured that we honour you for your works, and shall pray for the guidance of the Holy Spirit upon your deliberations and your Conference."

THE opening address of the President, the Rev. John S. Simon, on the previous day, contained some very sensible sayings, and must have been well worth listening to. The claim that the Methodist Church was eminently a national church for that it always concerned itself with national questions, is a claim that may require some qualification. With less scruple, the next claim may justly be allowed that "they had never sought to gather their members out of other churches, but to do their own work." One general rule has been illustrated in Methodism from the very first, and in any of its branches, viz., that if a determined leader or a united community has a sure and unstammering message for the public, a message tolerably consistent in itself, and uttered with the force of conviction, that leader or that community will gain a hearing, more than a hearing, a following. Wesley's steadfast conviction that there were people who, for their very soul's sake, needed to hear what he had to say was justified by his own marvellous success. A similar justification can be made out for the Wesleyan church, and for the Methodist churches that have grown out of the one great movement to which they all trace their origin.

At an enthusiastic meeting of the Wesleyan Conference, when Foreign missions were being discussed, Sir W. H. Stephenson declared that he was not going to leave his money to be quarrelled about after his death, he intended to be his own executor. He followed the declaration with a gift of £500 to the West Indies Fund, an example that was followed by others, and a large sum was promised before the meeting closed. The Rev. Frank Ballard, M.A., well known as a writer of pamphlets and books dealing with modern social and theological problems, was, by resolution, set apart as a lecturer on Christian apologetics under the direction of the Home Mission Committee.

THE enormous sums of money which the Wesleyans are able to deal with may be learned from the speech in which Mr. Perks, M.P., explained to a business meeting of the Conference the state of affairs in regard to the site obtained for their Church House in Westminster. To put it shortly, a site was purchased for £360,000. For land sold from this site £100,000 has already been paid, a second hundred thousand will be paid within a year; and still another plot is expected to reach a third hundred thousand, leaving £60,000 as the net price of a very large and suitable site for the main building, and for whatever subsidiary buildings may be required.

THE Wesleyans, like the rest of us, find that it is easy to denounce a distant wickedness with which we have nothing to do; that it is exceedingly difficult to settle a question that is much smaller, but which happens to affect the very people who are called upon to make the decision. A resolution on the subject of the Congo atrocities makes practically no difficulty. The question of the basis of membership in the Wesleyan Church seems slight: what must a man do or be in order to become or to continue to be a member? But it is a question that goes right back to the origin of Methodism, and thus has historical importance; it is a question that touches the democratic spirit of Methodism, it raises the problem, Are we not all brethren, are we not all to be admitted or excluded on the same terms? And, again, it touches the problem of spiritual and theological progress, and suggests the point, Can we now safely and silently abandon certain theological premises which at one time we all held? A single sentence by an opponent of the new scheme of membership brought to light all these perplexities. "They ought not to admit one person because he said he was a sinner, and another because he was devout!" There is the matter in a nutshell. In the end the question was deferred, and a committee appointed to consider, and to prepare a statement.

At the United Methodist Free Churches Annual Assembly, a resolution was passed thanking Mr. McKenna for having made the Cowper Temple clause effective in the new Code, and for having swept away religious tests for those entering public training colleges. A previous resolution expressed confidence "that nothing will be allowed to interfere with the redemption of the pledge solemnly given by the Prime Minister to introduce into the House of Commons a measure of such a nature as will satisfy the reasonable and just demands of Free Churchmen, being free from all sectarian entanglements, and to leave no effort unused to pass such a measure into law next year." It asked further that the Government would do more to assist in the erection of Council schools, and to secure that insanitary and otherwise unsuitable premises should no longer in deference to sectarian interests be permitted to continue in use.

THE eighth meeting of the Congrès International des Habitations à bon marché (National Housing Congress) will be held in London from August 3 to August 7, at Caxton Hall, Westminster. The subjects to be considered are of the greatest practical importance:—Housing Inspection, Slum Improvement and Slum Destruction, House Building and Management, Housing Finance and Taxation, the Land Question, Town Planning and Building Bye-laws, Transit, and Rural Housing. The Congress will be educational in its character, and no resolutions will be passed committing the members to any policy, but it is likely that the papers contributed by housing experts of six different countries, and the discussion among practical men with so varying opportunities of experience will be of great value. Papers are announced to be read by Dr. Stübgen (Berlin), Dr. Mewes (Düsseldorf), M. Vincent Magaldi (Italy), M. Lucien Ferrand (Paris), M. Ch. de Quéker (Brussels), Professor Maheim (Liège), M. J. H. Faber, M. Tellegen, M. De Man (Netherlands), together with Alderman Thompson (Chairman of the Conference) and Mr. Henry R. Aldridge (secretary). The secretary's address is 432, West Strand, London.

SOME idea of the advantage that may follow a conference of experts on housing and town development from many lands is given by the example of what is being done in many German towns. Since 1875 Prussian municipalities have had power to plan the extensions of their towns, reserving space for parks, open spaces, wide streets, and other public uses. This is done years ahead of any actual building, in the interest of the citizens as a whole. The height of buildings, the areas in which factories, dwelling-houses, &c., may be erected are determined beforehand, and the town may possess as much land as it can find money to purchase without defining the use to which it will be put. Thus, Frankfurt, Ulm, and other cities are large landowners; the citizens, as a whole, own part of the land on which their city is built. There is no confiscation, and landowners do not complain of any hard treatment.

WE are reminded that the work of the Quaker Summer Schools has an important side to which our note last week did not refer. The Friends' Social Union has grown out of a meeting held during the Birmingham summer school of 1899, which initiated a Reading Circle in Economics. This grew into a Union for Social Study, and later, under the secretaryship of Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., into its present larger usefulness. Amongst other activities, this has arranged several most interesting tours for social investigation in other countries. This year a party of thirty-five will visit Belgium on August 3. There is no doubt that the work of the Union has had a considerable influence among the younger members of the Society of Friends, as well as in their adult schools.

SUMMER Conferences for Bible Study and Summer Schools of Theology appear to be growing in popularity, attracting not only clergy and ministers, but large numbers of the laity. A gathering of the former kind was lately concluded at Mundesley-on-Sea. Its inspiring genius, Dr. Campbell Morgan, some of whose utterances we referred to last week, gave a series of expository discourses on the Epistle to the Romans, which he is reported to have described as "a letter not to be put into the hands of an unregenerate man, that by it he may find the way of salvation: it is a letter for the saints." This may be so—but one wonders what Luther would say! Under the auspices of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, a Summer School is to be held at Cambridge from July 29 to August 10. The programme is a full one, including several debatable topics which are bound to be handled with some breadth. For instance, Prof. R. W. Rogers, of Madison, New Jersey, is to deliver four lectures on "The Early Chapters of Genesis"; Prof. A. S. Peake, three on "The Pauline Theology"; and Prof. J. H. Moulton, two on "Zoroaster and the Parsis." Our allies of the New Theology, led by that untiring spirit, Mr. R. J. Campbell, are holding at Penmaenmawr, from August 3 to 9, a separate school of their own. Dr. John Hunter, Dr. Hastings Rashdall, Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, and Dr. K. C. Anderson are amongst those who are to take part. The Christian Doctrine of God, Inspiration, the Atonement, and Social Evolution in the light of the Divine Immanence, are some of the topics to be dealt with, and are proof enough—if any were needed—that the pioneers of the New Theology do not intend to shirk their responsibilities, nor to let their movement languish for lack of enterprise and energy. Free discussion of such vital themes cannot but promote the progress of truth.

ONE topic which will arouse special interest at the Penmaenmawr School is "The Bearing of Progressive Theology on Foreign Missions." The ideas, familiar enough to us, that the Christian scriptures have grown very much as the scriptures of other faiths, and that God is immanent in Christianity very much as He is immanent in other faiths, have struck the newly enlightened with almost revolutionary force. The great missionary movements seem to be threatened. That awful sense of responsibility which men once felt for those outside the Christian pale is diminished. So far as this means the lessening of a burden God never meant them to bear, it is all to the good. But the broad, universal responsibility for the common weal of mankind—this remains, nor can it change with changing theological sanctions. The ultimate inspiration of all the best missionary work ever achieved never was a command imposed from without; it was a passion for mankind burning within. So will it ever be. A more intelligent view of how God works in His world may modify our methods, but, if we truly aspire to be workers together with Him, it cannot diminish our zeal.

THE first annual meeting of the Anti-Sweating League was held at the New Reform Club on July 18. The League sprang up as a result of the Sweated Industries Exhibition, promoted last year by the Daily News, with the purpose of appealing to the State for a minimum wage. A Bill for this purpose, proposing to establish wages boards in the tailoring, dressmaking, and shirt-making trades, was introduced into the House during the present Session by Mr. Arthur Henderson but is among those which were lost amidst the circumlocutions of our cumbrous legislative machine. Branches of the League, whose president is Mr. George Cadbury, have been formed in Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leicester, and other places, and are gradually awakening public opinion by means of exhibitions and lectures.

AN interesting educational experiment, on an approved German model, is now being made under the London County Council. Thanks to the initiative and generosity of the Royal Arsenal (Woolwich) Co-operative Society, which has placed twenty acres of beautifully wooded land at Bostall at the disposal of the County Council free of charge for this purpose, an open-air school for a hundred children is being inaugurated. The children chosen will be those whose health is likely to be benefited by the experiment.

THE Unemployed Workmen's Bill is described by its introducer, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, as an educational measure. It is not intended merely to tide the workman over a temporary misfortune, but to attack the problem of unemployment at its root. The chief cause he supposes to be the lack of fluidity in Labour, its slowness of response to changes in demand; and his Bill is, therefore, an attempt to remedy this by training the unemployed labourer, where necessary, and introducing him into some avenue towards independence. This it would effect by (1) registration of the unemployed, (2) creation of the necessary employment organisations, (3) provisions for their finance, and (4) the compulsory employment of the loafer.

THE Methodists, as a whole, seem to have passed through a period of depression during the last year. The Recorder recently showed that the Wesleyan Methodists had sustained serious losses in members, juniors, and probationers. It now appears that the Bible Christian section has also to report a similar decline in the number of full members, juvenile members, and members on trial, and, as might be expected, therefore, a decline in the number of Sunday-school workers and local preachers. The writer who summarises the position in the Free Methodist says: "It is significant that we are not alone. We stand with our sister churches entering the Union; each reports a decrease on the home stations. Like our friends, we have an increase in China, the exact figures of which are not to hand. Our total will thus be in advance, but not on the home ground."

Men ask for a more assured faith and a new baptism of the Spirit, that the Churches may be once more alive with redeeming and quickening power. And herein the way is made clear to them and to us all, amid common human needs, and the appeals of a true manhood, in the earnest doing of justice, in efforts of amelioration and reform, and of helpful, brotherly kindness to realise the common good.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

MEMORIES AND IMPRESSIONS OF THE OXFORD WEEK.

I.

THE echoes of familiar voices of professors and students had hardly died away, at the end of the Summer term, when the halls of our College were surprised by new and other sounds. One had seen the dispersion of a small body of men, bound together by ties of intimate friendship, similar aims, similar occupations; a few quiet days had passed, and now, within these same walls, was a larger number of men and women of apparently divergent aims and different occupations—a “scratch lot” they had been called. What did they seek in common, or from one another? Five short days were to show that they too might be bound, linked, welded together, to go forth in the end, one in sympathy, in friendship, each with clearer outlook, wider horizon.

Every number is both large and small; and, though our Editor, with a vision of what might be, has said that our number was not great, yet to some of us who had hopefully looked for fifty, a membership of seventy-five, with occasional augmentation from the Oxford public, was more than satisfactory.

It was a new venture; we had staked much upon it; how would it go? But our anxiety was removed when the Principal, with his sincere and gracious words, had bade us welcome, our President had spoken for us in response, and in the religious service the work of the week was dedicated to the Highest.

And what more fitting for our opening lecture than the speech in memory of our late secretary? There were some present who had been his personal friends; others among us had not known that privilege; but surely we felt his spirit among us as his comrade spoke, and came to know more clearly the real self which would live on in us who continue his work. We “saw him as he left us”; and the writer, upon whose shoulders his mantle has fallen, would fain hope for a “double portion of his spirit,” that he might help, in some way, the work which the Union has set itself to do.

And then, with minds filled with the thought of that life given for others, did we all put our hands to the work, some to impart and some—nay all—to receive.

What was said in the lectures and in the discussions which followed has been already reported in these columns: a fuller report might speak of further discussions on the river, as we sheltered from the rain beneath the trees, or, in brighter weather, watched the moving panorama from the deck of the river steamer, on our way to Nuneham and its sylvan beauty, or wandered through college “quads” and gardens, or again as we sat with the earnest students at Ruskin Hall, partaking of the tea so generously provided. But no report can tell adequately of the deepening sense of comradeship, of the growing recognition of the noble purpose and grand possibilities of our union.

Some of our lecturers had told us of what is being and has been done to meet the demands of an evolving State, to solve its difficulties and remove its hindrances; all had spoken of the need for social service; but when at the close of our meeting we came to ask ourselves, “what can we do?” we were surprised into recognition of the broad field that is ripe unto harvest and awaits our reapers: we felt then, more than at any time, that we spoke as one—we were a Union for Social Service.

And among these members from so many different occupations, each from his or her own sphere of social work, what had united us?

Let us answer, first, the genial spirit and masterly leadership of our President; and, secondly, the fact that the members were workers leaving active service among their fellows for brief rest and the refreshment of intercourse with brother workers; but, above all, men and women who sought the true principles for action—a wise working basis for their labours. The note rang clear again and again throughout the week—the fearless search for true principles of reform; no idle conformity to the “creed” of sect or party, no revolutionary declamation; but, as in our religion, so also in our economics and social reform, the free search for the highest and the firm determination to apply, here and now, to the world as it is, the truth which has been granted to us.

It has been said of our Union that it is not practical. Let the saying be heard no more. For, apart from the fact that the educative work which the Union seeks to perform is essentially practical, this summer week has raised the efficiency of all who were present, and each member has returned to his sphere of labour encouraged and gladdened, more eager and more able to fulfil his part as a fellow worker with God.

JOHN C. BALLANTYNE.

II.

The following notes are by one of the lady members of the Union, who is a Guardian of the Poor in the Manchester district:—

I am sure we shall all agree that the gathering was successful in the best sense, in that we gained the inspiration that we needed for our work. To me it has been one of the experiences that count for a good deal in a lifetime.

Probably many besides myself had gone to the Conference with a feeling that it was our duty to study the problems of sweated industries, gambling, intemperance, bad housing, &c., but that we were likely to find it depressing. We found it quite the reverse. One strong note of the Conference from beginning to end was hopefulness. It was not that evils were minimised or glossed over. We looked facts full in the face, but the lecturers one after another impressed us with the conviction that it did not pass the wit of man to find the right remedies. Those who were not present can hardly realise the intensity of interest and the zest with which we entered into the subjects brought before us. We seemed to be at the meeting-point of two strong currents, the religious movement and the labour movement, both impelling us towards better social service. On the one hand, our own personal religion was strengthened by all that Manchester College has to give, through its sacred associations, its beauty, and its dedication to a free and reverent search for truth wherever that may lead us. The best that was in us was strengthened by the chapel services, and not least by the first one of all, when Mr. Lloyd Thomas roused us to “be of good courage and play the men for our people and for the cities of our God.”

As one of those who have been sorry that the religious movement towards social reform should apparently be divided by sectarian differences, and that the various church organisations are forming their separate unions for social service, I should like to bear my testimony to the power gained by concentrating our forces. Though outwardly strangers to one another, the members of the National Conference were already more closely united than many acquaintances. We had not to explain our point of view to each other. We could talk openly, knowing that the words we used would be understood in the sense we intended. We belonged to the same household of faith, and had the homelike feeling of being in harmony with our environment. At the same time we were not conscious of narrowness. The Ruskin College students, belonging to various denominations, or to none, did not seem to feel themselves out of harmony with the spirit of the meetings, and why should they? We were in Oxford for a common purpose—to study carefully the social problems of modern civilisation, so that we could better undertake definite practical work towards their solution.

It seemed just the best way to find solutions for our difficulties, that we should all meet together and think together in this way. We were not capitalists and labourers, but men and women, trying to learn how to act best for the common good. Mr. Lees Smith told us of one of the Ruskin College students of whom his fellow workmen complained on his return that he had become so “jolly cautious what he said,” and I have great sympathy with that man. I think many of us who feel in the current of a strong reforming movement of our time realise all the more our need to stop and think.

I hope the committee feel assured that they have met a real need by this summer meeting. Nothing else could have helped us in the same way. Philanthropic societies are apt to harrow our feelings by stories of suffering to such an extent that we are really thankful when the time comes when we can relieve them by putting into a collection, or becoming a subscriber, though we know in our hearts that these evils are not cured by subscription lists. Poor Law conferences make us realise how lifeless laws are, and how much we must trust to good administration, and then have as few laws to hamper us as possible. Charity Organisation Society conferences often succeed only in impressing more strongly upon us the painful fact that it is not enough to be well meaning, and so they paralyse our energy at its strongest source. We become afraid of moving in any direction, lest our actions should have some harmful effect that we never meant. The churches may, and often do, fire us with zeal for social service, but then leave us to learn alone the second and more difficult lesson of applied Christianity. In many things, I know, we must find out for ourselves how to live our religion, but in public work it is surely best not to teach ourselves by trying experiments, if there is experienced knowledge available to guide us.

At Oxford we were given that guidance by experts in philanthropic work, who were, nevertheless, not dogmatic about the remedies they suggested. It was delightful for once to be in an atmosphere of social service where there were no "undeserving," or "unhelpable cases," and no limits to our possibilities of doing good. Our feelings were not unnecessarily harrowed, but our knowledge of the suffering caused by social evils was almost entirely taken for granted, and so also was our longing to relieve it. We were at the second stage of patiently collecting facts and searching for causes of the evils, and then learning how to apply remedies.

Many of us who were at this summer meeting said that no following ones could be so good, because they would miss the first flush of enthusiasm; but in one respect they can be equally good or better. During the coming year we can study these subjects, and come to the meetings with more knowledge, ready to do our part in throwing light upon them.

I have returned home with many vague impressions; but I see now, more definitely than I ever saw it before, how close the connection is between religion and social life. "History is poetry if we can tell it aright," and we found at Oxford that economic science also is poetry when interpreted with deep insight

III.

Another lady member writes:—

The value to me personally of those five days of interchange of thought, of varied experiences, of delightful discussions, and of kindly fellowship in worship and in pure social enjoyment, has been enormous. And the remembrance of those days and the kindness and help I received from all the members have created a new and very stimulating interest in my life in this little out-of-the-way corner of the world. The promoters of this Conference are to be heartily congratulated on its great success, which augurs well for future gatherings.

IV.

The Rev. E. A. Voysey, of Northampton, writes:—There was an indefinable something about the meetings which to my own mind has made them quite unique. More perhaps than the personality of those who spoke to us, it was the extreme interest in the subjects themselves which aroused such tremendous enthusiasm. So often it has happened at conferences that papers have been read, able and interesting, which have elicited the usual expressions of appreciation, and yet, when they were over, they would leave no permanent impression nor stir up any enthusiasm to do anything. Not so with the addresses we listened to on social problems. We had strong meat all the time, but never once did any one seem oppressed with the diet; on the contrary, there was a vivacity and freshness, a spirit of cheerfulness and goodwill about our meetings which is seldom evoked. The reason for this was not only the great ability of those who addressed us, but the practical nature of the subjects before us, which made everyone feel that there was something waiting to be done, which called upon each one then and there to lend a hand. As far as our Northampton folk were concerned they all with one accord said they had never spent such a good time, and the effect of those meetings will not be spent for many a long day. Everyone who missed going to the meetings has lost something very precious, something that may never come again, and yet perhaps our next meetings may be still more inspiring.

V.

The formation of a Union for Social Service at the last Triennial Conference was a matter for rejoicing among our churches. It removed a reproach which many of us keenly felt that we of all religious bodies should be lacking in an organised effort to understand the social environment.

Why should we not link the study of social questions with our church organisations? The entrance of organised religion into social life is no new thing with us, as witness the Domestic Missions, which originated out of a growing sense of social responsibility on the part of our churches. Noble, indeed, are their aims and splendid the devotion of their workers. Yet their work does not exhaust the claim of society on the Church, nor does it meet the urgent task of the day. Dealing mainly with effects, the débris of our social organism, it is above all an effort of compassion to relieve immediate distress. It does not attempt to grapple with the problem why this social wastage and how can it be arrested—a problem which the sufferers are themselves forcing to the front, and which can no longer be ignored by any branch of the Christian Church. We are said to have led the way in proclaiming the supreme value of reason in religion. Should we not be equally active in the application of reason to redemptive work? Are we to rest content with palliatives and neglect to take our share in the obtaining of "clear light upon the broad principles of social well-being"? Our Union for Social Service is the reply, and the first summer meeting in Oxford is the beginning, one hopes, of more vigorous social service among our Free Churches.

It was a valuable week; illuminating, suggestive, and inspiring. The cautious and critical attack on all questions considered, in which our President led the way, should have convinced the most timid constitutionalist that the Union would only serve to promote calm and deliberate judgment. It was good to come in contact with expert social reformers like Miss Clementina Black, Mr. Seebohm Rountree, and feel the passion for social justice which guides their investigations.

The one outstanding impression I received from the Conference was a deepened conviction of the awful truth the words of Hosea contain for us to-day:—"My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." "Ignorance that may be felt but that may by honest effort be destroyed is the cause of many more of our troubles than we like to admit." The vast public are unconscious of the extent of the suffering which exists; the growing army of social workers lack the vital knowledge to cure our social diseases. And so reform halts and the churches stand impotent in face of the merciless economic forces that devastate our land. The failure of our Free Churches to reach the people is due in a large measure to economic reasons. What time or interest have the millions who are below the "Poverty line" for religious truth? And the hold of the many above that fatal line on a living wage is so precarious that the one supreme question for them is social reform. This was vividly illustrated at our Conference by the presence of students from Ruskin College. They were representatives of the "governing classes" gathered in Oxford to study the structure and problems of the society their votes control. Some came up on their hard-earned savings, some were sent by great trade unions, others had won scholarships—in one case provided by an enlightened County Council. The men were up for serious study, and return after a year's residence to their former occupation, with not only a store of knowledge, but some reasoned judgments which would save them from the quack remedies of the demagogue and give them power to lead their comrades.

A visit to the College—housed in some unpretentious buildings in Walton-street—confirmed the excellent impression which the description of the institution by Mr. Lees Smith and Mr. Wilson created at our Tuesday meeting. Besides influencing the resident students the College, through an admirably organised correspondence school, reaches thousands, who otherwise could not benefit by its instruction. By this postal method most of the subjects taught at the College may be studied at home. The syllabus prepared for each course specifies the chief authorities to be read, and the monthly essay tests the formation of opinion as well as the acquisition of fact. Valuable work has been done through this school on questions of the day. Special courses have been drawn up on the Education Bill and Tariff Reform, which take the student through the best accounts on both sides of these controversies, leaving him to draw his own conclusions; the corrections of the expert in the essay are confined to matters of statement. Here is the very principle of Manchester College applied to the study of social questions, and one could not help wondering whether the elder college might not adopt with advantage this correspondence idea for the advancement of theological study. The College premises and the splendid library are surely available for more use than the regular work entails. With an expert theologian, and one could easily name several in the ministry well qualified for the post, at its head, such a theological correspondence school, conducted for the impartial study of theology, might do immense service in this time of religious unrest, and win an influence for Manchester College which its supporters have long desired. The experiment would not be costly, and, if it were, it would be worth making in the face of such a great opportunity—over 7,000 students have corresponded with Ruskin College. This, however, by the way. The success of Ruskin College is a hopeful sign of the times. It is encouraging to think that organised labour feels the need of knowledge, and is willing to make sacrifices to help in the removal of the dense ignorance that hinders all reform. When working men, mainly, alas, outside all churches, realise that for want of knowledge the people perish, is it not time that the Churches awoke to the same grim fact? One way lies through our Union for Social Service, and it is to be sincerely hoped that the stimulus of the Oxford meetings will result in the formation of social service committees and kindred societies in connection with all our churches.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

DURING the holiday season there is a welcome respite from new books. The flood abates into a gentle trickle, and we have time to ask ourselves what after all is worth reading. There has never been a time when literary taste and genuine literary pleasure were in such peril of suffocation. The great still books, as Tennyson calls them somewhere, lie neglected and almost forgotten in the crowd of competitors which have the commonplace faculty of making a noise.

* * *

Holidays are our salvation in reading, as in many other things. It is good to retire even for a few days from the bustle and the crowd, and to realise that talk has its limitations, that meetings and congresses do not count for righteousness, that souls are not saved by the mechanism of international demonstrations, and that the "greatest book of the season" is probably trash.

* * *

Literature and religion have a common foe. He is very specious in his wiles and an adept in the art of worldly wisdom. He always has the public in his eye. He booms his favourite preacher till all the oratory of the ages becomes halting and dull in comparison. He advertises his friend's book in sounding periods of senseless praise, till we begin to wonder whether anyone has wielded a skilful pen before. He cares more for impressionism than for truth. He values shallow phrases above calm insight and just judgment. His name is the professional journalist—of a certain type, which requires no further definition. The species is well known.

* * *

Mr. Lever's successful libel action against the Daily Mail has a moral far beyond the commercial interests involved. It is a magnificent blow struck against the yellow peril in contemporary journalism, and it is well to remember that the sins of the yellow press are not confined to baseless detraction. They are equally evident sometimes in false praise and unscrupulous adulation. It is this kind of falsehood which insinuates itself into literary criticism and religious journalism. Much is forgiven to it, because it sounds so pleasant, and it has this dangerous advantage, that it is without the salutary check of actions for libel. The law permits wilful lies of commendation to any extent, not always for our good.

The Editor of the Manchester Guardian deserves cordial thanks for his clear and forcible comments upon the issues involved in the Lever case as they affect the public good. "Newspaper personalities matter nothing to the public," he says, "but the general character of newspaper work matters very much indeed. . . . The case was not concerned with the motives of attack so much as with the falsehoods by which it was supported."

"The main interest of the case," the article continues, "consists in this, that it is only an example of methods that are applied to other things besides soap. The journalistic principle of these papers, apparently, is first to settle what 'line' you will take, and then to 'work up' feeling recklessly and unscrupulously. The choice of the 'line' is in the main honest; the 'working up' of public feeling as a rule is not, because the theory is that the readers are not sufficiently intelligent to be interested in truth when truth happens to be sober or unsensational. When these methods are applied to soap the misstatements can be checked and rectified in a court of justice. But they may also be employed to sow national hatred or to bring about a war, and then there is no court of justice to repair the mischief." We have only to add, "to distort public imagination or corrupt literary feeling," to make these remarks applicable to all the popular literary organs which concern themselves with the criticism of books and opinions.

* * *

The Manchester Guardian goes straight to the root of the matter when it says: "The whole mischief arises out of a cynical and contemptuous view of the reader's intelligence, whereas the whole good of newspaper writing, the whole service that it can do to the cause of democracy, depend on mutual respect and on perfect honesty on both sides—honesty not merely with regard to the end, but with regard to the arguments and facts that are used to support it."

* * *

Meanwhile we can only congratulate all good men and good books who escape the penalty of false praise. Time alone is the perfect critic; but our seasons of quietness, with wide horizons and the tolerance of God's sunshine and open air for our companions, make us better critics than we are. They woo us from false fashions in reading as in so many other things, and open the way for the return of the literary prodigal to the loyalties of taste and feeling, which the booming journalist with his noisy and insincere methods has done his best to destroy.

PROSPERITY UNDER THE MICROSCOPE.*

THIS book is dedicated to Charles Booth, and is worthy of its dedication. It is the result of nearly thirty years of patient and sympathetic observation of the conditions and habits of daily life among the iron-workers at Middlesbrough on the Tees. It is a book of facts, written in a broad and generous spirit, and marked by a fine restraint and freedom from exaggeration. Lady Bell has attempted to "visualise" an important item of modern commerce—to show what a trade may be in reality, "when translated into terms of human beings." People who believe that deterioration lessens as prosperity increases will find, if they will study these pages, that experience brings with it painful surprises. Yet the authoress makes no sensational appeals to the imagination, no sweeping assertions, no startling array of statistics. "I have tried in this book to put a piece of prosperity under the microscope. That which is revealed in any field of vision is obviously that which is really there, although, when using our ordinary defective methods of observation we may not see it. But it is there all the same. I have tried to consider, not in general the lot of thousands, but in detail the lives of some of the individuals who compose those thousands; for it is detail that is really convincing, that brings the vivid flash of realisation and misgiving." It is this minute examination which stamps the value of the book.

The reader is introduced to a town seething with humanity, and apparently filled with prosperity. But it presents strange contrasts. Situated some six miles north of the lovely Yorkshire moors, the town itself is void of loveliness, natural or artificial. The land runs fire, not water; the men stack hot iron, not corn; the children, with imminent peril to life and limb, play on slag tips, not verdant hill-sides or sweetly-scented hayfields. This Parliamentary borough of more than 116,000 souls does not possess a picture gallery, "indeed, there is not a picture anywhere that the ordinary public can go to see." To thus ignore the æsthetic needs of a whole colony of human beings is bad, but we only see how serious the matter is when we find that the town has been designed for working hours and not for leisure; that more than half of the inhabited streets may be termed "mean"; that therefore many men cannot invite a fellow workman to spend an hour with them at home, where there would be neither room nor privacy, but are, perforce, driven to the public-house for social satisfaction, and bad habits are bred in an atmosphere of spiritual apathy and materialism. The comparative absence of wholesome means of recreation leads to the stronger influence of drink and gambling, and evidences of the prevalence of the latter vice and its effects are abundantly given. Unless healthy recreation is provided for man and youth, woman and maid, the result must be disastrous, and the writer sums up one section of her observations as follows—"As a rule, I fear it is uncontrollable that most of the children who are playing about the streets of Middlesbrough are destined to grow up into a generation which will bring down the average of the deserving and efficient. This immense population of workers is growing up among physical and moral influences which are bound to be unfavourable."

Thrift and improvidence are ably dealt with, and a number of domestic budgets disclose the narrow margin there is for error and waste; it is this narrow margin which makes the moral law press so heavily on the poor. The most important chapters are those dealing with the wives and daughters of the iron-workers.

The book contains several prints illustrating the nature of the industry. Serious students of social problems will find in it much food for reflection, for it forces upon one the conclusion that the social problem is in the main a moral problem, and calls for a moral solution; it leaves a distinct impression that the curse of the poor is far less their poverty than that fatal ignorance which is too often its counterpart. We hope that the writer will find time to write a series of essays on the cure of some of the evils she has so admirably portrayed.

A LAYMAN ON PAUL.*

It is not so very long ago that the English reader who wished to get an insight into the secrets of Paul's mind and to understand his thought along the lines of its growth rather than as forced into a previously contrived dogmatic scheme, had little choice but to resort to Pfeiderer. It was not a bad compulsory choice, but still it was only Hobson's. The last few years have altered all that. In rapid succession the Theological Translation Library has presented us with Weizsäcker, and Wernle and Weinel, from the German and Swiss laboratories, France has offered Sabatier in an English dress, and America has sent us Cone, to mention no others. In all these the interest is historical, biographical, psychological; the religious thought and ideas of Paul are seen in their genesis, development, and working. But there was room for another book, which, by means of an attractive style and clearness of presentation, should offer in modest compass to the non-professional reader the leading results of the modern scientific study of Paul's life in its chief crises, and of his thought in its salient and determining features. This gap has been excellently filled by a cultured American layman, of (we believe) the Unitarian household of faith. Mr. Hall's work is based throughout upon the best authorities. He has made diligent use of the works of Pfeiderer, Holtzmann, Harnack, Weizsäcker, Weber, Kabisch, Von Soden, Schürer, and quotes Renan, Gunkel, Thackeray, Wernle, and even Cumont. But he has carefully studied for himself the original sources as ordinarily accessible, and exercises an independent and sober judgment. In some two hundred liberally spaced pages he deals with his subject in five chapters, bearing the headings:—

I. The Convert; II. The Missionary; III. Jew and Gentile; IV. The Mystic; V. The Theologian.

To explain the Convert in Chapter I., the writer leaves the uncertain and conflicting traditions of Acts aside, and, noting Paul's own expression for the crucial event of his life as that of the revelation of God's Son in him, seeks in the Apostle's previous life something that might explain how any "vision" could have so transformed him as this one did. Messianic expectations were then general among the Jews, and took many forms. Not a few, building on the Jewish theology which peopled the heavenly spheres with countless ranks of angelic natures, "gods many and lords many," conceived the Messiah as an exalted being, existing in heavenly regions from the beginning, to descend in due time among men, and fulfil the Divine scheme of regeneration. Here is the background of expectation into which the figure of the risen Jesus, whom the disciples asserted to have vanquished death, would fit as realisation and verification.

The next chapter shows how the missionary was urged on in his tireless task by the expectation of the Second Coming, and brings out both the clear features and the obscurities of the passages in 1 and 2 Thessalonians, which deal most explicitly with this event. Here one misses references to the works of Gunkel and Bousset, as well as of Professor Charles on this subject, and the only conjecture mentioned as to the person of "the Man of Sin" and "the lawless one" in 2 Thessalonians is that it may be Nero (which is impossible if 2 Thessalonians is genuine, as the author inclines to believe), combined with Hitzig's fancy that the words "he who restrains" represent a punning and concealed allusion to Claudius (ὁ κατέχων = qui claudit)! Given the genuineness of the Epistle, "that which restrains" and "the restrainer" will be the Roman power and the Emperor, for the time being representing it, and "the Man of Sin" or Antichrist (though the name is not used), must be thought of as to appear within Judaism, as Weiss, Bousset, and Moffatt maintain. To illustrate "the Missionary" as guide and mentor of his new communities, an explanatory analysis of 1 Corinthians i.-xiv. is given (pp. 52-82). The result justifies the space allotted to this object.

In the chapter on Jew and Gentile the author insists that the separation of church from synagogue was a very gradual affair, and took place at no assignable time, and also that Paul remained in blood and texture a Jew, with Jewish sympathies and pieties clinging to him till the end.

We can refer only very briefly to the two last chapters on the Mystic and the Theologian. The progress of the mystic conceptions found in the Epistles is traced in broad outline that never loses itself in detail from 1 Corinthians to Ephesians, which, after the elimination of some glosses, the author regards, with Colossians, as genuine. With the exegesis adopted we find no serious fault. It is properly assumed that Paul brought a good deal of mystic thought with him to Christianity. We are half invited to look on Paul as the first arch-heretic and the real father of Docetism in applying to Jesus Christ the expressions "in the likeness of sinful flesh"; "made in the likeness of men"; "found in fashion as a man." On the other hand, Paul certainly held that Jesus suffered, and may therefore claim to be acquitted on this grave charge. With the author's contention that Paul the Theologian is best not systematised we are in hearty accord. His literary remains, even when Romans is taken into account, are too fragmentary and occasional. The man is more attractive when he does not appear in the rôle of a walking system of dogmatic theology. Nor must he be forcibly modernised. "It is not twentieth century religion that we are to seek in these pages, but first century religion," says our author. They who wish for an attractive introduction to this quest might do much worse than take the hand of Mr. Hall. A London publisher, however, is not given.

PH. MOORE.

"FOR one who has never yet come under the spell of Wordsworth," said the Athenæum last Saturday, "no fitter pass key could be imagined than is found in Poems by William Wordsworth, selected with an introduction by Stopford A. Brooke, with illustrations by Edmund H. New (Methuen & Co.). Mr. Brooke's eloquent pages dwell on the poet's life at Grasmere, the effects of the scenery on his genius and moral being, and his interpretation of that scenery and those effects in his verse. . . . Rather more than two-thirds of the space are devoted to the poems of 1798-1807—not that Wordsworth's later verse is thinsown with profit or delight, but simply because it is mostly inspired by scenes outside the Lake Country, and thus falls outside the purpose of this volume, in which letterpress and drawings are mutually illustrative. The latter, done with pen and ink, are on the whole successful in suggesting that spiritual essence of the landscape which it was Wordsworth's constant endeavour to catch and express in his verse." A notice of this book appeared in THE INQUIRER of July 13.

ON Wednesday, July 17, at the Southwark Cathedral, Mr. Whitelaw Reid, the American Ambassador, acting on behalf of a number of Harvard graduates, handed over the restored chapel of St. John's to the Cathedral authorities, as a memorial of John Harvard, who was baptized there, November 29, 1607. A memorial window was placed in the chapel last year by Mr. Choate, and other Harvard graduates then took up the matter of this extended memorial. The congregation assembled in the cathedral and passed to the chapel, singing, "O God, our help in ages past," and the Bishop of Southwark then dedicated the chapel, which he hoped, he said, Americans would feel to be peculiarly their own for any special service they might wish to hold in London. It would always be known as the "Harvard Chapel."

LONDON, JULY 27, 1907.

TURNING WESTWARD.

Two months hence will be the week of the International Congress of Religious Liberals in Boston, Mass., the fourth biennial meeting of the "International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers." Thus the Council returns to hold this Congress in the city of its birth, for it was in Boston, on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, in the Whit-week of 1900, that it was established. London 1901, Amsterdam 1903, Geneva 1905, are the three meetings which have so far been held, and now comes the fourth, Boston 1907. "To open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation amongst them," is the central aim of the International Council, and the three published volumes of the Proceedings of the meetings in London, Amsterdam, and Geneva remain as witnesses to the abundant measure of success already achieved. In London, the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER was president, and the Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE the preacher. At Amsterdam, Professor H. OORT, of Leiden, was president, and the Rev. J. VAN LOENEN MARTINET the preacher. At Geneva Professor EDOUARD MONTET was president, while in the Cathedral, from the pulpit of JOHN CALVIN, three sermons were preached in French, German, and English respectively, by the Rev. E. ROBERTY, of Paris, Professor K. FURER, of Zürich, and Dr. M. J. SAVAGE, of New York.

Over the Boston meetings Dr. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, President of the American Unitarian Association, is to preside, and the Congress sermon is to be preached in the Arlington-street Church by the Rev. Dr. JOHN HUNTER, of Glasgow. Arlington-street is the present representative of the old Federal-street chapel, the scene for so many years of the ministry of Dr. CHANNING, and of his co-pastor and successor, Dr. EZRA STILES GANNETT. The close of Dr. GANNETT'S ministry was in Arlington-street, where also Dr. BROOKE HERFORD preached for the ten years he spent in Boston. There could, therefore, be no more fitting place of meeting for the chief religious service of the Congress, enriched as this church is by so many sacred memories, and the great tradition of religious freedom and a pure, spiritual faith, in which the name of CHANNING stands pre-eminent. In King's Chapel, which also has its memories of liberation and a broadening faith, there is to be morning prayer each day, during the regular sessions of the Congress, and Thursday is designated as "Cambridge Day," when the sessions will be held at Harvard University, and a welcome will be given by the President, Dr. CHARLES W. ELIOT (father of Dr. S. A. ELIOT), and Professor FRANCIS G. PEABODY. The completed programme of the Congress is promised us early in August, but we know already that it includes a visit to Plymouth, with the Church of the Pilgrim Fathers, and to Concord, the home of EMERSON. The thought of these places of pilgrimage, with all that Boston means for all friends of the Liberal Faith, make us glad indeed to turn our faces westward, in happy anticipation of what the coming international gathering will bring to us.

Of the city of Boston Miss HELEN HERFORD completes her pleasant account this week, and in another column there will also be found some notes from an article on "Outdoor Boston," by Dr. CROTHERS, in the current number of the Century Magazine. Mr. FREESTON has already written for us about Plymouth and the Pilgrims, and ROGER WILLIAMS and Rhode Island. What more it may be possible to say during the holiday season in anticipation of the many interests of the International, we do not venture to predict, but we try to concentrate our thoughts on New England, and would gladly realise the home feeling there, which would not be possible in Chicago or New York. To think of America, as a whole, in connection with this visit to Boston for the Congress, we remind ourselves, would be much as if one should think of Europe, in connection with those other meetings at Amsterdam or at Geneva. Representatives of many lands and of farthest continents have met together at each Congress, and so it doubtless will be also at Boston; but for ourselves, we feel that our visit is to New England, and in close contact with its present life and in communion with its great memories we expect our chief delight. There will be the opportunity of seeing the homes of CHANNING and EMERSON and PARKER, of the LONGFELLOWS and LOWELL, of seeing also the WHITTIER country, and reviving memories of LLOYD GARRISON and other heroes of the "martyr age," and of later struggles in the cause of freedom, progress, and humanity. We shall doubtless be quickened by contact with the life of the Greater America, and it is a pleasant incident in the occasion of this Congress that some of our friends will be able to pay a visit of comradeship to the Unitarian churches in Canada. But it is to New England that we go, and in Boston we are all to meet. We expect to learn many things, and to rejoice once more in the sense of a world-wide fellowship devoted to the cause of "pure religion and perfect liberty"; but we expect also with a great delight to be at home, among our own kindred, and to realise it as it only can be realised when we cross the ocean, and find that it is the same life throbbing there, the same faith, the same love, nurtured through generations of earnest service, through which we may stand together, and work together, with a new strength and gladness, for the wider welfare of the world.

BOSTON INTERNATIONAL MEETINGS.

LIST OF SAILINGS.

NOT only those who are themselves going to Boston for the International Congress of Religious Liberals, but many of their friends on both sides of the Atlantic, will be glad to have the following list, giving dates of departure (chiefly from Liverpool) and port of arrival of ministers, delegates, and visitors. It will be seen from this list that the various sailings cover a considerable time, and there is no danger of the company of heretics all going down in one boat, as was at one time anticipated by some of our well-wishers. A MORNING'S STROLL ABOUT BOSTON.

STEAMING up Boston harbour, the voyager sees the buildings of the city rising amphitheatre wise from the shore, mingling with the great elms of the Common and capped by the massive structure of the State House with its big gold dome. It is a fine landmark, glistening up there in the clear sunshiny air. "Sticks up just like a great sore thumb!" was the way a fellow traveller of mine put it once, as we stood gazing at the fast approaching shore from the ship's side. But he was a Chicagoan, and perhaps a little envy lent sharpness to his tongue.

The wharves and docks of a city are not apt to be its most picturesque adjunct, and on this part of Boston the traveller is glad to turn his back as soon as he can escape the clutches of the Custom House officers. A good deal of patience is needed, by the way, on the part of the free trading Briton before he has done with these gentlemen, and has answered the lengthy and searching examination paper set by "Uncle Sam" for all visitors who enter his ports. Safely through this ordeal, the traveller has to decide how best to reach his hotel, which, we will say, for instance, is the Parker House. If he is rolling in wealth he can take a hack, a sort of glorified cab with two horses, much like a mourning carriage in a "reformed funeral" procession, and be driven away in expensive splendour; or he can take the more usual course of sending his baggage by one of the agents of the Express Company, of which there will be plenty about the docks, and then be free to betake himself on to Boston proper by means of the East Boston Tunnel and an electric tram, which latter will whirl him to within a very short distance of School-street, where is the hotel above mentioned.

For the present purpose I take it for granted that the traveller is a good Unitarian, bound for the International Conference, and that one of the first things he will want to do is to visit the American headquarters of his own household of faith. He will, therefore, be pleased to find how near he is to the American Unitarian Association building, No. 25, Beacon-street.

Situated at the business end of the most aristocratic and historically interesting street of the city, it is of the architectural style known to Bostonians as Romanesque. It is built of a yellowish brown stone, and stands solid and square at the top of a broad flight of steps. Against the deep blue of an American summer sky, its flat roof and yellow brown walls stand out in sharp and beautiful relief.

Inside, it is commodious and handsomely appointed for the purposes of the Association and the many kindred denominational societies, social, charitable, and religious, which have their homes there—homes, be it noted, given rent free by a generous Association!

The inquiring Unitarian from England will find one or two other differences in the conduct of the American Association from that with which he is familiar in Essex-street, Strand. For instance, not only the secretary, but also the president and treasurer, are permanent, salaried officials, while the Association is governed by a "Board of Directors" in place of the committee over here. Besides the offices of the Association itself, there are a number of committee rooms and a library, reading-room, and at the top of the building a large hall for meetings, called Channing Hall.

Among the various societies and organisations which have their headquarters here is one which should be of special interest to the feminine members of the Conference. "The National Alliance of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women", is its imposing name, and its object, as stated in its preamble, is no less so, being "Primarily to quicken the religious life of our Unitarian Churches, and to bring the women of the denomination into closer acquaintance, co-operation and fellowship," while on its executive board may be found representatives from nearly every State in the Union, from Rhode Island to California.

Having thus done his duty by his denomination, the traveller will want to see something else of Boston. Over against the Association building he will find the Athenæum, an institution of which all Bostonians are proud. It was founded over a hundred years ago as a small literary club, which, after a while, established a reading club. It now houses in a stately building some 210,000 books and many precious art treasures, and is a very fine library. Though its regular use is confined to shareholders, great courtesy is shown to strangers and the shelves freely placed at their disposal. It is the most delightful place for a quiet hour among the books in its beautiful reading-room overlooking the old Granary graveyard, with its quaint tombs and monuments and shady trees.

Standing at the top of Beacon-street, but a little way from the Athenæum is the State House, and on the other side of the street lies the famous Common. One might almost imagine himself in Piccadilly, with Devonshire House in the place of the Capitol, and the Green Park instead of the Common. Between them the broad, handsome street descends towards Charles-street and the Back Bay and the Public Garden, while behind the State House and Beacon-street is a whole district of quaint, old-fashioned squares and narrow streets, brick-paved and cobble-stoned, climbing over the old Beacon Hill or running down its westward slopes to the Charles River below. The houses of these streets are nearly all bow-windowed, as if stretching out their necks to catch glimpses of the lovely sunset glow to be seen across the reaches of the river.

At the foot of the hill, on Beacon-street there is the Public Garden, a very beautiful pleasure ground indeed; and on the other side, at right angles with Beacon-street, is Arlington-street, from which stretches Commonwealth-avenue, while at the further end is Arlington-street Church (the successor to the Federal-street Chapel, where Channing preached). The Londoner will surely bethink himself of St. Martin's-in-the-Field when he sees this church, so oddly alike are they, except for the absence, on the American building, of the portico which adorns the church in Trafalgar-square. Most likely some of the Conference meetings will take place here, and visitors will see the beautiful doorway of carved marble, put up in memory of its former minister, Dr. Herford, and admire the fine series of painted windows which have replaced the plain glass of earlier Puritanical days.

Broad and well laid out are all the streets in the Back Bay district, and all of the houses are large and some imposing. There is not the colour produced by our London window boxes of flowers, but, instead, over nearly all is the beautiful Japanese ivy, the ampelopsis, turning so red in the autumn, and growing so fast, that by September it may be seen covering the steps and doorways, even, of houses, the owners of which, in common with the majority of the well-to-do citizens, have deserted, for the summer months, the town in search of seashore or country air. Some way down one of these streets is the present habitation of that "First Church in Boston" whose earliest meeting place was under a tree, and its first minister the English colonist, John Wilson. What a contrast is this beautiful Gothic building to the first one of mud and thatch, or even its square brick successor, the first meeting-house to own an organ, and whose bells were sent out from England!

Turning southwards, along Berkeley-street, the next point of interest is Copley-square, surrounding which are some of the most notable buildings of Boston. On one side is the "Second Church," also Unitarian, and noted as the meeting-house of the society which once worshipped in the old North-square, the building there having many troublous incidents in its history, not least among them being its wanton destruction for fuel by British troops.

The "Second Church" stands there in right good company, for over against it is Trinity Church, which once had Phillips Brooks for its rector, while close by are the Museum of Fine Arts, described somewhere as a "restless piece of architecture," and the magnificent Public Library.

Turning east, a tram or subway car takes the visitor back past the lower side of the Common, and by the shopping quarter to Park-street, where he may see the famous spot once nick-named Brimstone Corner, from the fiery nature of the doctrines taught in the church hard by. A stone's-throw further on there is School-street again, and there, on the corner, is the old King's Chapel. Here, if it happens to be a Wednesday, the stranger may enter at noon for the quiet half-hour's weekly service—a welcome change from the noise and glare of the street outside. Built originally for the use of the royal Governor and his staff, it was enriched by many a royal gift; communion plate and prayer-book, organ and altar-cloth, all bear testimony to royal favour. When the Revolution made an end of governors, and all other royal appanages, the rector of that day disappeared with them and with him disappeared the communion plate; but though in course of time the Episcopal Chapel became a Unitarian Church, the congregation retained the old prayer-book, carefully expunging from its liturgy all traces of its old creed. It was apropos of this that Dr. Bellows made his witty retort to the Bishop who, having been shown round King's Chapel, remarked on this fact. "I see you use our Episcopalian Book of Prayer," said the Bishop; "diluted, I suppose?" "Oh, no; washed, my dear Bishop, washed!" replied the Doctor.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

CHAIRMAN'S ADDRESS AT THE ANNUAL EXAMINATIONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 26,
BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS.

YEAR by year Carmarthen College is attaining a more prominent place amongst the educational agencies of the Principality, and this year we have reason to rejoice that its representatives will take their seats upon the Board of Theological Studies of the University of Wales, and will thus be able to render such assistance as they can to the advancement of the scheme of higher theological education which the University has so wisely and liberally initiated. We are proud to help in a movement which cannot fail to be one of great and lasting influence for good upon all sections of the Welsh ministry, indeed, I may say of the English ministry generally. The success of the College so far as the University Degree is concerned, and in all other respects, is due first and foremost to our respected Principal and his colleagues, and I have the privilege now, as on former occasions, to convey to Principal Evans and the Professors the sincere gratitude of the Presbyterian Board for the unwearied labour and thought bestowed by them upon the College and its curriculum during the session we are now bringing to a close. Carmarthen College is extremely fortunate in having at its head so distinguished a scholar and so able an administrator as Principal Evans, and the students may count themselves happy indeed in possessing him as their teacher, adviser, and friend.

I have next to make a few remarks—and they shall be very few—upon that part of the examination for which I have been responsible. There was an old quarrel, even in Plato's time, between poets and philosophers, and I am afraid that in that dispute, Welsh sympathies would be almost wholly on the side of the poets, and that philosophy has still a hard struggle before she can make good her claims upon the imaginative minds of this beautiful country. Yet it is not to be forgotten that Scotland, the home of speculative thinking in these islands, has stolen one of its greatest metaphysicians from gallant little Wales, and I trust the day is not far distant when other men with some touch of his acuteness and enthusiasm may issue forth from their native hills to act as leaders and inspirers of philosophical thought and reflection. Is it too much to hope that in the near future a thinker of that order will make his appearance in Carmarthen? At all events, there has been some promising work submitted this year by the students, upon which I very heartily congratulate them.

So much, then, for the examination and the matters connected with it. I turn now to speak upon topics of another kind. For once more it falls to my lot to address a few words of encouragement to those of you who have reached the end of the first or second stage of the collegiate career, and of earnest God-speed to those of you who are leaving these walls and are ready to embark upon the great life's work that lies before you. It is not an easy task to strike the fitting note on such an occasion as this. There is inevitably a wave of sadness that touches a little community of men who have been working side by side with one another for common ends and purposes when their ranks are about to be thinned, and it is realised that the coming times can never be quite like the old. I remember well the peculiar feeling of blankness that used to creep over one at the conclusion of each session in my own college days, and that memory increases the desire I now have that no utterance of mine shall be out of accord with what I think I am not wrong in describing as for most of you a solemn hour. I take, then, refuge in the thought that the corporate life you have been living here together is not one that changes of place or occupation can destroy, but that for good or evil its influence will remain woven indelibly into the very being of each one who has shared in it, and forming part of that personality, which I hope and believe is destined to play a useful and efficient part in the wider sphere of public service. If I can suggest in what I am about to say some of the links of connection between the life of the college student and that of the public worker, I shall not perhaps have made bad use of my time.

I confess I am tempted to wish that, instead of trying to put before you any poor reflections of my own, I could simply have read to you that fine address which Mr. Haldane delivered to the students of the University of Edinburgh some months ago. Rarely, I think, has the true spirit and aim of the scholar's vocation been delineated in language that appeals so directly to all that is best and purest in those who are modestly striving to make that vocation theirs. Mr. Haldane showed how naturally and inevitably the scholar's life must be a "dedicated life," a life, that is to say, which with all its strength is consecrated to a chosen aim, to some high and noble purpose. Such concentration, such devotion, meant of necessity renunciation of much that the world usually reckons the chief objects of ambition. Pleasure, amusement, riches, prosperity—these things must not be allowed to intervene between the scholar and his quest, or to turn his energies from that to which he had consecrated his powers. Truth is a jealous mistress and will admit into her sanctuary only those who are prepared to give her a whole-hearted service. He who would really live in the spirit of the classics must toil hard to attain that sense of easy mastery of their language which is vital to his endeavour. The student of philosophy must ponder over and think of little else than philosophical questions, before he can get rid of the habit of unconsciously applying to his subject-matter notions which are wholly inadequate and misleading. The theologian must labour long and devotedly, if he is ever to acquire that breadth of mind and largeness of view which will prevent him confusing the laws of God's great universe with the narrow creeds and provincialisms of sectarian propaganda. The lives of all great men had been thus dedicated; singleness of purpose had dominated them throughout. Thus it had been with the life of a Socrates, a Spinoza, or a Newton; and thus it was, we may add, with the lives of such men as Chalmers, Dale, Lightfoot, and of him, without whom the world is poorer to-day, John Watson. And, as it is with the finished scholar, so it is even with the beginner. Subject to the same temptations, apt to be deflected by the same tendencies, he too must live for his work, and as far as can be for that alone, if he is ever to become proficient in his calling; he too must train himself away from the idea of spending much time upon things unconnected with his pursuits, if the all too short years of college discipline are not to be spent in vain. And then Mr. Haldane went on to describe how right loyally the sons of his native Scotland were responding to the appeal. In words that I venture to claim are as true of Wales as they are of Scotland, he told the story—the familiar story—of the way in which young men and women of humble parentage and with no material advantages went up to the great centres of science and learning, animated by the one desire for knowledge and mental enlightenment. Riches were not theirs, and many a bitter struggle had been gone through before they had so much as crossed the threshold of their alma mater. And once there they were content with the barest necessities of existence, and neither asked for luxuries nor lamented their absence. It was upon youth of that calibre that the future of the country depended; that was the type of manhood from the heart of which great things would come. In olden days, Plato tried to combine in his scheme of education something of the severity of the Spartan barrack-room with the grace and refinement of Athenian culture. The Platonic ideal was, to a certain extent at least, revived again in Mr. Haldane's description of the true scholar's life, and realised, I fain would hope, in not a few of those who have been studying on the banks of the Toway.

Parnassus, then, is no easy hill to climb, and, as we pause to-day on one ridge of the ascent, we may well seek to justify our persistence by trying to estimate one or two of the results which we have gained and which have made it worth while to toil.

I am inclined to think that one of the most precious of all the results to be got from college life is that which springs from just that Spartan-like discipline to which I have been referring. It is a tremendous step in the growth of a human soul when it comes to realise that there are things in life of infinitely greater value than the wealth and comfort and material rewards in terms of which the success or failure of a man's career is so often reckoned. It is a splendid power to attain—that, namely, of deliberately renouncing and surrendering the race after silver or gold and to spend the strength that might be used for their acquisition in the quiet, earnest, conscientious pursuit of those thoughts and ideas and aspirations which are usually supposed to be such intangible and unsubstantial possessions. It is a noble point of view to gain—that of being able to banish from one's consciousness the merely pecuniary standards so prevalent in the world around us, and to judge of what is worthy and good by an altogether higher and nobler criterion. Now, it may be possible—it often is possible—for the single, unaided mind to reach this attitude of spiritual independence for itself, but it is tenfold easier for a corporation or brotherhood of men to reach it in common, if they but band themselves together with that end in view. For there ought to pervade such a community what we may vaguely call an atmosphere, a way of looking at things and feeling about them, a kind of contagious agreement as to which features in life are great and which small, which high and which low, a sort of half-conscious but unmistakable resolve to seek after those things which are above, which means in itself an education and a culture of which it would be impossible to overestimate the value. If this, or anything like this, has characterised the comradeship of this little college, if it has been penetrated by this spirit of mutual helpfulness in the joint search after the true, the beautiful, and the good, then those who have been engaged in it have been subject to a discipline than which none more valuable could be devised by the wit of man.

Again, looking more specially to the various intellectual studies of this place, let me emphasise the consideration that it would be a very inadequate and misleading view of the work which has been done were we to estimate it merely by the number of things we have been able to extract from the students in the form of answers to examination questions. It is easy, if you are blessed with a good memory to cram the mind with a host of facts, with a multitude of details, the possession of which will astonish the ignorant and even please the heart of the examiner. But a good memory does not constitute a thinker, any more than a dictionary constitutes a work of literature, or a catalogue a gallery of art. It would be a poor result of a college training to flood the world with walking dictionaries and talking catalogues. Culture does not consist in the mere piling up of information, in the mere passive reception of ideas that can be stored up in the mind as furniture in a lumber-room. It is not mere addition to our knowledge, not mere instruction—useful though they may be—that constitute the main characteristics of mental enlightenment. There are hundreds of people who abound in curious and entertaining details concerning men and things, who can supply you at a moment's notice with the date of Napoleon's birth and the names of the constellations, but that does not mean that they are necessarily persons of culture and education. Cardinal Newman once drew the picture of certain seafaring men, who range from one end of the earth to another, but for whom the multiplicity of external objects, which they have encountered, forms no symmetrical and consistent picture upon their imagination. They see, as he puts it, the tapestry of human life on the wrong side, and it tells no story. "They sleep, and they rise up, and they find themselves now in Europe, now in Asia; they see visions of great cities and wild regions; they are in the marts of commerce, or amid the islands of the South; they gaze on Pompey's Pillar or on the Andes; and nothing which meets them carries them forward or backward, to any idea beyond itself. Everything comes and goes in its turn, like the shifting scenes of a show, which leave the spectator where he was." No one who knew what he was talking about would ascribe to such a man education or culture. That only deserves the name of mental illumination which confers the power of grasping a multiplicity of details in the unity of one whole, and of referring them severally to their real position in the vast system of reality, of appreciating their true significance and value in the light of comprehensive principle. Every great intellect, in the history of humanity, such as the intellect of a Plato, a Newton, or a Shakespeare, or a Goethe, has been an intellect of this nature—an intellect, namely, that is able to take a wide and connected view of the world and human life, of things old and new, of the present and the past, and to see the influence of all these on one another in such a way as to apprehend them in their right relations and proportions. Now, it is some such breadth of intellectual vision that I fain would hope has, in however slight a measure, been awakened in the minds of those who have been pursuing here together the sacred quest of knowledge. Here I trust the power has been gained of rising above mere text-book information, and of securing a high mountain view; the power of mastering the information you have won and of not letting it master you; the power of using it with ease and discernment, instead of being crushed by it as a ponderous and oppressive load. I should like to think that no one will leave these walls without something of the perspective of the rational thinker as well as the weight of the patient scholar's learning, so that you will never make the mistake of interpreting the universe by its small details, instead of its large principles, or of so inverting the order of things as to attempt to explain the living by the dead, or the ideals of the mind by the wants of the body.

And, believe me, gentlemen, it is this kind of culture and enlightenment for which there is crying need in the world to-day, and which alone can be of service in dealing with the momentous problems that are now confronting our humanity. As those of you who are entering upon the active work of the ministry will soon discover, we are at present face to face with a variety of questions the magnitude of which we are only slowly coming to realise, and for the solution of which none but large and broad-minded culture, of the kind I have been trying to indicate, will be in the least degree sufficient. We are face to face, for example, with a great social movement that is aiming at the elevation and regeneration of the toiling millions of our native land. It is animated for the most part by generous and lofty motives, by a real desire for justice and the advancement of human weal. But it requires light as well as heat to direct it along the right road; it requires wisdom as well as enthusiasm to lead it onwards to victory. It is not alone for party leaders, or political clubs, or conflicting caucuses to deal with the relations of employers and employed, with the demands of trades unions, with the rate of wages of men and women, and with education of children. We want here the help of trained intellect and rational insight. We want here the help of students, students of history and of human nature, who have thought out and grasped great principles of equity and morality, who can be at once far-sighted and sympathetic, and who can bring their knowledge and good feeling to bear in furthering the latest and ripest appeals of justice and humanity.

We are face to face, further, with a great crisis of religious thought and life. All around us there is a cry of appeal for nobler conceptions of God, and worthier conceptions of man, and of man's great leader, Jesus Christ. It is not that religion is in any way losing its hold upon the minds and hearts of our countrymen, or that they are ceasing to feel interest in the momentous issues with which religion is concerned. Quite the contrary. Had you been going out into the ministry twenty years ago, there might have been some justification for the idea that you would have to encounter a large amount of indifferentism and scepticism in all circles of society. But that is no longer the case to-day. We have witnessed recently from one end of the country to another, a marvellous revival of interest in and reflection upon religious themes, and you cannot visit any of the large towns of Britain without realising how genuine and sincere is the desire to attain satisfying and rational ideas upon the undying principles of religious inquiry and belief. But the old crude notions of an anthropomorphic God, stationed outside the universe some millions of miles away, of the Fall of man, and of vicarious sacrifice of the virtuous for the guilty, of the verbal inspiration of the Bible, and the like, are losing, and will continue to lose, the adherence of men and women, who have come to see that they are inconsistent with all that reason and history can reveal to us of the Divine nature and the human. Men and women everywhere are coming to say with our English poet:—

"O streaming worlds, O crowded sky,
O Life, and mine own soul's abyss,
Myself am scarce so small that I Should bow to Deity like this!"

That is the real meaning of the movement which we have heard so much of lately as the New Theology, and it is the real meaning of numbers of other movements also the nature of which you will soon discover in your work as Christian ministers. Now, here, again, in this crisis, it is only the man of trained scholarship, of large intellectual horizon, of broad-minded tolerance, of wide-hearted sympathy, that can be of real help and service to anxious and inquiring minds. We need men who are ready to give their best intelligence and thought and knowledge to the consideration of these and kindred problems of such vital concern for the human race. We want men so impregnated with the spirit of religion, so imbued with the great ideas and principles that lie at its very basis, and which are of vastly greater import than all the small doctrines that have gathered round them, as never to be afraid of the truth, never to have the least suspicion that what is true can in the smallest degree injure what is holy or divine or good. "Let truth and error grapple," as Milton said. "Who ever knew truth put to the worse in a fair and open encounter?"

Gentlemen, my earnest hope and prayer for those of you who are leaving the College is that you may rise to the height of so great an opportunity and be a tower of spiritual strength to all who are honestly searching for truth and striving to live the Christian life.

THE VAN MISSION.

THE news from the field is distinctly encouraging, and with the exception of the memorable Loughborough and Coalville week, the returns are the best for the season. Of 22 meetings reported, four attendances have been below 100; and at 14 meetings, the numbers have ranged from 200 to 1,200. Two Vans were without meeting last Sunday, and only two Scotch gatherings are included for the first and second days in the week. These had attendances of 200 each, and the figures for the remaining evenings will probably be equally good. Without them the gross attendances just reach 6,000, giving an average of slightly over 270. A number of children's meetings have also been held, but the figures are not included in this statement.

It has been decided to make an experiment with No. 4 Van, in accordance with many suggestions, that a longer stay should be made in towns where there seemed to be the best opportunities for good work. This will mean dropping a number of places out of the programme, and some re-arrangement of plans, but the advantages are many, as experience has already shown.

Besides the actual giving of a subscription to the Mission, there are various ways in which assistance is forthcoming, that it is pleasant to acknowledge. Quite frequently hospitality is shown to our missionaries, and gifts for the table are numerous; or some one pays for a horse when the time comes to move on to the next pitch; or there comes a fitment which some one has seen will be handy; or a good brother volunteers to put a coat of paint on the roof and save you a matter of 15s.; or a workman who has heard nothing of Unitarianism for years in his out-of-the-way village puts a crown into the box "out of gratitude." These things cannot all be acknowledged in a formal manner, but they are worth mentioning among many little tokens of goodwill which are shown, and are an encouragement to those who are in charge of the Vans. In one instance a clock has been provided for a Van, and if they are small, and good timekeepers, we should be glad to hear of others that could be sent to the other three. It may not be out of place while mentioning these things to say a word about subscriptions, which are needed to a great extent if the Mission is to be free from debt at the end of the season. The Vans have been generously provided, but a large part of the working expenses is needed. There is no opportunity while the Vans are in the field to issue any general appeal for funds, but we trust the friends of the Mission will not let it suffer on that account. Last summer the money came in, in sums from a shilling upwards, in consequence of a paragraph like this, and we think there are sufficiently many keenly enough interested in the work and anxious for its success to warrant us in believing that they will respond now to the needs of the hour.

No. 1 Van spent three days at Doncaster in charge of Rev. John Ellis, of Lightcliffe, who was assisted by Rev. W. Whitaker, of Hull. A long stretch of country lies between Doncaster and Retford, where the Van has been for the greater part of this week with Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Holbeck, as missionary. Scrooby, with its Pilgrim Fathers' associations, and Bawtry were therefore looked at with a view to a brief halt, but it was decided to turn off the Great North Road and visit Tickhill as a more likely place. The Van stood by the handsome market cross where Cromwell found the villagers on their knees at prayer when he came to the spot, an incident which is responsible for the local name of "Tickhill, God help us." Mr. R. J. Hall, of Manchester College, Oxford, has relieved Mr. Barnes as lay missionary. Rev. R. P. Farley, of St. Helens, arrived on Thursday, and next day the Van was to travel to Worksop, and next week to Shirebrook and Mansfield with Rev. A. Hall, of Norwich, in charge.

No. 2 Van reports meetings from the 10th—17th inst. at Prestwich. Two meetings have been prevented by rain. A great feature was made of children's meetings, and a special service was held for them on the Sunday morning. So thoroughly did the Rev. J. Forrest and Mrs. Forrest succeed in this matter that the children themselves organised a farewell meeting on the afternoon of their departure, when over 50 were present "giving a hearty good-bye and cheering us on our way." Very careful house to house visitation was also undertaken, and a series of successful meetings was brought to a close on the 17th with an attendance of 200. It is understood that during this week large meetings have been the rule at Irvine. On Sept. 1 the Rev. E. T. Russell, of Glasgow, succeeds Mr. and Mrs. Forrest for a month's work, which will begin at Saltcoats, and also include Ardrossan, Seamill, Largs, Moskip, Gourcock, and Greenock.

No. 3 Van worked in Hemel Hempstead and immediate neighbourhood after leaving Tring, and Rev. F. Summers continued to have good meetings. Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, arrived on the Wednesday and that night the attendance passed 1,000.

Rev. J. A. Pearson, of Oldham, was at Hertford on Thursday, and moves to Hoddesdon on Monday, and he will be followed at Waltham on Thursday by Rev. H. Rawlings, of London.

No. 4 Van had an excellent site at Longton in view of the Unitarian Chapel, which since its disuse by the old congregation has been let to the Spiritualists. Rev. H. F. Short, of Crewe, reports very hopeful results. Rev. W. Holmshaw, of Blackley, joined the Van before its removal to Stoke, where the meetings have been splendidly attended, the audience reaching as large a number as 800. A request has also been made for a course of lectures, and the attention of the local association will be drawn to this matter, as well as to Mr. Short's report re Longton. Five meetings were held in Stoke, and on Thursday a beginning was made at Newcastle-under-Lyme, by Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport. The Van will remain at Newcastle just so long as it can be made of use to the Rev. G. Pegler and the local congregation. Rev. T. Paxton, of Newhall Hill, Birmingham, will be missionary next week.

THE SHAKERS.

SIR,—Will you allow me, although so late, to enter a protest in the name of justice against the description of the Shakers given by Mr. G. F. Millin in THE INQUIRER of May 11? These really practical Christians are called by him "ignorant fanatics," they "are steeped in ignorance," "the elders and all their people are in many respects very little above the level of the uncivilised." Now, if Mr. Millin, before writing about them had, to use his own words, thought it "worth while to go to the trouble of finding out," he would have found a full account of this community by two of their elders, Anna White and Leila S. Taylor ("Shakerism, Mount Lebanon, N.Y.," 1904), of which the language and style would have shown him that, far from being uncivilised, two at least were cultivated women. Eldress Anna White is the daughter of Robert White, who was the friend of Theodore Parker, a wealthy Quaker of English ancestry, who joined the community in 1846. He belonged to a family of note in the literary and scientific circles of Boston. Another eldress, Betsy Gass, was the first woman to receive a teacher's certificate at the Regent's Examination in the State of New York. Elder Henry Eads was such a lover of music that he taught himself the organ and piano when over seventy. There is quite a long list of inventions, but as they were never patented, seeing that this savours of monopoly, others have sometimes adopted them and gained the credit. As to literature, the authors say that most of the best modern books have a place on their shelves, especially such as tend to further human progress. In the early days the work was too hard to leave leisure for study, and latterly owing to high taxes and a falling off in their numbers, manual labour takes a greater proportion of their time than should by rights be necessary for their support; but, as they say, "in attaining purity of life and thought they have developed a pure and refined spiritual taste eminently fitting them for the appreciation of the highest in art and literature." Elder White was a great lover of the beautiful in nature, and introduced the locust tree, which now beautifies their houses. If Mr. Millin has correctly remembered Elder Evans's remark about "the beautiful," he spoke for himself alone; his bent was science and medicine; if the doctors of London were to have control of a Hospital Building Fund, it is doubtful whether much of it would go to external architectural beauty.

So much for the "ignorance" of the Shakers. Now as to their fanaticism. When Evans came with Dale Owen to America and stopped by the way to see the Shakers, he was an aggressive materialist, but they were not shocked, and left it to his experience among them to convert him.

Amos Buttrick put the officials of the U.S. Treasury to some inconvenience by requesting them to take back £82 7s. 8d., the sum of several years' pension that he had drawn for wounds received when serving in the war, because the Shakers whom he had joined had decided that it was the price of blood. They were in very sore straits for money at that time. Is this fanaticism, or is it worthy to be remembered with Dr. Martineau's rejection of the Regium Donum?

Finally, these ignorant people have from the first (Mr. Millin says it is 130 years ago, I have not the date) given absolute equality to women.

The Shakers are so cut off from the world at large that many people might know nothing whatever about them beyond what Mr. Millin writes; as he writes as a friend with partial admiration it is all the more misleading, so, as they cannot take up their own defence, I hope I may be allowed to do it for them.

C. JESSIE VESEL.

Thorncroft, Warlingham, July 14.

SIR,—In reply to this letter, a proof which you have been good enough to send me, it is not necessary to say much. I think I made it perfectly clear that I did not know, and did not pretend to know, much of the recent history of these good people, and, as I said, for the purpose I had in view it was not worth while to go to the trouble of finding out anything of that recent history. What I wished to do was to show that even ignorant fanatics might set up a social system that, in its main lines, would work out with none of the evils of our highly civilised society if they only went the right way about it—if they planted themselves on the land, and supplemented their agriculture by manufacturing industry.

Now, whatever the Shakers may be at the present time, there cannot be a reasonable doubt about what they were when they founded their societies. I am away from home, and cannot refer to the article I wrote about them, but I think I stated that their foundress was a woman who, to the day of her death, was never able to read or write. At a time when the Shakers had become a flourishing community I met, as I said, their most influential elder, a man who had been deputed by his people to represent them and their creed and system in Europe, and I found him exactly what I should have expected such a deputy would be, after reading Hepworth Dixon's account of these people, based on a personal visit to them. Elder Evans was a shrewd, kindly, narrow, and ignorant old man. As to his opinions about beauty, which the writer of the letter above thinks must have been peculiar to himself, I have not a doubt that in this he very fairly represented the people who sent him, and I think anybody may be convinced of this by simply examining the pictorial representations of the houses, clothes, furniture, and general surroundings of the Shaker communities long after they had attained to such prosperity as must have enabled them to eschew their bald utilitarianism and to give expression to any sense of the beautiful prevalent among them. No people could have set up such buildings and laid out such settlements if they had had the least cultivation of taste. If of late years the Shakers have become refined and enlightened, educated, and progressive, it is only what one should have expected of such a combination of practical sagacity with the highest ethical principles, and I am very glad to hear it. I very firmly believe that these should be, and would be, the practical results of a sound social system, based on right principles, and animated by a truly religious spirit. My only regret is that, according to the latest authorities quoted, these later progressive and enlightened Shaker communities seem to be dwindling. I suppose that means that in these days of ready communication and universal intercourse they have been unable altogether to escape the hostile forces beating around them like the devouring waves said to be always eating away the British Isles. Far be it from me to slander even the ignorant and fanatical, and especially if, in their ignorance and fanaticism they are honest and earnest. But I think it should have been apparent that in the article complained of I was not writing of the latest phases of this remarkable movement, but of the originators, and I do not think I have done them any injustice. As Mr. Vesel says I wrote as "a friend with partial admiration," and as a friend and admirer I am glad that this letter has been written to correct any erroneous impression that my article may unintentionally have conveyed.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

SCARBOROUGH AND OTHER SEASIDE CHURCHES.

SIR,—As our friends will be making their way coastwise for their holidays, may I draw their attention to those pleasure resorts where there is a Unitarian church? The founders have mostly built with the idea of supplying a place for the worship of visitors as well as for themselves, and larger churches have thus been built and greater expenses incurred. Judging by our summer congregations, one would imagine that our friends took no holidays, or that doing so they took no trouble to inquire whether there was a Unitarian church at their holiday resort—or where it was.

As the secretary of the Scarborough church may I point out that the founders of this church spent between £7,000 and £8,000 on the building and furnishing, and they had in view the special needs of visitors; otherwise a much smaller place would have met our own requirements.

A beautiful church, a bright musical service, and a good earnest minister; and yet so few of our visiting friends join us in worship when in Scarborough. We do not grudge them the fullest opportunity of enjoying the delightful scenery around, or of testing the open-air treatment to the fullest extent. Nevertheless, we in this veritable outpost of the faith (and I doubt not many others similarly circumstanced) would warmly welcome greater opportunities of worship and fellowship with those Unitarians who may be visiting Scarborough.

Will not both parties benefit—the visitors and the visited—by a little fuller communion in that worship which we profess to hold as the richest and deepest part of life?

As some have confessed to inability to find our church, I may say that it is at the junction of Westboro' and Falsgrave-road and Victoria-road.

NEW YORK ACCOMMODATION.

SIR,—In reply to some requests for information which we have received, permit me to say that the Park Avenue Hotel, corner Fourth Avenue and 32nd Street, New York, will be a good stopping place for the British delegates. The rates range from $1.00 upwards for a room. Another excellent hotel is the Chelsea 220 West 23rd Street, with rates from $1.50 upwards. There is also the Holland, corner Fifth Avenue and 30th Street, with rates from $2.00 upwards. All of these hotels are centrally located. In summer advantageous rates can be made by an understanding before engaging the rooms. The meals at these places are à la carte. For those who desire a pension, Miss J. A. Proudfoot's, 348, West 57th Street, New York, will be found an excellent place. The lady is a Canadian and conducts three adjoining houses.

The Unitarian Headquarters in New York, it will be remembered, are at 104, East Twentieth-street, in the rear of All Souls' Church.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—It is proposed to fill one of the three lights of the chancel window of the new Richmond-hill Church with stained glass, as a memorial to the late minister, the Rev. H. Kelsey White. (August 16 is the anniversary of his death.) If this is done, a member of the congregation has offered to fill another of the lights, and it is hoped that some other friend may come forward to complete the scheme by filling the third light. For the proposed memorial £8 is already in hand, but nearly three times that amount is required. The Rev. John Barron is the present minister of the church.

Bedfield (Suffolk).—The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, July 21, by Mr. Richard Robinson, of Manchester, in the afternoon in the Mission Chapel, which was well filled, and in the evening on Hungers Green, Monk Soham, before an audience of nearly 200 people. This was the feature of the day; in fact, it was a Van Mission without the van, and reached a great many people who would not dare to enter a Unitarian chapel. Mr. Robinson, the Revs. W. Birks (Diss), R. Newell, Messrs. Cook and Newcombe gave short addresses; a small band of musicians—violin, fife, and concertina—led the singing, which was of a lively character, and Essex Hall tracts were freely distributed.

Chatham.—Last Sunday the worshippers at Hamond Hill Church rejoiced in an environment more in accord with the gospel of sweetness and light than has been the case for years. A good while ago the desire was expressed to have the building decorated by the voluntary efforts of the members. Ready help was forthcoming; but an examination of the fabric showing the imperative need of its rehabilitation, some six weeks had to be spent in repairing, cementing, tiling, plumbing, petrifying the stonework, protecting the ironwork, and other necessary labour. As the evenings and half-holiday afternoons only could generally be devoted to work, the project proceeded slowly, yet most efficiently. Last week the interior changed its aspect from a damaged terra cotta to a restful yet wakeful light-green. The congregation are deeply indebted to the faithful band of workers, who not only by their voluntary services have saved the church some £50 in the cost of labour, but have furnished this remarkable expression of their love for the house of prayer in which they meet, and the reality of fellowship in their midst.

Chester.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held at Matthew Henry's Chapel, July 21, the minister, the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, being the preacher. The flowers, mostly contributed by the children, were afterwards sent to the infirmary. There was a large attendance at both services of parents, members, and friends. Collections were taken in aid of the funds for the scholars' annual excursion.

Colne.—The Rev. John Evans, B.A., whose resignation has been received with deep regret, will terminate his ministry on the last Sunday in September. He goes to Rochdale.

Halifax.—The annual flower service of the Northgate-end Sunday-school was held on Sunday afternoon, with an address by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Loughborough. The duet, "O Lovely Peace!" was beautifully sung. The collection for the Children's Sick Fund was £33s.

Hollywood, near Birmingham.—The anniversary services were held at Kingswood Chapel on Sunday, July 14, the preacher being the Rev. Alfred Thompson, of Dudley. The choir sang two anthems, one of which, "This is the day the Lord hath made," is the composition of the organist, Mr. Herbert H. Matthews. The collections amounted to £9 12s. 6d. In accordance with the ancient custom buns were distributed to the Sunday scholars at the close of the morning service.

Manchester.—A garden party was fixed for Saturday week, at Summerville, in connection with the District Association. The rain, however, fell without ceasing until late in the afternoon, and all the arrangements were completely upset. About 200 people braved the weather, and put in an attendance, upon which the Rev. Dendy Agate congratulated them in the course of a short address, at an improvised meeting held in the large conservatory.

Manchester Domestic Mission: Willert-Street.—On Sunday, July 21, the Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated, when addresses were given by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson and Mrs. Dowson, of Gee Cross, and the annual distribution of prizes for regular attendance took place. In the afternoon the scholars of the upper school assembled in the chapel, which they filled to its utmost capacity, while the infants' prize distribution was conducted in their own schoolroom. After the addresses, to which the scholars listened with most appreciative attention, Mrs. Dowson presented the award books, and it was noted that thirty-two scholars had not been absent once during the year. There are nearly six hundred names on the registers, and an average attendance of nearly four hundred. The evening service was conducted by Mr. Dowson, whose sympathetic and practical address to parents was delivered to a large congregation, the chapel being again quite full. These school anniversary services have been amongst the most satisfactory of those held in recent years. To-day (Saturday) one hundred of the scholars are to go for a week's holiday to the Great Hucklow Holiday Home, accompanied by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, Miss Bishop, and Miss Redfern.

Mottram.—Sunday, July 14, was the scholars' annual walk and prize distribution. There was a procession of about 200 scholars and friends through the village. Two hymns were sung on the market-square, and a short address given by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, followed by service in the chapel, the minister preaching from "Freely ye have received, freely give," being an appeal for more earnest co-operation and support in Sunday-school work. At evening service about 400 people were present. Special hymns by the scholars, and music by the choir, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Wild, were given at both services. In the evening prizes were distributed to the scholars by Messrs. E. Gee and I. Swindells, and there were short addresses from the minister and the senior superintendent, Mr. J. H. Elkin.

Southport (Appointment).—The Rev. Matthew R. Scott, of Ainsworth, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the Portland-street Church in succession to the Rev. F. T. Mott. Mr. Scott is to attend the international meetings at Boston in September, and hopes to enter upon his new ministry on the first Sunday in November.

Stockport.—On Thursday, July 18, a garden party and cake and fancy fair was held at Bredbury Hall by the kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Hyde. The day was fine and the event proved a great success, resulting financially in nearly £20 being added to the Ladies' Auxiliary Fund. On Saturday, July 20, a few of the teachers and scholars went for a ramble to Alderley Edge, under the leadership of Mr. Henry Hyde, a well-known botanist, from the Manchester District Sunday School Association. The weather was delightful, and the ramble much appreciated. Last Sunday and the Sunday before the Rev. B. C. Constable preached on "Humane Institutions," and gave interesting accounts of "Our Fire Brigades," and "Our Lifeboats," and their work.

Treorchy.—On Thursday, July 11, the curiosity of the Rhondra people was arrested by a visit from the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester. Those responsible for the engagement had been successful in securing the loan of a Primitive Methodist chapel for the occasion, and there was a large congregation.

Wakefield.—The floral services at Westgate Chapel and the school feast were held on July 14 and 17, and were a gratifying success. The morning service was conducted by the Rev. A. Chalmers, the evening by the Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, and that in the afternoon by Mr. G. A. Harrison, H.M. Inspector of Schools. There was a large attendance on each occasion. The school feast was held in the park at Sandal Grange by kind invitation of Mrs. Marriott, and the weather was delightful.

THE Rev. R. H. Lambley, M.A., has resigned the pulpit of the Unitarian Church at Melbourne, and is returning to England shortly; he will be open to accept preaching engagements on and after Sunday, September 8. Mr. Frederick Sinclair, M.A., late of Manchester College, Oxford, is now on his way to Melbourne, where he will take up the work of the ministry.

"'PUBLIC OPINION' was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read," said Dr. W. R. Nicoll in the "British Weekly," May 2, 1907.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that during August, September, and October all correspondence may be sent to the office of THE INQUIRER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., and nothing to his private address.

IN our leading article this week, referring to three veterans, to whose presence at the coming International Congress in Boston we look forward, we have spoken of President Eliot's work for education at Harvard. We would call the special attention of those who have the welfare of our ministry at heart to the address by President Eliot, which also appears this week, on "More Harvard Graduates for the Ministry." We also may learn from these wise words.

OF the Van Mission we have a report (they only arrive on Thursday, which makes it impossible to publish them as fully as we could wish), the general part of which we must give next week. No. 1 Van is now at Mansfield, with the Rev. Alfred Hall, and goes next-week, with the Rev. S. Jones, of Swansea, to Bolsover and Chesterfield. No. 2 Van had a successful time at Irvine. The Rev. E. T. Russell takes the Mission for August, not September, as stated last week. He begins at Saltcoats. No. 3 Van, after the Rev. W. G. Tarrant's time, of which he tells himself this week, was joined at Hertford by the Rev. J. A. Pearson, of Oldham. The Rev. H. Rawlings was to be with the van at Waltham and Edmonton, and next week the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards will be at Edmonton and Tottenham. No. 4 Van finished at Stoke on Saturday week with an attendance of 800, and then had a most successful time at Newcastle-under-Lyme. It proceeded thence to Hanley and Burslem.

Two important conferences will be held early this month in London. To the International Housing Congress which meets this Saturday, we called attention last week. It will visit the principle housing experiments in London and the provinces. A permanent International Housing Committee will probably be appointed on Wednesday. The other series of meetings, whose business will be inaugurated by Lord Crewe on Monday, is the second International Congress on School Hygiene. The syllabus is astonishingly comprehensive, ranging systematically over the whole field. It is difficult to conceive of two subjects more worthy of consideration and earnest study, than those which will during the next few days be before these two conferences.

THE Parliamentary Bill which unites the three Methodist churches (Bible Christian, Free Methodist, New Connexion) received the Royal assent yesterday week (Friday, July 26), and the United Methodist church may, therefore, be said to be established. Meanwhile each of the uniting bodies holds its last Conference as a separate organisation this year. The Free Churches have just held their Conference at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Bible Christian Conference has taken place this week at Portsmouth. The organ of the uniting churches expresses great satisfaction at the decision of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference by which henceforth the "Leaders' Meeting" is to be enlarged by the addition of a representative as well as an official element. This step in the direction of democracy is, of course, also a move towards the policy of the younger Methodist churches.

CANON W. PAGE ROBERTS, who has been appointed Dean of Salisbury, is seventy-one years of age. In early life he was intended for the Wesleyan ministry, but having graduated at Cambridge he entered the Church. Since 1878 he has been Perpetual Curate of St. Peter's, Vere-street, formerly the church of F. D. Maurice. His ministry has been that of an influential Broadchurchman, as his books "Law and God," "Reasonable Service," "Liberalism in Religion," and "Conformity and Conscience" may show. Dr. Page Roberts received last year an honorary degree in Divinity from the University of Glasgow.

THE 700th anniversary of the grant of the first Charter to Liverpool is to be celebrated next week on a great scale, and the opportunity for an historical pageant has naturally been taken. Mr. William Watson, who, though not a native of Liverpool, grew up there, and there first became known as a poet, has contributed the following ode to the commemoration :—

AUGUST, 1907.

Deep in memory, deep in time ;
Rooted far in England's prime ;
Proud she stands amid her peers,
Clothed with her seven hundred years.

Wealth is hers, and might, and fame ;
All the seas resound her name ;
In her roadstead navies ride :—
Hath she need of aught beside ?

Power unseen, before Whose eyes
Cities fall and cities rise,
Grant she climb not to her goal
All forgetful of the Soul !

Firm in honour be she found ;
Justice-armed and mercy-crowned ;
Blest in labour, blest in ease,
Blest in noiseless charities.

Unenslaved by things that must Yield full soon to moth and rust,
Let her hold a light on high Men unborn may travel by :—

Lovely as yon beaconing beam,
There where her Imperial stream,
Past the leagues of wharf and quay,
Bears her fleets unto the sea.

This ode is to be sung at the commemorative service to be held in St. George's Hall to-morrow (Sunday afternoon). It will also be sung at both services at Ullet-road Church, where in the morning the Rev. J. Collins Odgers is to preach on "A Castle, a Tower, and a Shrine." This sermon we hope to publish next week.

THE British Association has been meeting this week at Leicester, and on Wednesday Sir David Gill, who for more than thirty years has been H.M. Astronomer at the Cape of Good Hope, delivered his address as President. The immense value for science of accurate observation and measurements, was the burden of the address, illustrated in a striking manner by a reference to observations of the planet Eros, which in 1931 will approach the earth. The astronomers still living twenty years hence will depend for the new knowledge they may gain from that astronomical event upon the work of their predecessors. "The chief responsibility is ours," said Sir David Gill, "for now, and not twenty years hence, is the time to begin our preparations; now is the time to study more systematically errors which undoubtedly attach to some of our photographic processes: and we ought to construct telescopes specially designed for the work." He also spoke of the great work of the measurement of the earth's surface, which it was the dream of his life to see completed. At a previous meeting of the Council on the same day, Mr. Francis Darwin, F.R.S., was elected President for 1908-9.

At Montreal it is hoped that the new Unitarian Church will be ready for opening before the delegates of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association leave Canada. Our readers will be interested to learn that the son of the Unitarian minister, Professor Howard T. Barnes, who was recently appointed to the Chair of Physics at the McGill University in succession to Professor Rutherford, is now in England and is attending the meetings of the British Association at Leicester.

An article in last week's Nation on the Syllabus of Pius X., which is a sweeping condemnation of every suggestion of liberalism in the Church, says that judged by internal evidence it might be a document of the seventeenth century:—"For its compilers, the intervening period, with its critical and historical methods and the results obtained by them in every department of knowledge, is a blank." "The authors particularly aimed at are the Abbé Loisy, of whose ideas the condemned propositions are practically a summary, and M. Edouard Le Roy, whose 'Dogme et Critique,' perhaps the fullest philosophical statement of the modernist position, has recently given rise to a singularly bitter controversy."

As to the result of the policy embodied in the syllabus, which is the traditional policy of the Church, the writer in the Nation declares that to suppose Rome will change its policy "is a dream which argues a certain simplicity in the dreamer. From the first the Papacy has stood for tradition, for authority, for the letter. The qualities which led it historically to take this ground have been accentuated in transmission. And the claim to infallibility bars the way to the wiser mind. 'Meaner churches may repent and amend; but for Rome reform is suicide.' Yet in setting herself to crush the modern spirit, the Church attempts the impossible. Surely, if slowly, her opposition is dissolved or broken: she must either be caught up in the life-process of mankind or disappear. The strength of contemporary Catholicism is passive only. Those who do the work of the world are not with it; it resists rather than counteracts. And a force of mere resistance is a decreasing force; the future belongs to those who affirm, not to those who deny."

THE Friends' Yearly Meeting of 1907, appointed a committee on social service which is now arranging to bring that subject before the attention of Friends in all parts of the country. The purpose of the Committee, well expressed in the minute adopted as a working basis, contains the following paragraph:—"We desire to emphasise the importance of drawing the attention of the whole Society to those social responsibilities and services which we feel rest upon Friends as the direct outcome and issue of our distinguishing views of truth. The application of the broad principles of Brotherhood and Spiritual Liberty, which these tenets involve, to the social inequality and injustice which surround us, seems to us to be our immediate duty."

SINCE the publication of Charles Kingsley's "Cheap Clothes and Nasty," and "Alton Locke," the evils of "sweated" tailoring have been again and again exposed, and yet there seems to be no improvement. The evidence given before the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the subject of home work shows that manufactories have been closed, and underpaid work in the homes has greatly increased. Mr. Michael Daly, organising secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses said that the difficulty in organising the lowest strata of the industry was because wages were so low that workers could not afford any payment to the union. His experience of thirty years showed him that conditions were getting worse. Average hours would be about thirteen a day. The average wage earnings of women who worked at home would be 7s. 6d. to 10s. a week. Mr. Herbert Evans, assistant factory inspector, said he seldom found the outworkers' places closed at night, or on Sundays, or early in the morning; he always found men and women working. It is not only the making of cheap clothing that is thus underpaid. For making a garment right through that would be sold for £5s. 5s. to £20, only 6s. was paid.

BOTH these witnesses agree that it is impossible for the workers to organise, and that among employers as well as employed there is very largely a willingness that wages should be improved if competition can in some way be restricted. "I am quite sure," said Mr. Evans, "there must be legislative means for preventing further deterioration, if it is possible to prevent it; it is now a menace to the community," and Mr. Daly declared, "I am perfectly convinced that the establishment of a Wages Board, with power to fix a minimum wage, is the only effective method of controlling the conditions under which our industry should be carried on."

THE most noticeable growth of co-operation on the Continent is among the agricultural classes. In Austria they have productive societies, purchase societies, distributive societies, creameries, dairies, vine-growers' societies, and co-operative banks. At the end of 1903 no less than 9,729 societies were returned as carrying on business. In Belgium there were in 1904, 884 agricultural supply associations and 496 dairy associations. Various German States have many such societies with large membership. The small owner could not, by his own efforts, and with his private capital obtain the instruments needed for the most profitable working of his holding, but through co-operation he is successful. The Co-operative News calls attention to these figures in connection with the provisions of the Small Holdings Bill of our Government for the establishment of co-operative societies and credit banks, and suggests that this is the way to solve the difficulty by making small holdings pay well in England as well as in other countries.

WITH reference to our note on July 20 on the spread of the Garden City ideal, in which we referred to the securing by the Fearnville Garden Association at Leeds of the option of a site at Roundhay, for 500 semi-detached villas to cost not less than £300 each, the secretary of the Garden City Association asks leave to point out that this scheme is in no way connected with his association, and "that its methods of operation differ widely from our own."

THE secretary of the Garden City Association proceeds to enumerate the following points advocated by his Association:—

1. The building of new towns in country districts on well thought out principles, such as the Garden City at Letchworth, designed from the outset to secure the healthful and adequate housing of its population, so that the land shall never become overcrowded with houses, and the town, when built, shall be permanently surrounded by a wide belt of agricultural and park lands.

2. The creation of Garden Suburbs, such as the Hampstead Garden Suburb, on similar principles for the immediate relief of existing towns.

3. The building of garden villages, as exemplified by Port Sunlight and Bournville, for properly housing the working classes near their work.

4. The acquisition of open spaces, and the improvement of existing towns and villages on Garden City principles.

5. The removal of factories from congested areas to country districts.

6. The provision of small holdings in proximity to towns, together with measures for the disposal of agricultural produce to the advantage of the home producer and consumer.

FORSAKING his usual sententious manner, J. B., in the last issue of the Christian World, speaks out plainly and trenchantly on the subject of Foreign Missions. He thinks that the supreme matter between the missionary societies and the public to-day is the latter's question, "What is the teaching you are offering to these peoples whom you propose to convert? What actual system of belief concerning God, man, and the universe do you propose to substitute for the one which they now hold? What theology is it proposed at our expense, and by the aid of our subscriptions, to offer these vast populations of the East, who are turning to us for the higher light and knowledge we are supposed to possess?" He then proceeds to show the importance of sending to the East—to the great civilised communities of India, China, and Japan, the best results of our theological research as of our science. But there is a danger. Some of the societies at work are teaching as though the discoveries and conclusions of the last half-century had never been reached. "Is there no danger," he asks, "that instead of liberating we may be actually in process of binding these souls in new fetters; of covering these minds with glooms, involving them in embarrassments from which we, after long and agonising struggles, are just escaping?"

THEN, coming to close grips with the nature of the teaching to be given by the modern missionary, J. B. asks with refreshing frankness: "Is China, at this time of day, really to be taught the infallibility of the Old Testament scriptures? Is their new cosmogony to be that of a world made in six days; their morality to be made to square with that of the imprecatory psalms, or with the slaughter of the Canaanites by divine command? Is their view of natural law to be conditioned by acceptance of such stories as that of Balaam's ass, of the walls of Jericho, of Jonah and the whale! Are we, in a word, to entangle the future religious life of China by traditions, the true meaning of which in world-history we ourselves are just now learning, and from the earlier damaging effect of which upon faith we are now just escaping? Are we on these themes teaching what, as the converts' minds develop, they will assuredly have to unlearn?"

In the light of modern knowledge the responsibilities of missionary societies are grave as they are perplexing. But those societies can hardly do better than take their courage in both hands and face the issue in the spirit of this writer, who concludes: "What is our duty to those waiting peoples if not to teach them the thing we are sure of; the thing which satisfies our own heart and mind? And what is this but the facts and experiences of the Gospel interpreted by that educated spiritual consciousness of our day, which we may surely say is the work of God's own Spirit, the product of His continuous revelation? This and nothing other it is which the Church has to proclaim, and with all the conviction and enthusiasm of those who, from its work on their own lives, know it to be the divinest thing that has been given to our world."

"THE Story of Creation" is the subject of the seventh of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons in the series on "Thirty Years' Changes of Religious Thought," in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. The text is from Gen. i. 1: "In the beginning God," and on the title-page as motto there is this sentence by Professor Oort, of Leiden:—"From the chastened simplicity of this poetical and childlike description of the formation of the universe a voice falls upon our ear: 'There is one Supreme Being, whose plan is fulfilled, who is to be adored as Creator, whose work is His praise.'"

Mr. Hargrove's own conclusion is in these words:—

"Chaos is a delusion of the imagination. There is no such thing in heaven, or on earth, or in the affairs of men. There never has been. For in the beginning was God, is now and ever shall be. And God means order, purpose, providence, law, control of all from the least to the greatest. This was the sublime faith to which Israel attained twenty-five centuries ago, and it had been well for the world if it could have rested in this. 'O rest in the Lord, wait patiently on Him.' We cannot get beyond this, old and simple as it is. 'Have faith in God,' said Jesus. Just three simple words in the original, embracing the whole need of man, the complete answer to all questions of the inquiring mind. You ask of the past and the origin of worlds—of the future and the secret disclosed to none—of things present—why they are thus and not otherwise? Why the lives of men are so strangely ordered or seemingly not ordered at all, but mere sport of passion and circumstance? the only answer is 'Have faith in God.' If before time and throughout space, and filling all things, and cause of all is a Power, One, Almighty, all wise, all good, then we know what we cannot see, and are assured that all is well. In the beginning God. In the ending God. Now, as from the beginning to the end, God. Is it not enough to satisfy our every need? 'Surely,' writes Dean Farrar, 'if ever a revelation was clear, simple, majestic, of infinite importance, it is the verse—In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth?' This is the light which shines from afar off through the clouds of the old myth to guide and cheer us in the doubts and troubles. God was in the beginning, God is for ever."

DR. MARTIN RADE, who is professor in the University of Marburg, and editor of the Christliche Welt, is to attend the International Congress of Religious Liberals at Boston, in September. In the Christliche Welt, of July 25, he has the following note:—

"Conservative Church papers have asked how I come to be taking part in a 'Congress of Unitarians' in Boston. Well, in the first place, I am invited to give an address over there on the ecclesiastical situation in Germany. This address our readers will have in due time laid before them, and can then judge for themselves. Further, the invitation which I received was from the 'Fourth International Congress of Religious Liberals.' That the Unitarians were the originators, and still form the main body of the Congress, I was and am perfectly aware. But the Unitarians to-day are no longer what they were, any more than we are now the old Trinitarians. When the Unitarian Peabody, from Harvard College, was in Germany, did not our Conservative Church papers also give him friendly greeting, and even seek his literary co-operation?"

READERS with antiquarian tastes will find in the current number of the Quarterly Review an article on "The English Manor," by Miss L. Toulmin Smith, the librarian of Manchester College, Oxford. In the same number Mr. Edward Clodd writes on "Magic and Religion," referring, among other books, to Skeat and Blagden's "Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula," Dennett's "At the Back of the Black Man's Mind: Notes on the Kingly Office in West Africa," and Major Gurdon's "The Khasis" (Nutt, 1907). The Khasis appear to be tremendous women's rights people. "In the law of inheritance in force among the pure Khasis the man does not count. . . . Not only is the woman the sole head and source and only bond of union of the family; in the most primitive districts she is the only possible owner of real property, and through her alone inheritance is transmitted. It is the youngest daughter in whom the family estate is vested, and who, as hearth-priestess, performs the ceremonies connected with the worship of ancestors."

THE July number of the Willaston School Chronicle announces with great regret that the Rev. S. A. Steinthal has been obliged, through ill-health, to resign his office as chairman of the Governors. Mr. Steinthal was one of Mr. Barker's original trustees, and chairman of the Governors from the foundation, and has always taken a great and personal interest in the school. He has been succeeded as chairman by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, while Mr. C. Sydney Jones has been appointed secretary in place of Mr. A. H. Worthington, who has been compelled to give up his work owing to pressure of other engagements. During the past term the school service was taken on Sunday morning, May 12, by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, on June 2 by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and on June 23 by the Rev. F. K. Freeston.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.—About a hundred visitors attended the end-of-term concert and garden party on Saturday last. After tea the girls acted some of the favourite scenes from "As You Like it," and won great applause for their spirited acting and clear enunciation. A capital concert followed, and was listened to with evident appreciation, both the part-singing and piano playing being of a very high order of merit. Dr. Blake Odgers, a trustee of the school, in a speech full of humour, pointed out that the school had distinguished itself this year by gaining five certificates (one for honours) in the Cambridge Locals, seven in the music examinations of the Associated Board of R.A.M. and R.C.M., and thirty in the examinations of the Royal Drawing Society. The school orchestral class (conductor, Miss G. Wood) had achieved the winning of the second prize for small string orchestras at the recent competition at the Alexandra Palace. Mrs. Odgers then presented the certificates gained in the various public examinations to the successful girls, and an admirably rendered cantata, "The Hours," brought a very pleasant evening to a close.

LITERATURE.

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL"

WITH the July number the Hibbert Journal has completed its fifth volume. Five years of strenuous work have resulted, as the editor recently told a representative of The Tribune, in a circulation of close upon 10,000 copies a quarter, including 2,000 in America, which, for a substantial quarterly with the serious purpose of the Hibbert, is a remarkable achievement, and very significant of the wide-spread interest now taken in the movements of progressive religious thought.

The present number opens with a brief memorial article by Sir Edward Russell on Dr. John Watson, who was from the first, a member of the editorial board, and to the second number, in January, 1903, contributed his article on "James Martineau: A Saint of Theism." Sir Edward Russell commemorates his friend's genius for friendship, and speaks of him as among the first to welcome the idea of the Hibbert. "His adhesion gave strength to the project. Let thinkers face thinkers, thoughts face thoughts, in an ordered form, in lucid statement and courteous controversy. Let all convictions, all worthy speculations, all claimed discoveries have free course in an intellectual and devout arena. Such was the principle, the plan, that appealed to John Watson's individuality." Of himself it is said that "as befitted a Highlander, he loved vision. He believed in vision." Yet the results in his own life "were less mystical than might have been expected. They were rather an increase of simple but thought-out strenuousness; a reasoned spirituality manifested in a manly imitation of Christ; an evidenced sense of the joy of conscious life in the right way; a participation in the solidarity of the Christian communion."

Of the articles which follow, we have already called attention to that by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas on "The Free Catholic Ideal." Professor Royce, of Harvard, writes on "Immortality," with some criticism of the position taken up by his colleague, Professor Münsterberg, in his little book on "The Eternal Life," and an exposition of the meaning of personality and the relation of the finite to the infinite, which is only for those who can gird up their strength for keen metaphysical gymnastics. The real significance of personality Professor Royce finds in the will, both human and divine; but when, as a result of his exposition we come upon the statement that "The finite personality can say: 'In me, as now I am, God is dissatisfied with Himself just in so far as now He is partially expressed in me. I am a form of that divine dissatisfaction which constitutes the entire temporal order'"—we confess to a feeling both of repugnance and distrust.

The article on "Divine Immanence" by Professor Henry Jones will be welcomed with special pleasure by those of our readers who heard the substance of it given as an address at the meeting last Easter of the Ministers' Institute at Manchester College, Oxford. The conception of God as immanent, says Professor Jones, was implicit all along in the idea of evolution, but the difficulties of the reality of error and of sin in the world have to be met; and having referred to two attempted methods of reconciliation, which cannot satisfy, he proceeds:—

"Meantime, I am tempted to believe that the responsible and earnest religious thought of this age will seek some other way of admitting the reality of evil and genuine freedom of choice—a way that is compatible with the Divine Immanence and the Divine Perfection. Such a way it is indeed seeking already, by the aid of the conception of Transcendence. Not in mere transcendence, it is true; for mere transcendence is the mere difference of the infinite from the finite, as mere immanence is their simple identity. Mere transcendence removes God beyond the ken of man, and makes him the negation of all we know. It pronounces the finite world undivine, shuts it down under a hard, limited horizon, robs it of all its suggestiveness, and lightens it of its freight of meaning, and it leaves man's spirit secular, uninspired, alien to its God, and bereft of the splendour of its spiritual possibilities. Unless my analysis of the religious consciousness is altogether false, it must endeavour somehow to maintain both the Immanence and the Transcendence of God. It can yield up neither of the two conceptions, except with its own life. Actual living religion, the religion which is both trust and devotion, requires a God who is very near to man, the life within his life, the truth, the inner essence, the very substance of his being; and yet it demands a God who transcends finite reality, and from the very fulness of His perfection is known to us only as in a glass, darkly." (p. 751.)

In a beautiful passage, full of prophetic hope, Professor Jones pictures the deep underlying purpose in the great body of modern religious thinking, tending by different ways to the one great end, and then goes on to describe what are the essentials of a true spiritual communion between man and God. We are tempted to quote the whole passage (pp. 759-60), beginning, "Under all its variety of forms, religion has always one characteristic which is obvious enough—it is always a life, and always a devout or devoted life," and concluding "Somehow or other, the integrity of his personality and the freedom of his will remain intact, and yet he can say 'it is God which worketh in me, both to will and to do of His good pleasure.' It may be difficult to see how this is possible; but that the religious consciousness demands this deep identification of wills and still retains their independence is undeniable." We must, however, be content with this indication of it, for we want another passage even more, and that is towards the end of the article, where, having referred to the conception of final absorption as a favourite of devout spirits, Professor Jones adds:—

"But I should like to cast doubt upon it. It seems to me to be the outcome of the old, persistent error that the Immanence of God and the independent personality of man are somehow at war. But it is not justified by any analogy that we can draw from our nearer experience. What our experience here seems to teach us is that, as different persons participate more deeply in the same truth, and learn more fully to know and to perform in their particular context and station the duties that the same universal good through city, or state, or mankind prescribes to them, their individuality deepens. They become more themselves in becoming liker God. In the harmony of the future each particular note will retain its own full value. There is no tension so strong as when great personalities contend for different ends; there is no harmony so deep as when they pursue the same purposes. It would seem to me that we must allow every good man to sing each note full-throated; to play his own part to the uttermost, if the harmony of the divine service is to be perfect praise. I am tempted to believe that there is a higher for man and a greater for God than absorption. Whether we should, or should not, consider that God Himself evolves through His participation in the life of His children, and His indwelling, I do not ask. In either case, His love is not less, nor His light nor His Power, if they are reflected back upon Him from spirits that in devoting themselves, regain themselves, and in giving themselves to His service, have without end, ever greater selves to give." (p. 766). There is, we are convinced, profound spiritual truth in those words, and we repeat them here with great thankfulness to the teacher who has given us this exposition of what is implied in the doctrine, rightly understood, of the Divine Immanence.

The next article, by Professor McGiffert of New York, on "Divine Immanence and the Christian Purpose," furnishes a useful corrective to some of the teaching of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's "New Theology," and the Bishop of Clogher follows with a helpful exposition of "The Sufficiency of Christian Ethic." Another American article is by Dr. W. R. Huntington, rector of Grace Church, New York, on "Tract No. XCI." "The Articles of Religion from an American Point of View"—which is that the Articles are a stumbling block, which should be removed out of the way of young men aspiring to the ministry of the Church. The Creeds are sufficient, with the interpretation furnished by the Liturgy of the Church. "The Thirty-Nine Articles are a sixteenth century episcopal residence of many rooms, some of them much out of repair; but the creeds are like Stonehenge and the Pyramids." Dr. Huntington would have the Articles removed from the Prayer-book and placed "with reverent and loving hands" in the Archives of English Religion. Would the worship of the Church be any poorer, or the people further removed from spiritual communion with the living God, if the Creeds also were removed?

We would gladly have lingered over other articles: Mr. Warde Fowler's on "Religion and Citizenship in Early Rome," Mr. P. E. Matheson's on "Character and Citizenship in Dante," and Canon Barnett's on "The Religion of the People," with its high ideal of the work education has now to do for the advancement of the people in genuine religion. Everyone interested in the training of children should ponder the wise words of Professor Findlay of Manchester, on the teaching of religion, a propos of Sir Oliver Lodge's Catechism, which, he says, is really only good for grown-ups. "To the great question," he concludes, "with which this catechism opens,

'What are you?' I reply on the child's behalf, 'I will tell you when I am of age to answer!'

But we must reserve our final word for what strikes us as the least satisfying article in this most excellent number, that by Mr. James Collier, of Sydney, Australia, on "Who is the Christian Deity?" It appears to us crude in its presentment and very far from convincing, in spite of the great array of evidence for its thesis that "Christ is the Christian God." It is an array which proves repeatedly quite unreliable. The quality of Mr. Collier's judgment may be gathered from his assertion that in the teaching of the Apostle Paul "the Father was being superseded by a new deity," and the sweeping statement that among modern Congregationalists and Nonconformists generally "Christ alone is worshipped." Then we come to the astounding assertion that "James Martineau put forward Christ worship as 'a way out of the Trinitarian controversy,'" followed by a total misrepresentation of the argument and purpose of Dr. Martineau's well-known essay with that title. Martineau does not say that Unitarians "really worship the Son." What he says is that the Father whom they worship, the God and Father of Jesus Christ, is not the far-off "Father" of the orthodox creed, but One in whom are all those intimate spiritual attributes which orthodox believers conceive of as in "the Son" of their creed. And the way out of the Trinitarian controversy is for Unitarian and Trinitarian to recognise that there is only the one Eternal God, whom they both alike worship, though under different names, recognising in Him the same spiritual qualities and intimate communion with the children of men. But while Trinitarians have called this supreme God "the Son," and Unitarians call Him "Father," as Jesus did, He is certainly not simply the Christ of evangelical invocation. Another instance of Mr. Collier's failure in true discernment we note in his reference to "the maternal Deity of Channing and the bi-sexual Deity of Parker." Theodore Parker in his prayers did indeed address God both as Father and Mother, but that surely was the spontaneous utterance of his tender piety; it is not to be set down as a piece of gross externalism "borrowed from the Roman Jupiter pater et mater, or from the bi-sexual Deity of the Stoics." Another Boston Unitarian, James Freeman Clarke, is also brought in, but quite gratuitously, to witness to Mr. Collier's thesis. It is true that in 1841 Mr. Clarke established a "Church of the Disciples" in Boston, and wrote to his sister that what he wanted to form was "not a congregation of Unitarians, but a Church of Christ." The members were to be gathered for "co-operation together in the study and practice of Christianity," and their declaration of faith was "in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God." But that he ever recommended a young minister, as Mr. Collier says he did, "to preach faith in Christ as the Omnipotent God," is a preposterous assertion to anyone who knows what the religion of James Freeman Clarke really was. No less misleading is the reference to Keshub Chunder Sen and his attitude towards Christ. An article so full of inaccuracies appears to us unworthy of a place in the Hibbert.

We note among the valuable reviews of books with which this number concludes that the first place is given to two reviews of Mr. R. J. Campbell's "The New Theology," by Father Tyrrel and Dr. Hastings Rashdall.

COLLYER'S "FATHER TAYLOR."*

SOME little time ago we welcomed with great pleasure the re-issue by the American Unitarian Association of the major part of Robert Collyer's "A Man in Earnest," his biography of "Augustus Conant," in the series of "True American Types." This other little book is new, and it is delightful to have the veteran, with all his old charm, recalling in this way the memory of his friend, the unconventional Methodist seamen's chaplain in Boston, a kindred spirit, indeed; just such a child of nature, and of a true and tender humanity, as Robert Collyer himself.

The book opens with a picture of a May morning prayer-meeting in Dr. Bartol's church in Boston, in Anniversary week, where Collyer first saw and heard Father Taylor, and received from him at once an affectionate greeting. They both belonged to the old Methodist Church, but Collyer had then become a Unitarian, and the Unitarians of Boston were Father Taylor's constant friends. Channing delighted in him, and was the first subscriber to his Bethel, when it came to be built.

"This," says Mr. Collyer, having told of his address on that May morning, "was Father Taylor, the waif, when we first hear of him, mothered by a poor woman in Richmond, Virginia. A cabin boy and man before the mast, a farm labourer for a spell, and shoemaker, or it may be, only a cobbler, a tin pedlar, and a Methodist local preacher, then a preacher in full orders, and finally seamen's chaplain in the city of Boston. 'Jeremy Taylor in butternut,' Harriet Martineau said, and the only man this side the sea Charles Dickens went to hear on his first visit to these States; the man who delighted Jenny Lind also, and Miss Bremer, and Mrs. Jameson, among those who heard him from the old world; the man in whose large, sunny heart John A. Andrew loved to sun himself to the last, and whose face was so radiant in his home that his little daughter made up her mind this was what made the flowers open in the living room."

Edward Taylor was born in 1793, and could not read till he was eighteen; then about 1828 his work in Boston began, and he lived till 1871. The best account of him so far, J. W. Chadwick said in his life of Channing, was to be found in Dr. Bartol's "Radical Problems" (pp. 323-348). Mr. Collyer tells the story with great gusto, and with affectionate sympathy. It is a vivid picture he presents of the man among his sailor folk, delightfully unconventional, with flashes of indignation at any pretence in religion, or any patronage of his sailors by superior people, full of humour and great tenderness. It was he who said of Emerson, that, if he went to hell, "he would change the climate, and the tide of immigration would turn that way." Listening to a gloomy sermon one day he said: "That man preaches as if he had killed someone." Indignant with religious "professors," ruled by self-interest, he said it "would take more grace to save such men than it would take skim milk to fat an elephant." Of his own unworldliness and great unselfishness many instances are given. Here is one:—

"His last journey over sea was in the Macedonia, the good ship sent from Boston to Ireland loaded with provision in the black year of the potato famine. They made him chaplain of the holy mission, and saw that he had quite a splendid personal outfit; but when he returned home he had barely the clothing to keep him decent and warm. He had given all he had, piece by piece, to the poor creatures, but they had given him a fine bundle of canes—blackthorns—and two Irish terriers. These dogs, he said, were just what he wanted, for Mother now would never be troubled any more with rats."

The whole of this little book would go into less than half a number of the INQUIRER, and it is full of good stories, which we should like to repeat, but all the friends of Robert Collyer in this country will want to read the book for themselves. We must be content with one more picture of the old man among his sailors.

"When Father Taylor was preaching on the parable of the wedding garment and pictured the wedding guests crowding to the supper in their brave attire, beautiful to see, while those who had no garments to honour the feast were turned away, one poor fellow in shirt sleeves, entranced by the spell, and feeling that his chances of the wedding supper were slipping away, started to his feet in great dolor and cried: 'I ain't to blame, don't leave me out, I lost everything I had in the wreck of my vessel on the coast and had to come here with no jacket.' So perfect was the picture and real to the 'boys' that a score of jackets were stripped in a score of seconds, while they shouted, 'Take mine, take mine, and mine!' And Father Taylor ran up to him with the tears running down his furrowed face, put his arms about his boy, and cried, 'Why, Jack, I would not have left you out for the world if I had known you had been wrecked. You won't think hard of me, will you?'"

THE TOWN CHILD.*

MR. BRAY'S book on the town child is a valuable survey of the environment which helps to mould the character of town dwellers, and especially children, with a review of educational and other influences which correct to some extent the one-sided development of the child of the crowded area, and suggestions of practicable means of increasing such aids to a wholesome, complete life.

Mr. Bray believes that man has power over environment, and that environment has power over man, therefore that while we cannot by an effort change everything, nor perhaps do much by any one effort, we can help to make things move in a right direction.

Accepting the problem of the modern town, such as London, Manchester or Leeds (and it is the London child evidently that he has most in mind) he shows sympathetically and with insight the educational influences, more potent than any formal schooling, of the ordinary surroundings and events of the life of a child in a large modern town, and contrasts them with those of a country village and its occupations. He is not writing of the country child, he tells us, or he would have something to say of the lack of some good influences in the country districts, depleted of intellectual and practical vigour by the constant flow of the young and strong and capable to the town. But the town child's deprivation of wholesome natural influences is far greater than that of his country cousin.

The chapter on "Environment and Man," in which the effects of town environment are traced on the body, the mind, and the character, is one of the best in the book, and a useful contribution to the understanding of the subject.

In the sub-conscious region in which are registered the impressions which have more result in character and action than any definite teaching, the continued influence of the habits, affections and surroundings of the home and daily life are most influential. What the child does and sees and feels every day in the ordinary course makes him what he will be. In the country, everything in nature is "on a large scale." "She is never over-hasty, but is content to develop her subject slowly. The corn does not sprout from the seed and ripen in a night; the acorn does not grow into an oak in a year; the seasons do not spin round like some bewildering wheel of life." "She shows the same familiar fields and woods, now green with the freshness of spring, now brown and golden with the hues of autumn, and now white with the winter snow." There is order, proportion, patience, continual change of detail, with continuous development. Use and beauty are closely related. The sense of a power other than man, yet beneficently related to man in his various needs, is learned without formal lesson.

In the town the street is typical. "It is the abode of irrelevant, disconnected and casual change. Its panorama, in all the endless variations, produces no conception of a world of phenomena related through cause and effect, and merely serves to fill the mind with a whole lumber-room of useless, though perhaps entertaining rubbish." It is of man as cause of nearly everything that the child will naturally feel and think in such conditions. "He is continually called on to adjust his actions to some alteration of the environment. By frequent practice he acquires an unusual dexterity in the task. He develops a phenomenal sharpness and readiness of resource; that rapid perception of the new, accompanied by a decision how to meet it. But there is no permanent set of the mind in this attitude towards the world."

It is easy to understand the characteristic lack of reverence among town dwellers, i.e., those who live in the town all the year and know no other environment, and it is manifest that literature, art, and most of the intellectual pursuits are greatly lacking in appeal to those who know nothing of the natural objects, acquaintance with which is pre-supposed by nearly all of them. Only a mechanical form of scientific interpretation can be readily conceived.

In discussing remedies and palliatives for the disadvantages of modern town life, Mr. Bray maintains that the living wage, i.e., to each man who is employed an income sufficient to keep himself and his family in health and decency, secured to him by Act of Parliament, is necessary. Thus only, he says, can we secure healthy bodies and decent training for children, if parental responsibility is to be recognised. Given a "living wage," the duties of parents can be met and may be enforced. There are three partners, he maintains, interested in the child—the father, the mother, and the State. The State must be concerned with the training of its future citizens, and has the right and duty to intervene. It has already done so by establishing a system of compulsory education. It must follow this with the free school meals, without which many children are unfit for schoolwork, and suffer physically through it. The free meal is, moreover, a contribution of the State to the rearing of its citizens, and is, he considers, justifiable, without any plea of poverty in the recipients. It is also a means of education in decency, good manners, and cooking. He would have widows who need maintenance supported by the State during the time of their widowhood and the immaturity of their children, as a matter of justice to the widow, and for the good of the community.

Mr. Bray pleads strongly for the country holiday for children, not a riotous day in a crowd, now and then, but a good spell of real country life. Its provision and organisation, he maintains, is a most religious duty, that should be undertaken by the churches in all town areas, since it is the best available means of restoring to some extent the sub-conscious influences through which religion thrives. He has much to say on the school curriculum worthy of consideration, but not possible to discuss in a brief notice. We are glad to find a clear recognition that credal teaching, whether non-religious or religious, is not the same thing as religion. Either a religious or a secular view of events must be given by a teacher of history and some other subjects. There is no possibility of being neutral, if the lesson is a living lesson.

Mr. Bray favours the concurrent endowment of credal teaching in the schools, but recognises that it is, in the present state of denominational feeling, impracticable. Would he, however, really like to have the little ones penned off and labelled according to the sects of their parents? His own sympathetic treatment of the childish religious nature hardly belongs to such a method.

"Looked at from some remote distance," says Mr. Bray, "the town seems full of the raw material which goes to the making of heroism. The life of the respectable unskilled labourer appears instinct with the spirit of the heroic. The long hours of strenuous effort, the daily privations, the work carried on in times of health and times of sickness, the recurrent periods of acute distress, all borne with a dumb and unresisting patience—is not this an existence well calculated to excite admiration, if it ever chanced to attract attention? The explorer, fêted on his return home by half a continent, does not in his travels undergo a tithe of these hardships, and yet is regarded as a hero, while the day labourer is noticed and praised by none. The life of the labourer lacks the element of the heroic, because it lacks the element of the ideal. It is not inspired by the conscious possession of a final purpose; it is not ennobled by the struggle to reach some distant goal."

This absence of ideal cannot be true of all day labourers, but as a general statement it is both forcible and true. In supplying the ideal, "religion with its wider appeal may hope for victory, where non-religion can look for at best only the triumph of a failure skilfully concealed." "On the plain of religion every meanest action is of eternal moment, every meanest person of priceless worth."

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

PIONEERS.*

THIS book gives a great mass of facts about seven famous men and one famous woman who, as it seems to the foremost gladiator of present-day Rationalism, ought to have places in the Pantheon of Freethought. Mr. Robertson is always stimulating, and we cannot help respecting his brilliant industry, his omnivorous reading and his courage. Of course, we have here, again, his curious views on English Universities, and his tireless onslaught upon "ordinary religious unreason," and his pages simply bristle with daring verdicts and breath-taking generalisations. His apologia for Machiavelli leaves us still feeling that Mr. Morley has got nearest the truth on that matter. And he seems to us to contradict himself, on pages 379 and 383, as to the alleged connection between Mary Wollstonecraft's attempted suicide, and the fact of her irregular union. His contribution to a final explanation of Bacon's commanding influence is a most valuable suggestion, of which more will no doubt be heard. As to Mr. Robertson's unfriendliness towards the Church, there is nothing for it but to be resigned. But in attacking Dean Milman in the essay on Gibbon, he appears to have fallen into an error. He says: "Milman not only calls Marcus Aurelius 'a violent and intolerant persecutor,' but asserts that 'the general voice of Christian history arraigns' him 'as withdrawing even the ambiguous protection of the former emperors, and giving free scope' to popular feeling against the Christians." Now, Mr. Robertson goes on, "We have the explicit testimony of Tertullian (Apol. V.) that Marcus decreed severe punishment against the unjust accusers of the Christtians." Mr. Robertson is here throwing himself not only against the whole consensus of modern historians (for he is certainly not ignorant of the mass of work that has been done since Mosheim, whom he refers to in this connection), but against Gibbon, whom he is defending by a counter-attack on Milman. For in Gibbon's Chapter 16 (under "Supposed Edicts of Tiberius," &c.) we are told that the two instances of supposed Imperial clemency mentioned by Tertullian, are very suspicious," and that "Marcus despised the Christians as a philosopher and punished them as a sovereign." At the present day the ordinary text-books speak of the supposed letter or letters of Marcus on which Tertullian founded his statement, about severe sentences against the accusers," as "spurious (e.g., "Murray's Student's Ecclesiastical History. Pt. I. p. 78, Note 1). Mr. Robertson does not inform us whether the letter on which Tertullian founds his statement is that given by Eusebius in "Hist. Eccles." IV. 13 (a difficult view by the way), as he only quotes V. 5, so that we have the somewhat amusing alternative that Mr. Robertson, with Tertullian, rests his case on the fable that Marcus was so impressed by the miracle of the Thundering Legion, that he became lenient to the Christians, and said so in another letter! Renan rejects these stories of leniency, and puts down the politeness of apologists like Melito and Tertullian to the fact that they were apologists. Mr. Addis, to cite another instance of the general view (i.e., Milman's) says that under Marcus, Christian blood flowed more freely than at any other time during the first two centuries.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HOLIDAY WITH GRANDFATHER.

I.

FRED and Susie had, all along, looked forward to spending their summer holiday at the seaside, but when the time came this could not be managed, so they were settling down to their mother's plan of a cheap holiday at home, with an occasional day trip to the nearest seaside place. Just before the end of the school term, however, a letter came from their grandfather to say that if they had no better plan he would be right glad to have them with him for a month.

The children had often heard their mother's wonderful stories of her old home, far away in the country, far from the smoke and dust of the great city. They had longed to see the old-fashioned garden, with its borders and beds, full of flowers all the year round from the time when the Christmas roses and the snowdrops came in January to the time when the latest chrysanthemums lingered at the end of December. Susie had longed to swing under the big apple tree in the orchard, "where mother used to play when she was a girl," while Fred yearned to dabble and search in the pond at the edge of the common, close by the wood, for in that pond there were multitudes of wee beasties, some of them beautiful, others gruesome, but all of them wonderful and full of interest to a lad of thirteen, whose mind was as open as his eyes when he found himself in Nature's Wonderland.

So when their grandfather's letter arrived there had been great rejoicing. A joint letter of thanks was written by the children, and mother forthwith set to work to get things ready for their departure.

Of course, Fred and Susie were busy with their own preparations also, Fred especially, for he had reached the collecting stage of schoolboy life, and was resolved to let no opportunity slip of adding rare or beautiful specimens to the school natural history museum.

This last institution was presided over by the science master of the school, a keen lover of Nature and of boys also. His appointment to the mastership during the spring term of the previous year had been a great event among the upper-form boys at the school. He had helped them to start and organise a most enthusiastic Field Club and Natural History Society. At first only fifth and sixth form boys were admitted, but the rule had been relaxed in Fred's case, because, though he was as yet only a fourth-form "kiddie," he was noted for his keen observing powers, and "wasn't a softie."

It was really the doing of the science master that Fred had been admitted, for the master's observant eyes quickly perceived that, with encouragement, the boy would soon develop into the cleverest naturalist of them all, and you may be quite sure that if Fred had been keen before, he was ten times keener after his admission into the fellowship of the Field Club; and when grandfather's letter came he foresaw a grand opportunity of adding to the school collection and to his own knowledge at the same time; most eagerly, therefore, did he enter into the preparations for the visit.

Fortunately, the letter had arrived a few days before the end of the summer school term, and Fred took the opportunity of consulting with his friend the science master as to what he had better take with him for the work of collecting. The result of the consultation was that the master lent Fred a whole lot of things in the way of specimen tubes and bottles, nests of cardboard pill boxes, setting-boards for insects, &c. But, best of all, he lent Fred a small easily worked microscope, with some small glass tanks and slides for the examination of minute pond life.

Oh, how glad and proud Fred was when the master offered to lend him this treasure! He wanted to tell the master that it was too great a privilege, and he wanted in the same breath to express his overflowing gratitude; and a big lump came in his throat so that he only gave a sort of choking gasp. But the master understood quite well all that the lad wished to say, and he told Fred that he had entire confidence that he would take good care of the little microscope, and that he, the master, had more delight in lending it to so earnest a young student than in using it himself.

When Fred reached home with all these treasures, which one of the sixth-form boys had helped him to carry (just think of that now, all you fourth-form "kiddies"!), his sister Susie, who often teased, but really almost worshipped her brother, kept giving little squeals of delight as, one after another, the things were displayed and their uses explained. But when the microscope, which Fred had kept as the last and greatest surprise, was displayed, she was at first mute with astonishment, and then, to express a joy too great for words, began to waltz round the room "like a silly," as Fred said, though he felt like doing the same himself, only his sense of dignity prevented him.

The science master had been careful not to supply Fred with all the things he was likely to require, well knowing that every young naturalist takes the greatest delight in making his own tools for himself as far as he can do so.

Thus some of the boy's pocket money was spent in purchasing muslin, wherewith to make nets for the capture of all sorts and conditions of insects that fly in the air, as well as their younger brothers and sisters, who spend their childhood and youth in the waters of pond and stream.

In the making of these nets Susie's fingers, clever with needle and thread, were always at the service of her beloved brother, whilst he, as a surprise for her, bought half a quire of blotting-paper, and made therewith a fine quarto book, between the leaves of which Susie could press the wild flowers gathered during their rambles. I believe she was as proud of this as her brother was of the microscope. There is no joy greater than that which comes from the practical encouragement which those whom we love and look up to give us when they entrust us with the means of doing good work well. The gifts of God are just of this sort, for they always add to our power to do, and to do well. They are talents, meant for use.

And now I must leave it with you to imagine all the rest of the preparations, and, when at last the time came, the leave-taking with mother, for they were to travel by themselves. It was just a little trying, especially to Susie, to say "Good-bye" to the dear mother. Fred also felt that troublesome lump coming in his throat, but he swallowed it down and went to see that the luggage was safely stowed in the guard's van, and doing this kept him from showing that the lump was there all the time.

It was a long railway journey, express at first, then the train stopped at several small town and village stations, and, at last, arrived at the little countryside station at which they were the only passengers to alight.

The jolly, kind-faced guard, who had really been keeping an eye on them all along the journey, though he did not let Fred think so, for fear of hurting his manly feelings, passed them on to their grandfather, who was at the station awaiting them.

Next week I will tell you about their walk to grandfather's house, and what they saw on the way.

THOMAS ROBINSON.

THE spiritual world is not a realm far off in space, into which we shall be introduced by the event of death. Rather is it that order of being of which we are to have cognizance by the powers that already wait within us; and death will not so much remove us as remove from us the obstructions that closed us in from its unseen illuminations.—E. THEIR GRAND OLD MEN.

WE spoke last week of the happiness with which many of us are now turning our faces Westward, in anticipation of the meeting in Boston next month of the International Congress of Religious Liberals. We spoke of the great tradition of New England, and the memory of teachers, whose names must ever be closely linked with Boston and its immediate vicinity. But while we honour them, and shall gladly make pilgrimage to places sacred to their memory, and reverently cherish gifts of the deeper life, which we have received and continually receive from them, there are greetings, which we also hope to receive, from veterans still in the field of service, whose presence will add for us a special happiness to this great gathering.

The three, whom we are about to link together in this note of reminder and anticipation, are held in such honour and affection, as naturally to suggest the title above set down; and two others should be named with them, both Englishmen, who early settled in America, and certainly have taken a strong hold upon the hearts of their adopted countrymen, Dr. S. R. CALTHROP, of Syracuse, N.Y., where he has ministered now for close upon forty years, and ROBERT COLLYER, whom, however, we cannot hope to see in Boston, since, to the delight especially of his old friends in Yorkshire, he will be over in this country.

Of our other three, two are ministers and one a layman, Dr. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, Chaplain of the United States Senate, the Rev. CHARLES GORDON AMES, of the Church of the Disciples in Boston, and Dr. CHARLES WILLIAM ELIOT, President of Harvard University.

Dr. HALE, the Nestor of Unitarian ministers, was ordained to the ministry in 1846. The friend of LOWELL and SAMUEL LONGFELLOW, "The Man without a Country," because at home everywhere and in every heart, no one in these latter days has had a more pervasive influence, in making the real meaning of religion clear, as the service of brotherly love, "In His Name," as a life which must be always doing God's will and furthering His Kingdom, in the daily concerns of men. Typical of his spirit are the Wadsworth Clubs, the "Lend a Hand" and similar societies, with their familiar motto: "Look up and not down, Look forward and not back, Look out and not in, and Lend a hand." In the lives of innumerable young people, not in his own country alone, Dr. HALE has been a wonderful influence for good, and if we name one matter in which as a citizen he has long taken foremost rank, it is as the wise and persistent advocate of Arbitration and International Peace.

Dr. AMES was ordained three years later than Dr. HALE, in a little Baptist church in the northern district of Ohio, and only later came into the Unitarian fellowship. He has long been known to us as one of the most vigorous and helpful preachers of the Liberal Faith, and was at one time editor of the Christian Register. It was in 1889 that he succeeded the late JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE as minister of the Church of the Disciples.

"Two forces," he said, in a sermon of retrospect after fifty years of ministry, "were at work to make me a preacher: interest in religion and interest in mankind, both blending in a spiritual interpretation of the world. They are the same forces which have produced the church. There was never a time when the thought of God did not penetrate me, nor when the sight of a human being did not make some kind of appeal." And at the close of the retrospect, in the same sermon, he made this confession:—

"One vision is granted to the older minister for which the younger must wait. In travelling steadily for fifty years, one comes in sight of scenery which was far beyond his early horizons. To a child, the cradle is all the world, the mother's face is all of heaven. It is very fair and sweet; but it is smaller than a mustard seed. The soul is born to a vaster inheritance. The little hands reach out for sun and moon, and the sky seems almost within touch. But the blue vault will deepen as the eye deepens; the infinity of space will become a mirror of God and destiny. Faith, hope, love, truth, law, grace, justice, mercy, duty, humanity, science, art, reason, friendship, society and GOD—all the great words yield a thousand times more meaning the longer the things they stand for are pondered, even as the real discovery of America has been extending ever since Columbus sighted its low-lying tropical shores. Oh, the length and the breadth, the depth and the height! Power, wisdom, and love are more than words; they are the realities of our life and of the world; we may multiply them by infinity and eternity. The wells of heaven are fathomless; the river of God is full of water. More and more do the deep things of the spirit disclose their solemn sublimities; creation takes on new splendors, the soul new dignity, existence new significance and value. These are glorious realities, and I know it, I know it!"

There were other confessions of unfulfilled ideals, which every earnest man of humble heart must make; but, in conclusion, Dr. AMES adopted Whittier's beautiful lines:—

"Sweeter than any sung,
My songs that found no tongue,
Nobler than any fact,
My wish that failed of act.

"Others shall sing the song,
Others shall right the wrong,
Finish what I begin
And all I fail to win.

"What matter, I or they,
Mine or another's day,
So the right word be said,
And life the sweeter made?

"Hail to the coming singers!
Hail to the brave light-bringers!
Forward I reach, and share
All that they sing or dare."

Dr. CHARLES W. ELIOT became President of Harvard when he was only thirty-five, and he is now seventy-three. What he has done for education will be told in the history of his country. Of him the Rev. GEORGE A. GORDON said in the Congregationalist four years ago:—"A more disinterested friend and servant than President ELIOT the American public has never known. He is a militant spirit and something more. The central quality of his being is a constant, courageous, dominating disinterestedness. He contends earnestly for the faith that is in him, but the contention is always pure and high. He lives where the winds carry no dust, where the storms refresh and strengthen, where shining ideals break in upon the tumult of existence with their guidance and their peace." His extraordinary term of service as President, Dr. GORDON went on to say, "has been marked by the steadily increasing confidence of the public in this great educational leader, by the growing sense of his far-sightedness, by the surmise, often dim indeed, and somewhat fitful, that his radicalism means an amazingly sound and vital conception of certain abiding interests, and a more intelligent and availing devotion to them. For more than thirty years he has been a great force in the world of education. He is to-day the most enlightened and authoritative mind in his vocation."

When Dr. ELIOT was seventy an address was presented to him signed by President ROOSEVELT and more than 9,000 graduates of Harvard University, in which, after having recorded how he was appointed so early in life as President, it was said:—

"With prophetic insight you anticipated the movements of thought and life; your face was toward the coming day. In your imagination the college was already the university. You have upheld the old studies and uplifted the new. You have given a new definition to a liberal education. The university has become the expression of the highest intellectual forces of the present as well as of the past. You have held from the first that teacher and student alike grow strong through freedom.

* * * *

"As a son of New England you have sustained the traditions of her patriots and scholars. By precept and example you have taught that the first duty of every citizen is to his country. In public life you have been independent and outspoken: in private life you have stood for simplicity. In the great and bewildering conflict of economic and social questions you have with clear head and firm voice spoken for the fundamental principles of democracy and the liberties of the people. More precious to the sons of Harvard than your services as educator or citizen is your character. Your outward reserve has concealed a heart more tender than you have trusted yourself to reveal. Defeat of your cherished plans has disclosed your patience and magnanimity, and your willingness to bide your time. Fearless, just, and wise, of deep and simple faith, serene in affliction, self-restrained in success, unsuspected by any man of self-interest, you command the admiration of all men and the gratitude and loyalty of the sons of Harvard."

That the International Congress is to be welcomed by President ELIOT to Harvard (having his son, Dr. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, as its own President) is one of the happiest features of the coming meetings. The presence of three such veterans, as these whom we have named, veterans, but, like CHANNING, "always young for liberty," will be welcomed with much gladness and thankfulness by all who realise what their life-work has signified.

THE Committee of the Liberation Society met this week and considered the business of the society's coming winter's work in securing English support to a Welsh Dis-establishment Bill. The meeting was interesting as being the last to be held in the old headquarters in Serjeants' Inn, the society having now established its chief offices at Caxton House, Westminster. The inconvenience of the City office, and the facilities afforded by proximity to the House of Parliament, have long been felt, and it is thought that the removal to Westminster will conduce both to efficiency and economy.

THE TABLE OF ST. FRANCIS.

WE read in "The Little Flowers" of how St. Francis and Brother Masseo, as they went on their way together, begged their bread in a certain town, and then proceeded to a quiet place of rock and rill to eat it. Francis was in fine spirit, but his comrade could not see the special blessedness of a situation in which there was lack of all things needful, a feast where there was neither cloth nor knife, plate nor porringer, house nor table, manservant nor maid-servant. Then quoth St. Francis: "This it is that I account vast treasure, wherein is no thing at all prepared by human hands, but whatsoe'er we have is given by God's own providence, as manifestly doth appear in the bread that we have begged, in the table of stone so fine, and in the fount so clear," and he prayed forthwith to God for a heartier love of that noble poverty, that is freedom of soul, which he and some others have indeed enjoyed.

The episode came to mind the other day when, finding myself unexpectedly rich—a crust worth exactly five pounds having dropped out of the blue into my lap—I proceeded to a rocky place apart from the city to eat it. And Brother Masseo this time had no complaint to make. The fact was, though anticipating the calendar by a few days, the glorious First of August had come,—happiest, holiest, healthiest feast of the year—the day on which, seventy years ago, some twenty million black slaves in the British Dominions were set free; an historic event which is annually celebrated by one of, perhaps, still greater moment and more dire necessity, when other twenty million slaves, less or more, throughout British and other dominions, they and their children and children's children, are emancipated for awhile from servitude. This time the slaves are white. Bond-servants though we be to our manifold tasks in office or warehouse, shop or mill, church or school, home or hospital—while there is a slavery not unknown of being served—the first of August is the day of freedom, and many are they who enjoy it, though August comes for some at other times of the year, and to some, alas! it comes hot at all.

The epoch serves to remind us, amongst other things, that we are more akin to that beggar's state in which Francis went his way without fear than we are prone to imagine. The release from the strain of forethought and industry, and the willing dependence on a providence which, without toil or care of ours, will find us all we want for a month, recalls to us how little, after all, we do for ourselves, albeit that little is indispensable, and how much is given us of the best. Right and reasonable was the sense of the husbandman, who, contemplating the abundance in his garden and orchard, remarked, "I come out and turn the earth a little, and scatter a few handfuls of seed here and there, and while I wait and while I sleep everything else is done, and all this is given me." That man had something of the spirit of St. Francis. He set his own work low, God's gift high. But as we were saying, we found the rock of St. Francis, with the "fair fountain" beside it, down in Cornwall, and as we brought forth of our wallet and dined we needs must note the quality and pattern of the tablecloth spread over the stone. It was worked in low tones of washable material. The colour, not of a kind to "fly," even in strong sunlight, of which there was no lack—grey ground with raised spots of white, flat patches of light yellowish green diapered with a cobweb of black lines, concentric frills of dull bronze, and blotches of orange-gold, and round the edge a shaggy grey-green fringe. This tablecloth, made of various lichens, which gave fresh significance to the saying "the living rock," was in itself a grace to the humblest repast. Once laid never to be removed, and proof for many a year against the rough usage of the roystering company of the storms which hold their festivities about it. Something also was there in the way of special table decoration, the flower or two, in the absence of which a meal is a stoking and not a sacrament, in the tuft of pink thrift rooted securely into a crack in the stone, and like the stonecrop beside it, defiant of torrid heat and drought. A pad of thyme had also fixed itself mysteriously into the surface, and peering up from over the edge were the exquisite turquoise flowers of the sheep's bit. It makes one happy to think of the strength and mirth which will be found during the next month or so around the rock tables set upon the sides of the mountains, and where the broken cliffs oppose the sea.

But not only as a table will the rock serve us in our seasoned hunger for sunlight and sweet air, for liberty and rest. "A man shall be as the shadow of a great rock." The supreme value of Nature to us is her revelation of our own human personality, and the measure in which she leads us to the admiration and love of man. Surely no figure exists that is more significant of all that by strength and by tenderness a man can be to his fellow than this of the prophet Isaiah's of the shadow of the rock in a weary land where no water is. The death-like prostration of the scorched lands of the East we never know here, happily, but we do know the exceeding gratefulness of the broad strip of shade on the northern and mossy side of a great rock mass when the heat of the sultry August sun has become almost unbearable. There, on the wild coast, or after the stiff climb from the mountain valley, where there is not a solitary tree to afford a like refuge, this solid, impenetrable mass keeps guard over its own gift of consolation. Thither we betake ourselves to rest, and fling ourselves upon the short, soft grass when rest has become imperative; to defence from the heat when the heat has become insupportable. We lie and listen to the lip-lap of the waters below, or to the beautiful monotony of the headlong torrent close at hand, or listen to nothing at all in the soundless air. Incomparable peace and tranquility are here, and there again in no way devised or wrought or earned by man himself, but wholly given. Just so perfect is the service of man to man, of the strong to the weak, of the wise to the ignorant, of the happy to the sad, even as the shadow of a great rock to the hot and weary traveller. A mighty exodus of a nation in the honourable bondage of work is now going on. The path of freedom and salvation lies by the seashore and across the sparkling waters, wherein pursuing cares are sunk and lost; through the wilderness of moorland and forest, and on to the mountains of God. And when, after its wanderings, the host returns, it will find itself in a new country, a land of milk and honey and of good promise it will call it, albeit the same land as that from which it set out with tired and longing spirit; because, fed meanwhile on that regenerating manna, the inspirations of the earth and sky, and rested on the bosom of the hills and in the shadows of the rocks and trees, man's heart will be braver, and his eye will be clearer, and his arm stronger, and therefore the old and tedious world will be a new and shining world again.

GOD'S GOOD OUTDOORS.

THOU who has set Thy dwelling fair
With flowers beneath, above with starry lights,
And set Thy altars everywhere—
On mountain heights,
In woodland valleys dim with many a dream,
In valleys bright with springs,
And in the curving capes of every stream—Thou who hast taken to Thyself the wings
Of morning, to abide
Upon the secret places of the sea,
And on far islands, where the tide
Visits the beauty of untrodden shores,
Waiting for worshippers to come to Thee
In Thy great out-of-doors!
To Thee, I turn, to Thee I make my prayer,
God of the Open Air!

From the prison of anxious thoughts that greed has builded,
From the fetters that envy has wrought, and pride has gilded,
From the noise of the crowded ways and the fierce confusion,
From the folly that wastes its days in a world of illusion, (Ah, but the life is lost that frets and languishes there),
I would escape and be free in the joy of the Open Air!

So let me keep
These treasures of the humble heart
In true possession, owning them by love;
And when at last I can no longer move
Among them freely, but must part
From the green fields and from the water clear,
Let me not creep
Into some darkened room and hide
From all that makes the world so bright and dear;
But throw the windows wide
To welcome in the light;
And, while I clasp a well-beloved hand,
Let me once more have sight
Of the deep sky and the far-smiling land—
Then gently fall on sleep;
And breathe my body back to Nature's care
My spirit out to Thee, God of the Open Air!
HENRY VAN DYKE.

SOCIETY still rests on selfish principles. Men sympathise still with the prosperous and great, not the abject and the down-trodden. But amidst this degradation brighter glimpses of Christianity are caught than before. There are deeper, wider sympathies with mankind. The idea of raising up the mass of human beings to intellectual, moral, and spiritual dignity is penetrating many minds.—Channing

THE CALL OF A NEW OPPORTUNITY.

THE sermon preached by the Rev. W. H. Drummond at the recent annual meeting of the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians, has been printed by request. "The Call of a New Opportunity" comes to us all just now, and it would be well for us to take Mr. Drummond's appeal to heart.

There is, he said, a rising tide of conviction in all our churches that we ought to do a larger and better work than we are doing at present, and that, so far from being content with the tillage of our inheritance, we ought to advance to the conquest and occupation of new territories. If we are to do this we see clearly the need of corporate sympathy and combined action. Men or churches, when they desire to act together, have to learn to subordinate private preferences to mutual arrangements, and they must call all the resources of practical wisdom to their aid. The Lord's battles must be fought, not by a rabble of enthusiasts, but with the skill and resources of a disciplined army. Even a march of pilgrims escaping from captivity needs to be organised, if a remnant is to reach their Zion. For the discussion of these matters affecting the practical details of corporate union, we shall have another opportunity.

Let me dwell now for a few moments on the underlying spiritual forces and motives.

1. We must believe firmly with deep kindling conviction that it is the work of God. Without this confidence in God and rejoicing in His presence, all our speech and our striving is mere empty breath. I need not argue with you why it should be so. To state it simply and clearly is to win the instant assent of all religious men. "The Lord hath done great things for us." This must be the beginning of all our effort, the confession of the heart which drives us forth to preach and to teach and work for God and His Kingdom. Let us go forward in its strength.

2. And this confidence in God, and this lively sense of His goodness must lead to consecration. It is the great need of the church everywhere, a complete dedication of itself to the essential things of worship, and Christian love and goodness. The attraction of the Church must be the attraction of the spirit of holiness and love. The power of the church must be the power of the Spirit of God in its midst. The victory of the church must be the victory of Jesus Christ over the spirit of evil and self-seeking in the world. This means a personal duty laid upon every one of us. It is your love and kindness and generosity, it is your deep love of goodness, it is your strong abiding in the faith of God and the power of His Spirit, it is your prayerfulness and your patient bearing of the Cross, which fills the church with the incense of worship and the redeeming energy of love. But, above all, the call for consecration comes to those who are appointed to be teachers and helpers of others. Brethren, every new opportunity lays upon us this solemn duty to be better ministers, better equipped in all the resources of heart and brain and will, to think less of ourselves, to care less for our own position and advancement, to be less indolent, less easily discouraged, to give ourselves with fresh earnestness to the work of preaching the Gospel and bringing healing and help to the sorrows and sins of men, finding here our supreme privilege and joy, if we may be counted worthy to share the reproach of Christ and to be numbered among the servants of His kingdom.

3. A new opportunity means the opening before us of larger ideas of goodness and service; an evangelical, a missionary motive should be the driving force in all that we do. Our aim is not to protect ourselves in a world of competing sects, or to secure comfort and content within the walls of our own paradise. We want to do good in richer and better ways, to preach the Gospel to all who need our help. We want, I say it with all reverence, we want to be more useful to God. Here in this great city our organised church-life should touch with enlightened wisdom and healing love the burning problems of life. It should go out to meet the rising tide of social unrest. It should seek to extricate itself from the narrowing prejudices of middle-class feeling, and realise the true socialism of the Church of Christ. It should grow continually in sympathy with the struggling and the poor, and all this it should do simply in obedience to the law of its being, for the church that is generous in sacrifice is always rich in victory, and the church that gives itself away for the redemption of the world feeds the fires of love in its own heart.

As we listen to these things, as we try to picture them in our own minds, do we seem to ourselves like those that dream?

Listen, there is a voice which speaks scornfully of our dream. It is the voice of the sceptic who distrusts all spiritual enthusiasms, and believes only in coercing men by appeals to their selfishness or their fear. Listen, there is a voice which bids us distrust our dream. It is the voice of the timid doubter, who tells us men have tried the same path before and they have always failed. In his better moments he yields to the beauty of the vision, but the difficulties keep him back from all practical tasks, and he remains an exile in a dry and weary land of barren discussion and dwindling faith. Listen, there is a voice which bids us have confidence in our dream and live to make it real. It is the voice of One who was despised and rejected of men, and put to silence by Scribes and Pharisees, and sent to die upon the cross by the inert, half-dead religious people of his day, which still haunts us through all our timorous moods and wayward backslidings:—"If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall remove mountains and nothing shall be impossible to you."

Brethren, we can, if we will, in the conquering might of the Grace of God; only it will cost something in the sacrifice of prejudice, in the choice of the difficult way, in generosity, in love, in faithfulness, in the hard work which fails not in patience. We can if we will; only it requires deep faith in God, who lives and loves for ever, who reigns upon the throne of the universe, and must reign on the throne of every heart.

Do we realise as we should what God has done for us, what He is doing for us day by day, in our homes, in our churches, in the great world of His providence, and care? By the comfort of His presence, by the unwearied patience of His love, by His gift of forgiveness and moral strength, by all the healing influences of His grace, God has done great things for us whereof we are glad. What are we going to do for God?

MORE HARVARD GRADUATES FOR THE MINISTRY.*

BY PRESIDENT CHARLES W. ELIOT.

THE American universities in general have a very strange policy towards the great subject of theology. Almost all of them exclude that supreme subject from their teaching. All of the State universities do this, and many of the endowed. On the other hand, the colleges, properly so called, were in large part founded by religious denominations, and were intended to promote actively the interests of their several denominations. Nevertheless, hardly any of the colleges make systematic provision for the thorough training of ministers. In New England, Harvard, Yale, Tufts, and Boston University, all endowed institutions, maintain departments of theology; but Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Amherst, Trinity, Wesleyan, Williams, and Brown, all of which were founded with strong religious motives, do not. The theological seminaries are for the most part detached from universities and colleges. Even when a seminary is placed beside a college, it is common to find the seminary property held by a corporation entirely distinct from the corporation of the college, as at Princeton. The detached denominational seminaries are at great disadvantage, and most of them are maintained with difficulty, even if well endowed.

Under these circumstances it is not surprising that institutions of the higher education, which formerly sent many men into the ministry, no longer do so. You may read on the College Gate that the training of ministers for the churches was the prime object in view at the founding of Harvard College; but now the College sends but a small percentage of its graduates into the ministry, although it does better in this respect than most of its neighbours. Amherst, Williams, and Dartmouth have had a similar history. The theological department of Yale University is mainly recruited from other colleges and schools, and only to a small extent from Yale College. These facts indicate that the ministry does not hold the high place in the social organisation which it used to hold, and that the other professions, learned or scientific, have stronger attractions for well-bred and well-trained young men of force and character. Moreover, the number of serviceable professions has more than doubled, and the university prepares men for them all. Hence a smaller proportion of college men goes into the ministry.

In this hall, sixty-nine years ago, Ralph Waldo Emerson said of the ministry that it was the first office in the world—a holy office, coeval with the world—and that Christianity had given us all two inestimable advantages, the Sabbath, the jubilee of the whole world, and the institution of preaching. This doctrine is just as true to-day as it was two generations ago, and it is my faith in it which leads me to-night to try to persuade you that more Harvard men should go into the ministry.

It is more than fifty years since I began to watch the stream of young men going out from Harvard College year by year into the work of the world; and I have therefore had an unusual opportunity to appreciate the common motives and desires of the young men who constitute this living stream. I think the men trained in Harvard College almost universally desire three things for themselves in their subsequent careers: (1) they want to be serviceable to their families, their associates, and the community; (2) they want to be free to think, say, and do what they really believe in; (3) they want to grow in efficiency and influence all through their lives. Let me enlarge a little on these three desires, which I believe to be common to many Harvard graduates.

The desire to be serviceable does not exclude, or interfere with, the desire for personal success. Indeed, the two go admirably together, and form the modern youth's interpretation of the command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." The sentiment often goes to this length,—that none but the eminently serviceable man can rightly be called successful. Secondly, the desire for freedom of thought, freedom of speech within the limits of gentle and considerate manners, and freedom in action from all bonds of fear, self-interest, and social, industrial, or professional conformity. Harvard men have been brought up in a place where freedom has been a sort of passion. Naturally, they tend to select occupations in which they can be sure of freedom. Thirdly, the hope to grow during one's whole life includes the desire to be free from a clerical or mechanical routine and from the narrowing influence of repetitive or automatic labour. This hope for growth implies freedom, and also those conditions of continuous intellectual and spiritual nourishment which make growth possible. The young Harvard graduate wants an occupation for life which promotes a continuous enlargement in knowledge, sympathy, efficiency, and dignity.

This state of mind on the part of the graduates is an indirect result of the atmosphere or general tone of the University. Truth is the motto of the University, and truth-seeking one of its chief occupations. The University, however, recognises that its sons may be captivated by different aspects of the truth, and carry into after-life many varieties of opinion, purpose, and aim. When some critic pointed out to President James Walker that graduates of Harvard College were to be found in opposing political parties, in all sorts of religious denominations, and in all schools of thought, and that they were often contending one against the other, Dr. Walker replied that Harvard College did not expect or desire to see all its graduates going into one political party or one religious denomination, or embracing one philosophy or social theory, but did hope that, to whatever party or denomination or school a Harvard graduate might attach himself, he would always be found in the more liberal portion of that party, denomination or school.

Let us now consider whether the ministry under modern conditions can fairly meet these common wants or desires of Harvard men. In the first place, the minister can be highly serviceable. He has the great function of preaching, the weekly opportunity of setting before a group of well-disposed men and women the best ethical views on all human experiences, common or exceptional, and the highest motives for right action in all the emergencies of life. The good preacher enlightens, cheers, and guides. He may sometimes denounce or condemn; but, in general, he shows men and women how to walk through this world lovingly and nobly. He may sometimes be a warning prophet, but he is chiefly an inspirer of high motives and of good ruling sentiments. In those denominations which permit extemporaneous public prayer the minister possesses that tremendous means of influence. Leading in prayer worthily is the most exalted effort of the human mind. The power of such prayer is persuasive and enduring beyond all imagination. It may at any moment give to the listener a thrill which runs through all his being, and determines the quality, not only of his own life, but of many of those lives which will derive from his. The minister may be infinitely serviceable through the advice he gives in private to persons anxious, bereaved, tempted, or gone astray. This function of advising requires sympathy, insight, and, above all, wisdom; and these qualities are gained or perfected only through experience, so that the young minister may hope to gain more and more of this influence as his years increase. The minister may also be greatly serviceable by attending to the social functions of a modern church. A well-organised, large city church has a wide-spread effect for social improvement through its various schools, clubs, leagues, entertainments, and hospitalities. Every active church is a centre of good works for the improvement of society, and offers to young people and newcomers many safeguards against evil, as well as incitements to good. When we consider that ethical progress is the only real progress in human society, material gains being chiefly good as they contribute to, or supply the necessary conditions of, moral gains, we realise how direct or immediate is the work of the church, and of the minister at the head of the church, not only for the uplifting of individual men and women, but for the progress of mankind toward nobler living.

When we conceive of a highly successful minister, we ordinarily think of him as the head of a large city church; but it seems to me that the function of the country minister is a fine one, and latterly an improving one in New England. There has set in a real turn of thoughtful, cultivated families from the city to the country, especially during the warmer eight months of the year. The country schools are improving; there are but four or five towns in Massachusetts which have not access to free books; and telephones, good roads, and improved means of transportation are making possible a large amount of human intercourse at isolated houses in the country. Four sorts of men now co-operate to strengthen and enliven the intellectual life in rural communities—the minister, the physician, the teacher and the public spirited man of leisure. The minister can be a leader in all the intellectual life of the countryside. It must be confessed, however, that in many instances the salary of the country minister is too small to enable him to educate his family well, keep himself supplied with books and other means of intellectual growth, and acquit himself appropriately in his high function. Therefore, well-trained young men who possess the needed mental gifts, and who also have some pecuniary resources either by inheritance or by marriage, ought to aspire to the occupation of the country minister, just as well-to-do young men are going into the profession of medicine, not so much with the purpose of practising medicine, as of advancing medical knowledge and skill. These two missionary callings ought to attract fitting young men who possess in whatever way a modest independence, as regards money.

Freedom of thought and speech for a minister is a somewhat recent acquisition. In former times a young man enlisted in the service of a given church or denomination, and after that enlistment was subject for life to the peculiar discipline and dogmas of that church or denomination. He joined the Roman Church or the Anglican Church or the Lutheran Church for life, and had no expectation of changing his opinions or ever questioning the authority of the church with which he had united. There is now a much greater freedom of choice among denominations for the young man who wants to be a minister. The young Harvard graduate who thinks to be a minister may make his choice among the denominations in accordance with his own temperament, capacities and intellectual needs, securing that degree of freedom in the future which he personally desires or needs for his best mental and spiritual development. He must make this first choice with wisdom and well-grounded confidence in himself, else he may sow the seeds of grave afflictions in his subsequent career. In many Protestant denominations the bonds of creed and canon, and even of ritual, have been much relaxed of late years; while in several denominations the minister once admitted to full standing, enjoys an almost perfect freedom within the limits of gentle manners and of just consideration for the freedom of others. The great progress made within a generation in Biblical criticism, in the comparative study of religions, and in the history of Christianity, has naturally led to a great increase of freedom of thought and speech, not only in the various religious denominations themselves, but in society at large, and has furnished new grounds for that universal toleration which mankind first arrived at through centuries-long experience of the physical and mental horrors of religious intolerance. For more than a century past all history, philosophy, science, and poetry have been re-enforcing and amplifying the policy of toleration and the demand of civilised mankind for freedom in religious, as well as political, thought and action. The profession of the ministry has fully shared this general progress of mankind toward freedom. If, then, the young Harvard graduate determines wisely at the start what amount of freedom of thought he really needs, and is likely to need, for the satisfaction of his religious nature, he need not fear that he will not enjoy as a minister an adequate freedom of thought and speech.

The fateful choice of a denomination used to be made at the beginning of a three years' course of theological study: it can now be postponed till the close. The Harvard Divinity School is an undenominational school of theology, whose graduates are welcome in a great variety of denominations. Its students remain perfectly free during their whole period of professional study. The increase of liberty in the evangelical denominations is strikingly illustrated in the recent abandonment by the trustees of the Union Theological Seminary of their former requirement, that all professors in the Seminary subscribe to the Westminster Confession. Even those denominations which are held by a liturgy, or by one or more peculiarly valued rites, to archaic expressions of religious belief, nowadays permit to their clergy a remarkable latitude in interpreting those expressions.

Finally, a devoted and active minister may grow in wisdom and power all his days. An enlarging conception of truth, a wider sympathy, and an ampler hope are the influences which make men grow as years advance. In no profession can a man arrive at the whole truth, but in all professions the way to win more truth is one and the same. The modern world has not arrived at ultimate truth; but it has learnt the way to discover, little by little, step by step, more truth. It is the way of the inductive philosophy. A young university graduate in these days who has mastered this way to new truth—new to him, or perhaps new to the world—and believes in this way, has in him one great element of perpetual growth, and the kind of growth will be the same, whatever his profession—the church, the law, medicine, engineering, architecture, business, or whatever other calling. In any profession we now know the way to personal, mental, and moral enlargement. The co-operative spirit is also in every profession a way to enlargement, and this spirit belongs to no profession in higher degree than to the ministry; and the hopeful, optimistic spirit, is enlarging, and no profession ought more perfectly and constantly to foster this spirit than the ministry, because the ministry is always dealing with the best sides of human nature and the best aspects of human society, and is always holding up and promulgating the highest spiritual ideals. A minister who is not an optimist must have been looking backward and not forward, down and not up.

I believe, then, that the minister's life may be serviceable, free, and enlarging, and this belief is with me the result of experience as well as of educational and social theory. I have known well, or have observed somewhat closely, a large number of ministers in many different denominations. Some I have watched from their youth to their age, and have therefore had the chance to compare them at the different stages of life. Those of them who have had that amount of freedom which contented them have possessed the natural gifts the minister needs, and have kept their minds full-charged by reading and observation, and their sympathies quick and warm have grown all their lives in mental stature, wisdom, and power. They have also mellowed with age, they have grown more sympathetic toward other beliefs, other religious practices, and other religions. The ministry sweetens and softens a man, making him more sympathetic and more loving. It is not a strenuous life, in the vulgar sense; but it is a full, varied, and bountiful life. It destroys nothing, hurts nothing, and poisons nothing. It crowds out evil by fostering good. It deals with the things that abide—faith, hope, and love. It works on behalf of the ethical principles on which real progress depends, and in the development of which real progress consists. In spite of the illusions of pleasure, wealth, and material prosperity, we all believe that the most durable satisfactions of life and the realest gains of mankind are ethical. Therefore, to become a serviceable, free, growing minister is a worthy ambition for any intelligent and high-minded young man.

THE second exhibition of cottages at Letchworth is far more valuable and interesting than the first. It presents a practicable model of the laying out of a five-acre plot near the centre of what will, in a few years, be a considerable provincial town. For this reason, the cottages are perhaps unexpectedly near together—twelve to the acre—and, to some extent, inevitably overlook one another. But they present, even in the still unfinished condition of several, a charming group of harmonious and compact buildings, surrounded by grass, gardens and sunshine. The grouping of the houses is of special interest. The monotony of the street does not exist here; by setting back one block of cottages, and arranging five others about three sides of a square, whose fourth is formed by the road, a pleasing variety and interest is given to "Middle Street." The cottages themselves are so planned as to be without the unsightly outbuildings which usually disfigure the backs; and this makes it possible to give a sunny outlook to an exceptionally large proportion of the houses, even though built in near proximity. The internal planning is, upon the whole, convenient for the purpose of these cottages, whose occupants will be working-people, not week-end residents. The "cheap £150 cottage" is not in evidence, prices ranging from £175 to £225. A large proportion of the houses have been built by the Letchworth Cottages and Buildings Company, whose preference shares are guaranteed by First Garden City, Limited.—formed with the object of providing suitable dwellings for the rapidly increasing numbers of labourers and artisans. The designs are the independent work of a number of architects, and the building has been carried out by local contractors. Besides these urban cottages there is an exhibit of small-holders' home-steads; but owing to the bad spring weather, only a few of these have yet been completed. They serve to remind the visitor of another side of the housing problem which Letchworth is attempting to solve.

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF "VAN" WORK.

ON the principle advocated by Aunt Mary Emerson that one should do what he is afraid to do, others beside myself will doubtless go out to the Van. The seven days' service in my case being over, I may give encouragement by some notes on my experiences.

We have had stimulating variety at any rate. Our audiences numbered over a thousand one time, less than a hundred another. We have had a score or two of noisy children rushing about us with no effort on the part of their elders to check them, and we have had attention the most absolute and undisturbed. There has been some rough shouting and ridicule, and, on the other hand, we have had many a proof of goodwill and appreciation. The platform of a van is not a place for the man who minds anything but his subject and how to get it home to the people. It is not a "Coward's Castle" by any means. The cause and the man must be their own defence, and if the man feels weak he has the greater need to be quite sure that his cause is strong.

We have had many types of mind to deal with. Travelling in the district near the scene of Mr. Hopps's recent visit, we found in some degree the same spirit as he described recently in these columns. To many thousands in the Home Counties the devil is very much alive—apparently a much more real factor in their religion than any Holy Spirit. Hell, stubbornly, a little shamefacedly, maintained its claim now and again. But the literal inspiration of the Bible stands out as the prevalent notion in the audiences we addressed. "What does the Bible say?" is the repeated thrust at the missionary. Should he quote the Revised Version he is told that that is not the real Bible—one heckler preferred "St. James's" translation! With all this reliance on the "Word of God," as it is called, one observes considerable vagueness as to what it records. "What did Jesus say to Nicodemus?" "Thou hast kept all the commandments from thy youth," so began one champion of orthodoxy, who, with some half-dozen others, were with us one evening in the van. It was pointed out that Nicodemus could not be the person referred to. "Then it was the centurion," replied the other. Well, one intelligent young workwoman, who rather sadly said she did not know what her religion was, told us there would be more reading of the Bible now than there had been about those parts for many a year. We left them plenty of literature to help.

At St. Albans we had some taste of a curate's Greek; happily, Griesbach's New Testament was at hand. He maintained that the saying "I and the Father are one (ἐν)" implies "one substance," since the neuter of the numeral is used. We suggested that Paul and Apollos were also said to be "one" (1 Cor. iii. 8). Were they "one substance"? The curate queried whether the neuter (ἐν) would be used there. We looked it up, amid the breathless attention of some 200 or 250 people—surely a sight to remember! The Greek supported us, alas! and the curate said no more.

On the whole, however, one felt that the more straight he went to the point and dealt with the realities of life, the moral law, the need of a more intelligent faith, the claims of Jesus as an inspirer of a life, practical, hopeful, and loving, the more deep and genuine was the response in the minds and hearts around. I am persuaded that if Professor Jacks's corps of popular evangelists would but emerge there is need enough and promise enough to justify their work abundantly.

W. G. TARRANT.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting was held at the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, on Wednesday, July 17, when there was a good attendance of ministers and delegates, including the Rev. C. C. Coe, J. Burton, C. E. Reed, T. R. Skemp, E. J. Wilkins, W. T. Bushrod (of Chorley), and M. R. Scott (of Ainsworth), the preacher of the day. Mr. William Carter, Mr. B. Belben, Mr. W. H. Scott, Messrs. F. and G. Pinnock, Mr. T. Isted, and Miss Spencer, the hon. treasurer of the Association, were also present, with many members of the Southampton congregation.

The business meeting was held in the afternoon immediately after luncheon, the President, the Rev. C. C. Coe, being in the chair. The annual report was very encouraging in tone, and spoke of steady work throughout the district. Sympathetic reference was made to the losses by death of the former secretary of the Association, Mr. H. Blessley, and Miss C. Pinnock (of Newport).

The reports and the treasurer's statement (which was submitted by Miss Spencer) were adopted, on the proposition of the President, seconded by Mr. Wm. Carter.

The President and officers of the Association were re-elected, with the addition of Mr. Edgar Chatfield Clarke and Mr. Leslie Chatfield Clarke to the list of vice-presidents. Thanks were voted to the Southampton friends for their hospitality on the proposition of Mr. W. H. Scott (Bournemouth), seconded by Mr. B. Belben, of Poole. Rev. T. R. Skemp responded. Revs. C. E. Reed, J. Burton, W. T. Bushrod, and M. R. Scott also took part in the meeting, the latter in response to a welcome very heartily extended by the President. After tea in the Kell Memorial School, service was held in the church, conducted by the Rev. C. C. Coe, at which the Rev. Matthew R. Scott was the preacher. This brought a helpful day to a fitting close.

In the discussion on the vote for the Home Office, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald drew attention to the fact that as many as 14,500 factories were not visited by inspectors during 1906. He freely criticised the organisation of this most important department, and poked fun at the methods of examination by which factory inspectors are selected. There can be no question that the staff must continually be strengthened and rendered more efficient as its task increases in magnitude and complexity.

COLONIAL LETTER.

SOUTH AFRICA.

WHEN our friend Mr. Tyssul Davis was here, he said to me: "We in England do not hear enough about the Liberal Religious movement in South Africa. Why don't you write more frequently?" Hence this letter.

My only excuse is that, viewed from 6,000 miles away, and through a backward perspective of a few weeks or months, things look so small. We are only a very small corner of the world, and we are apt to think that the world is not interested in our doings. Sometimes, indeed, we feel our isolation very keenly, and we are very glad to have it broken in upon. Mr. Davis's visit was a godsend to us, and made us feel that the wind which blew my breakdown was not so very ill after all.

This matter of "isolation," is one which I am afraid people in a crowded country cannot realise. I daresay Mr. Hargrove realises it now that he has been in Australia. We feel it both as regards the outer world and as regards our relation to the rest of South Africa. Worcester is 109 miles away; Graaff-Reinet 600 miles; Kimberley 647 miles; Johannesburg 1,015 miles; East London 560 miles; Port Elizabeth 428 miles. Imagine the situation of Liberals or Unitarians in all these places, and in the many intervening smaller towns and villages! The religious, and sometimes the social isolation; the isolation of the children, cut off from suitable church or Sunday School associations; marriages, baptisms, interments, conducted with forms and services with which those concerned are often entirely out of sympathy! Is it any wonder that people, and especially young people, are tempted, and sometimes indirectly coerced, into joining religious organisations the creeds of which they do not understand, or, understanding, do not believe?

The effects of this isolation come out very curiously sometimes. A little while ago a young man from one of the country districts came to me and said: "Mr. Balmforth, I quite agree with the religious views which are taught in your church. But I have certain political ambitions. I wish to take part in the public and political life of our little country town and district. But my friends tell me that if I wish to get on in that way I must keep my religious views dark. What would you advise me to do? Is it worth while speaking out? I am practically alone." What advice could I give save that contained in the strong words of Dr. Martineau,—that though there was no occasion to incessantly proclaim his views from the house-tops, or force them upon unwilling ears, yet the policy of complete silence was a policy of cowardice; and that he who, "being a Unitarian, shrinks, on fitting occasion, from plainly calling himself so, is a sneak and a coward."

Another result of this isolation, preventing as it does, freedom of intellectual intercourse, is the astounding ignorance which is so often betrayed as to our religious teachings. This, of course, is common everywhere. Everyone has heard of the man who inquired as to whether Unitarian meant "one who did not eat meat." Here is another sample—a lady this time.

Soon after Mr. Davis left us, the wife of a certain Cape Town minister—a very good minister too—was heard to inquire if it was true that the Free Protestant Church had discharged Mr. Davis, and sent him back home, because he had mentioned the name of Christ twice in the pulpit with approval! Surely that is beyond reproach. Imagine the good lady's shocked and solemn countenance as she put that portentous question!

But things are moving. Even in the country districts I think they have moved since Olive Schreiner wrote her "Story of an African Farm." They are certainly moving in the towns. We get more "recognition." Legislators come and lecture to our Literary Society. Dr. Kolbe, the most widely known Catholic priest in South Africa, and one or two Congregational ministers, have lectured for us. A widely-respected and well-known Congregationalist—Mr. Henry Beard—recently preached for us. And this week I (a Unitarian) have received an invitation to address, along with others, a meeting organised by the Evangelical Free Church Council on the Congo question—a subject upon which, some of us are trying to arouse the public conscience here. In Pretoria, a little meeting-place has been established by a gentleman who used to attend our church when he was a refugee in the war period. Whether it is on Unitarian or "New Theology" lines, I am not yet quite sure, but he has sent for a parcel of our literature. We have been trying to get our friends in Johannesburg to do the same, but everybody seems too busy there—they want a minister to oversee and organise them, but the B. and F. won't budge until local initiative be taken, and we in Cape Town are too poor to help. From several quarters I hear the complaint that thoughtful young men are leaving the orthodox churches on the ground that they cannot get their doubts and difficulties dealt with there, and that the churches do not face our everyday moral and religious problems. Whether the world and our little corner of the world, is getting more, or less, religious, it is difficult to say. Here, as everywhere, I fancy, indifference and selfishness are the greatest foes we have to fight.

Two interesting personal items I may chronicle. My predecessor, the Rev. D. P. Faure, is about to publish his autobiography. Mr. Faure was trained in Holland for the ministry of the Dutch Reformed Church, but finding himself unable to subscribe to the creeds of that church, he, along with some friends, started the Free Protestant Church here, the services in the beginning being held in the Dutch language. As Mr. Faure had to do a good deal of pioneer work, and to face for years a very narrow, bitter, and persecuting spirit, his Autobiography will doubtless prove to be a very interesting and valuable record of the Liberal Religious movement in South Africa. Mr. Faure also acted as interpreter when the delegates of the Transvaal Republic visited England and arranged the celebrated Convention with Lord Derby. His testimony with regard to the interpretation of that document will be of interest to students of that particular period in Colonial office history and policy. The Autobiography will be on sale at the Essex Hall Book Room.

The other item is that one of the younger members of our congregation—Mr. Albert van de Sandt Centlivres—has been elected to a Rhodes Scholarship. Mr. Centlivres has had a very successful College career. He has recently obtained his B.A. degree with first class honours on the literary side. He was awarded an Exhibition by the University in the School Higher Examination, 1901; was first in the University Matriculation Examination list for 1903, and was awarded an Exhibition. In the same year he gained a King's Scholarship at the South African College, and was awarded a minor Exhibition by the University at the Intermediate Examination, 1904, and gained the gold medal in literature at the South African College in 1906. He will enter as a student of New College in October. I am sure our friends in Oxford will give him a hearty welcome. The son of another of our members, Mr. Stanley Woodhead, is already in residence at Magdalen.

For the rest, our Church is in a healthy and vigorous condition, and, though small, it is usually almost full. We are suffering somewhat from the long-continued depression which has made itself felt amongst all classes. Two or three years ago we bought a site for a new church. The site is in an excellent situation, but unfortunately we cannot think of building during the present bad times.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bridport (Appointment).—The Rev. W. L. Tucker, M.A., has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of the Unitarian chapel, in succession to the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., and will enter on his duties on his return from attending the International meetings in Boston.

Brighton.—A Boys' Life Brigade is being formed in connection with the Sunday-school, the object being to teach youths self-control and manly readiness to render help to those in need. Mr. Dallaway, superintendent of the Sunday-school, has secured the help of Mr. C. B. Torond, Captain of the First Brighton Company of the Boys' Life Brigade, in forming a Company; and Mr. Whitehouse, ambulance instructor to the Brighton Volunteer Fire Brigade, has generously agreed to give practical instruction in ambulance and "first aid." Mr. Dallaway (32, Rose Hill-terrace), will welcome any practical suggestions from those engaged in similar work.

Cardiff (Appointment).—The Rev. F. Blount Mott, late of Southport, has accepted an invitation to take charge of West Grove Unitarian Church, and is to enter on his duties early in September.

Chatham.—Last Sunday, under the plan for visits from representative thinkers, Mrs. Besant, the president of the Theosophical Society, gave an impressively eloquent address to an overflowing congregation. The Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., has promised a visit in the autumn.

Harrogate.—Services have been held at the Scotch Tea Rooms on Sunday evenings during July. The Rev. John Ellis has discoursed on "Some Questions of the Day." The music has been under the direction of Mr. W. Ball (Kursaal organist) and Mrs. Holgate. The attendance has been good throughout. Members of our congregations in different parts of the country, who were staying at this northern health resort, have been present at all the services. The Rev. W. Mellor will be the preacher during August. For subjects, &c., see advertisement.

Lewes.—The Sunday-school anniversary services, on July 28, were very successful. Both morning and evening services, which were conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, of Kilburn, were well attended, especially the evening, when, in addition to the anthems at both services, the choir rendered a selection of vocal music. The subjects of Mr. Roper's discourses, which were much appreciated, were in the morning "A Whining Schoolboy"; and, in the evening, "Wanted a Man."

Newcastle-under-Lyme.—Last Sunday Flower Services were held in the Old Meeting-house, which was gay with unwonted colour. The Rev. G. Pegler was the preacher, morning and evening.

We are glad to hear that our friend, Professor George Boros, of Ko'ozsvar, expects to come to London on Sept. 5 for a few days, bringing a daughter to Channing House School. He will also be accompanied by a Hungarian student, who is going to the Home Missionary College at Manchester. Any friends of Hungary who would like to show hospitality to this young man during a fortnight's stay in London might communicate with Dr. Boros, at Kolozsvar. He himself, we regret very much to learn, is after all unable to go with us to the Boston Congress, College duties standing in the way.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE hope to publish next week the sermon to University Extension students preached last Sunday morning in Manchester College Chapel by the Rev. Dr. Carpenter, the Principal, in connection with the summer meeting of Extension students at Oxford.

MR. CUTHBERT C. GRUNDY, R.C.A., of Blackpool, has made a generous offer, which has been gladly accepted, to defray the cost of building a "Children's Holiday Home" at Birtle Edge, for the benefit of the poor children of Bury. The cost is estimated at £850, and among the conditions of the gift we observe one that the institution shall be "in theory and in practice absolutely unsectarian." We offer congratulations to the donor and the recipients. The holiday children from year to year will assuredly have good cause to bless the memory of the gifted founder, who, in his latest benefaction, has adhered to the lines of intelligent philanthropy characteristic of his career.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell has declined to say either "Yes" or "No" to the overtures of the Independent Labour Party to contest a Cardiff seat at the next Parliamentary election. But those who have knowledge of affairs at the City Temple are confident that under no circumstances will he relinquish his position as its minister. Inasmuch as Mr. Campbell has deplored—and most justifiably—the alienation of the Labour Movement from organised religion, and as he appears to be the man of the moment to lead these two into line again, we should think that a seat in the House of Commons would diminish rather than increase his prospect of achieving a consummation so devoutly to be wished.

It is not often that Dr. John Hunter indulges in personal references in his sermons. Such infrequency gives more value to a reference when it comes. Preaching recently at Scarborough on "The Great and Memorable Hours of Life"—a fine theme, surely, which other preachers might be pardoned for borrowing—he said: "I can never forget one such hour as I have described—an hour in which we grow more than in many months and years. At the age of nineteen I was one day seated on a stile of a country road reading, for the first time, Frederick Denison Maurice's great book, and suddenly I received certain great thoughts of God and Christ and man which made all things new to me." This quickening power of spirit upon spirit, giving a sudden but enduring upward impulse to the recipient, might be matched by many examples from history. A case in point is the effect produced on Wesley by the first reading of Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying." As an undergraduate at Christ Church, Oxford, he read the book. When he came to that portion which deals with purity of intention, he became sensible of a sudden enlightenment and elevation. "Instantly," he says, 'I resolved to dedicate all my life to God—all my thoughts and words and actions—being thoroughly convinced there was no medium, but that every part of my life (not some only) must either be a sacrifice to God or myself.'"

THE Liverpool Pageant, commemorating the 700th anniversary of the grant of the first charter by King John, was celebrated last Saturday and the following days, and the celebration was further marked by special religious services on Sunday. We printed last week Mr. William Watson's Commemorative Ode, and this week have the sermon preached by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers on Sunday morning in Ullet-road Church.

ON Sunday afternoon a united Thanksgiving Service was held in St. George's Hall, attended by some five thousand people. The Lord Mayor went in state from the Town Hall, among those accompanying him being Lord Derby (the Lord Lieutenant), Lord Stanley, Lord Lathom, the Bishop of Liverpool, Mr. A. Taylor, M.P., Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart., Sir Edward Russell, the Rector of Liverpool, and seven other Canons; and of ministers of other denominations, the Revs. J. H. Atkinson (Baptist), F. W. Nicholson (Congregational), J. Collins Odgers (Unitarian), and Major Cloud, of the Salvation Army. The Rector gave out the opening hymn, "O God, our help in ages past," and the lesson was read by the Rev. A. Connell, Dr. John Watson's successor at the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church. The service included a recital of the "Apostles' Creed" and the singing of William Watson's Ode. The Bishop of Liverpool (Dr. Chavasse) was the preacher, and after the sermon the Rev. F. W. Nicholson, of the Chadwick Mount Congregational Church, offered prayer. The Te Deum was sung as the closing hymn, and the Bishop pronounced the Benediction.

THE Bishop's text was Matthew vi. 33 : "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you," and it was a fine sermon on civic greatness, showing where the city had failed in the past, in the matter especially of housing and sanitation, temperance and purity, how much had been done to grapple with the evils generated by that failure, and how much still remained to be done to make Liverpool the beautiful and noble city it ought to be. "We have received a great inheritance," said the Bishop, "but it has brought with it responsibilities and problems which may well tax the resources of the wisest, strongest, and most wealthy municipality. In the last half of the eighteenth century and the first half of the nineteenth Liverpool made enormous strides in material prosperity; but her wealth was confined to a few, and, with some noble exceptions, her rich men were too much absorbed in the making or keeping of money to care for the masses of their fellow-townsmen herded together in insanitary dwellings at their very door. For there grew up in this hundred years a hideous and sordid Liverpool, in which the poor were housed without proper provision for air and light and sanitation, in great slum areas, which were the hotbeds of disease, and vice, and misery. With its terraced hills, with its noble estuary, and with the distant line of Welsh mountains fringing the western sky, a city of rare loveliness—spacious, clean, healthful, and stately—might have arisen, 'beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole land.' But the opportunity was lost, and our municipality during the last fifty years has had to grapple with the problem which the preceding century left behind. And nobly has it done its work. It has swept away many acres of insanitary dwellings, and has replaced them by new ones, at the cost of more than £1,000,000. It provided the city in 1868 with three such fine open spaces as Sefton Park, Newsham Park, and Stanley Park, at a cost of £670,000. It has crowned the addition of a long succession of open spaces purchased with public money, or given by generous citizens, by the gifts of Calderstones Park and the Roby Hall estate, the latter the recent freewill offering of one of its leading aldermen. It has widened its chief streets. It has provided its people, once most inadequately supplied, with water unsurpassed for purity and abundance, and in a thousand ways it has striven, and is still striving, to beautify and to improve the twenty-six square miles over which its houses are stretched. And yet in his last report our Medical Officer of Health, whilst able to speak of a steady and remarkable improvement during the last twenty-five years, has still to tell us that the death rate of Liverpool is 20.2 per 1,000, and is greater than any town in the United Kingdom, except Dublin and Middlesbrough. The health and happiness of a people are some of the greatest assets of the nation, and Liverpool, which is regarded as one of the most progressive of cities, will not stay her hand, and her citizens will not grudge the enormous cost, until sanitary dwellings, bright and clean and commodious, are brought within the reach of the very poorest." Then followed a passage on the evils of intemperance, and the sermon dwelt in conclusion upon the need for more direct religious consecration, to secure the complete triumph of philanthropy and the building of the ideal city.

THE Roman Catholics of Liverpool also joined in the commemoration, and on Sunday morning the Bishop (Dr. White-side) celebrated High Mass in the pro-cathedral. A sermon was preached by the Rev. James Hughes from the text Rev. xxi. 15: "And the angel which spake with me had a measure of a rod of gold to measure the city and the gates thereof and the walls." "With a rod of gold," he said, "with a standard too noble to dwell on mere numbers or vulgar wealth, we measure how our city grows in the wiser minds and nobler souls of her people, how from her gates goes forth her influence for good, and how round her sons arises a wall to keep out evil thoughts and low desires." He then pictured the historic growth of the city, and did not gloss over the matter of the slave trade. "The slave trade brought wealth and growth to Liverpool. In ten years Liverpool traders received fifteen million pounds, or an average of £50 for each of 300,000 negroes carried on their ships into bondage worse than death. With shame and regret we have to confess in the eyes of the world, that our prosperity was won not by honour, nor by justice, but by an infamous trade. The population grew from 5,000 in 1690 to 300,000 in 1837, and to-day we may reckon it, including Liverpool's dormitory on the Cheshire side, as not less than 900,000 souls. The number of Catholics, which was 8,000 in 1787, was over 90,000 in 1837, and is now, including Cheshire and Lancashire suburbs, 200,000. For a time, during the Irish famine of 1847, there were 400,000 Catholics herded together in the slums of the city, and when fever raged amongst them, out of twenty priests in the town, eleven, like their Master, proved their love by laying down their lives for their sheep. The great bulk of the poor immigrants gradually found employment in the busy towns of Lancashire and Yorkshire and Scotland, but a number remained to help in building up the greatness of Liverpool."

ALL honour to the priests who so laid down their lives in that time of grievous trial. For us also it is a memory which we shall not willingly let die, that the first minister of our Liverpool Domestic Mission, the Rev. John Johns, author of the hymn, "Come, kingdom of our God," also fell as a martyr in that same cause. Indeed, in that compassionate ministry, it was while he and one of the Catholic priests were moving the body of a victim whom no one else would touch that they took the fever from which they both died.

On Wednesday the Rev. H. S. Perris gave a lecture at the Free Church Summer School at Cambridge on "The Cult of Peace." He said the title was borrowed from some words used by the President of The Hague Congress, M. de Nelidoff, at the laying of the foundation stone of Mr. Carnegie's "Palace of Peace" last week. Pointing out the strenuous efforts of those who, acting upon the prejudices and vested interests of the military party, were pushing a "Cult of the Rifle," Mr. Perris advocated the formation of a great Peace Education League, to safeguard the young from militarist propaganda, and to inculcate true principles of international friendship and co-operation.

THE Baptist ministry, which is attaining a high level of culture, is reaping the inevitable reward—a broader outlook. Recently the Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke delivered to the London Baptist Association an address which did honour to his denomination no less than to himself. His subject was "The Attitude of Christ to the Old Testament." He showed that Jesus found in the Old Testament material for both devotion and conduct. Jesus drew freely from the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa—his favourite book being Deuteronomy. With regard to the ethical rules he found there, he did not hesitate to limit or to widen their application, or even, in some instances, to repeal them. Mr. Rushbrooke quoted approvingly Professor George Adam Smith's dictum, "While we look to Christ as the chief authority for our Old Testament, we must never forget that he was also its first critic." Hence the value which Christ gave to the Old Testament legitimatises its inclusion in the Christian Scriptures, whilst, on the same ground, it is not to be regarded as of equal worth throughout. "Apart from the facts that different types of teaching are found in it, that the age-long opposition of priestly and prophetic views of religion is often thrust upon us, and that Jesus clearly stands in the line of the prophets, it should suffice to remember that he set aside large portions of its contents. Loyalty to his authority demands the admission of the Old Testament, but the same loyalty determines the place and value which his followers must assign to it. In using it, we are to discriminate as he did, seeking the aid of his spirit to lead us into all the truth."

THE motto which the President of the Wesleyan Conference gave to his brother ministers the other day—"A Revival of Evangelistic Preaching in every Pulpit"—should be interpreted in the light of the address to which it served as a moral. Then it will appear not as an appeal for the resuscitation of obsolete phrases or obsolescent doctrines. In the words of a well-known hymn of Charles Wesley, he reminded his hearers that they were "to serve the present age," and that in order to serve the age they must understand it. "We shall never get back our sway over the masses until we have recovered the art of divining and meeting the needs of the people of England." A just and healthful presentation was given of John Wesley's piety. While always insisting on holiness, said the President, he never made any claim to spiritual and moral distinction; "he was so busy helping other people that he had not time to waste upon his own needs; he was alert and bright and cheerful, and laid him down at last in the accustomed light of the presence of the Lord." True and timely; worthy of consideration by others than Methodists. It may be that Wesley did not exactly do his day's work "with perfect unconsciousness of its value," but difficulty never alarmed him, and success never made him giddy. His example will be worth reference for many years yet to come.

THE Fernley Lecture this year was delivered by the President of the Conference, the Rev. John S. Simon. His subject was "The Revival of Religion in England in the Eighteenth Century." A notice of this will appear later. It is curious to note that Mr. Simon denounces the expression "our Mother Church" applied to the Church of England as a mischievous and gratuitous mistake. "The Methodist societies as organisations were never within the Church of England." The emphasis given to this fact marks a certain development along a line upon which the Wesleyans move but slowly.

A BRIEF sketch of the history of Bible Christian Methodism in Portsmouth, where the Conference has just been held, contains the following curious items:—

"The history of the cause at Southsea is even more interesting. One of the friends, named Mr. Gibbs, a convincing and zealous preacher, was arrested and imprisoned for preaching in the open air without a licence. He was confined in Winchester County Goal. The conviction was quashed, he was released, and was awarded £60 as compensation for false imprisonment. Part of the money was used to erect a small chapel in Little Southsea-street. In that little and obscure place the cause was maintained for twenty years, without any appreciable headway. In the little house lived the preacher on his modest £12 per annum (!), and here Lord, Chief Justice Way, Lieutenant-Governor of Australia, first saw the light."

MR. JOHN BURNS made an interesting speech on Monday to the Housing Congress in Caxton Hall. He dwelt upon the "urbanisation" of the people, and their "devitalisation" in the process, unless that movement were wisely regulated. He quoted the statistics of overcrowding, in which the city of Glasgow has a terrible pre-eminence, half the population living at the rate of two or more persons to a room. But he spoke with greatest feeling of the condition of the unskilled urban labourer. "Where casual labour was endemic, poverty was epidemic, and the slum, dirt, and squalor existed." Reformers ought to concentrate on raising the wages of this class, and improving both their education and conditions of labour. We were spending large sums on criminals and lunatics, and must consider the claims of these others. Speaking of lodging-houses for young single men, Mr. Burns considered that London was sufficiently supplied. He did not favour them; with their absence of women and children they were at best a very poor substitute for the home. He promised a Housing Bill next year, saying he had deferred the measure because he felt that it was of prior importance to prepare, as far as the Government was able, for a return to the land.

IN his presidential address Alderman Thompson compared their labours with those of the Peace Congress, declaring that if war had slain its thousands, the slums had slain their tens of thousands. Just as the land was at the bottom of the house, so the land question was at the bottom of the housing question. He advocated municipal land purchase on a large scale, but pointed out that the great hope for the future lay in reversing the present stream of population, and getting room and air-space by re-planting the people upon cheaper land.

FURTHER evidence taken before Sir Thomas Whittaker's Committee on Home Work has shown the very high profits made upon sweated tailoring. Being a season trade, hours were, in busy periods, practically unlimited. Mr. Herbert Evans, one of the factory inspectors examined, considered that it should be made illegal for workshops to be open more than six days a week. He also favoured the appointment of a Wages Board, and some system of licensing which would restrict the number and control the sanitary conditions of workshops. Mr. Askwith, counsel for the Commissioners of H.M. Works and Public Buildings, also favoured a Wages Board.

THE Bishop of Birmingham proposes to establish a Diocesan Social Service Council, representative of the different classes of the community, for the study of social problems from a religious point of view, and the promotion of social service as a Christian duty. He hopes that the council will co-operate with representatives of other religious bodies and men of good-will generally. As he suggests, it would be a great matter to have the Church thus definitely committed to the position that it ought to contribute to the solution of social problems.

The Tribune has carried out a scheme, novel as a newspaper enterprise, for brightening the lives and homes of poor children by encouraging window-gardening. Some 210 window-boxes with suitable plants were distributed in the slums of Chelsea at houses where there were children, at a cost of £59 2s. 1d., including the provision of a motor-car to carry the gifts and attract the attention of the children. The children who take care of their gifts are to receive medals. Our domestic missions are, happily, not strangers to this kind of enterprise for encouraging window-gardening, minus the motor-car and the advertisement; but they will welcome, no doubt, any newspaper competition of this kind—the more the better. The Tribune says that "this journey in a motor-car had a more serious purpose than the prize-competition for children, and on its way investigations were made into certain conditions of life in back streets." These are to be discussed in due course in its columns; but one wonders what kind of adequate and reliable investigation of slum life can possibly be made with a motor-car.

IN his inaugural address before the International Congress on School Hygiene, the president, Sir Lauder Brunton, criticised modern educational methods as one-sided. "Instead of drawing out and developing in every child all its possible powers of body and of mind—so that in its life it shall do the very best of which its nature is capable—education has degenerated into a system of cramming and cultivating one or two faculties of the mind, and especially that of memory, to the injury of others, while the condition of the body as the servant of the mind has, to a certain extent, been lost sight of in this country." He urged the necessity of medical inspection of all scholars, and spoke of the value of open-air schools. Dealing with physical training, he alluded to the importance of its being associated with pleasure—"one of the most useful stimulants to the circulation and nutrition both of children and of grown-up people." This applied also to other training. It was cruel to compel a child to hem a square of cotton, but any little girl would delight in making clothes for her doll. Lord Crewe, who welcomed the delegates on behalf both of the King and of the Government, urged that, apart from proper physical care, mere intellectual training might produce more harm than good to defective children. It had been said—and he would not attempt to qualify the statement—that the amount of human misery caused by defective teeth in schools was not less than that caused by an average war.

WHEN we consider what are the ideal surroundings of childhood, we naturally call up as one of the most charming and fitting pictures the cast away by the hand that lately gathered them. Will not those who have charge of children and their outings, or other excursion parties, add to their many duties that of trying to prevent wanton destruction of beauty? It is bad for the country; it is worse for the destroyer to cultivate the grasping, greedy habit—"Here is something beautiful; let me seize it and make it mine only, even though I have no use for it, and it will fade in my hands!" We would not deny the child the pleasure of taking home a few flowers; but gathering carelessly and for waste should be carefully repressed—as selfish, destructive, wasteful, immoral. Moreover, as certain writers have pointed out in the Spectator and elsewhere, childish hands have recently exterminated, or nearly so, some rare and beautiful plants in our land.

"Child amid the flowers at play"; and in this summer holiday season few ways of spending money and thought are more profitable than in sending the town children for a real country holiday. Yet the havoc made by the children, and sometimes their elders also, among the flowers is not lovely or charming in reality when, after their incursions, we find the lanes littered with blossoms and branches,

THE vexed question as to whether a minister in making his income-tax return is entitled to a deduction for the rent of a study, as an exclusive and additional requisite for professional duties, is again to the front. Hitherto, ministers have been at the mercy of the surveyors of taxes in their respective districts, some of whom have allowed, whilst others have refused, the deduction. In consequence of this uncertainty, many ministers have refrained from making the claim, especially since a test case, brought by the Dissenting Deputies before the Income Tax Commissioners some two years ago, was decided against the claimant. But Mr. Alfred J. Shephard, the secretary to the Dissenting Deputies, now announces that "the Chancellor of the Exchequer has consented to the insertion of a clause in the Money Bill providing that a sum not exceeding one-eighth of the rent of a manor or other house, occupied by a minister, may be deducted from the assessment on the minister for ministerial income."

THE individualism he would encourage, says Mr. A. C. Benson, in his essay on "Contentment" in the August Cornhill, is "the individualism of the man who realises that the hope of the race depends upon the quality of life, upon the number of people who live quiet, active, gentle, kindly, faithful lives, enjoying their work, and turning for recreation to the nobler and simpler sources of pleasure—the love of nature, poetry, literature, and art. Of course, the difficulty is that we do not, most of us, find our pleasures in these latter things, but in the excitement and amusement of social life. I mournfully admit it, and I quite see the uselessness of trying to bring pleasures within the reach of people when they have no taste for them; but an increasing number of people do care for such things, and there are still more who would care for them if only they could be introduced to them at an impressionable age."

Ego et Rex meus. It is said that at an Oddfellows' dinner at Prestbury, near Cheltenham, the vicar of the parish, asked to propose the health of the King, refused to do so. He said it should be "The Church and the King," as it had been at that gathering for many years. He intimated his withdrawal from the society, and left the meeting!

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

THEOLOGICAL publishing is not very brisk just now, but some volumes have appeared recently which should not be overlooked. Chief among them is Harnack's "Luke the Physician," which was reviewed in these columns some time ago. It comes to us now in an excellent English translation. A good deal of the discussion is occupied with minute linguistic arguments, dear to the heart of the scholar; but there are also many luminous passages of historical and literary appreciation, which set several old problems in a new light. Another small volume, important beyond the limits of its size, is "New Light on the New Testament, from records of the Græco-Roman Period," by Adolf Deissmann. It is translated by Mr. Lionel R. M. Strachan, and published by Messrs. T. & T. Clark for the modest sum of 3s.

The Book of Job is inexhaustible in its appeal to all lovers of great poetry and unsolved problems. It also lends itself to the cunning artifice of the maker of beautiful books. Two fine editions of it have appealed to us lately as competitors for our favour. The first is in the Wellwood series of beautiful books. It has the advantage of hand-made paper and excellent printing, and a piquant and stimulating introduction by Mr. Chesterton. The other, almost equally attractive in its format, is issued from the Bodley Head, with the title "The Heresy of Job," and an introduction by Mr. Francis Coutts. It contains, also, Blake's weird and powerful illustrations, in exact photographic facsimile of the original plates. Where both editions are so attractive the best solution is to possess both.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co. have just issued a new volume by the Bishop of Gloucester. It is called "The Old Testament in the New," and will be found to break fresh ground in an interesting way in its attempt to rescue many New Testament phrases and conceptions from theological tradition, and to reinterpret them in the light of Old Testament teaching. Among Roman Catholic books of special interest we may mention "Through Scylla and Charybdis, or the Old Theology and the New," by the Rev. George Tyrrell, and "The Legends of the Saints, an introduction to Hagiography," by the Bollardist Father H. Delehaye, a scholarly study of absorbing interest, which many readers will still prefer in the original French. Both these books deserve much fuller criticism than can be given to them in this column.

The recent death of Mr. J. Romilly Allen has called attention to his excellent work as an archæologist, and especially to his two chief books, "The Monumental History of the Early British Church" and "Celtic Art in Pagan and Christian Times." The latter, which is admirably illustrated, forms one of Messrs. Methuen's "Antiquaries' Books." It is a series which fills a distinct gap in popular literature and at this season of the year some of its volumes should not be left idle on the shelf. Mr. Macklin's "Brasses" is the latest addition, but this caters for a rather special and particular taste. Abbot Gasquet has written admirably on "English Monastic Life" and "Parish Life in Mediæval England," and we would fain hope that some of our readers have sufficient interest in architecture and the ritual of religious life, with which it is associated so closely, to find these two volumes most companionable on a holiday. For lovers of architecture we may also recommend "Essentials in Architecture," by John Belcher, A.R.A., with its series of well-chosen plates, which really illustrate and do not merely adorn.

The Shelburne Essays, by Paul Elmer More, are winning a discriminating public of their own on this side of the Atlantic. The fourth series has just reached us. It ranges over a variety of themes—Fanny Burney, George Herbert, Benjamin Franklin, Charles Lamb, Walt Whitman, William Blake and others. What strikes us first of all about Mr. More's writing is that it is saturated in the love of good literature, and guided by an intimate love of the best. There is nothing startling about it. It does not run riot in the strange land of paradox like Mr. Chesterton, and it has none of the violent individuality of Henley; but it is full of sound thought and unusual delicacy of perception, and it leaves the distinct impression on the mind that it is that most rare thing—real criticism, which has been forged in intimate contact with the work criticised. Underlying it, rather implied than thrust upon the reader's attention, are certain principles of judgment, which are staple enough to resist the wiles of fancy or the assaults of popular clamour. We are not aware that Mr. More has tried a longer flight than the occasional essay, but in this most difficult form of literary art he has few contemporary rivals.

We confess to being of the obstinate opinion that good people should read poetry on their holidays. Whether they should exercise their virtue by browsing on the old favourites, or make predatory excursions into pastures new, is a point upon which we should not venture to dogmatise. Between the man who travels with the Oxford Keats or his well-thumbed Selections from Browning in his pocket and the devotee of "The Open Road" we are content to renounce arbitration. For the man of the anthology in search of a new pleasure this summer there is "The Pocket Book of Poems and Songs for the Open Air," compiled by Edward Thomas, though we should like it all the better if there were less suspicion of wilful imitation of the afore-mentioned favourite in the appearance of the book. For all lovers of English verse Mr. Bullen has provided a fresh delight in the volume of Early English Lyrics, Amorous, Divine, Moral, and Trivial, edited by E. K. Chambers and F. Sidgwick. This includes a long and interesting essay by Mr. Chambers on "Some Aspects of Mediæval Lyric," which some of the judicious may prefer to postpone to the winter fireside, while they wander for the present fancy-free to the lilt of these lyrical measures.

But there is one determining factor in our choice of summer poetry which we must not omit. We may call it the topographical factor, with apologies for the ungainly word. If you go to the English Lakes you will be wise to take Wordsworth in your wallet or your memory. If you turn your steps towards the Lizard and Kynance Cove you are not likely to regret the choice of Cornish Ballads and other Poems, by R. S. Hawker, as a boon companion. And if it is your singular good fortune to retire from the madding crowd to the romantic solitudes of the glens of Antrim it is the Songs of Moira O'Neill, "written by a Glenswoman in the dialect of the glens, and chiefly for the pleasure of other Glens-people," which will bring you close to the heart of the country and interpret to you, as only the language of poetry can do, the Irishman's passion for the land of his desire:

"The people that's in England is richer
nor the Jews,
There's not the smallest young gossoon
but thravels in his shoes!
I'd give the pipe between me teeth to see a barefoot child,
Och! Corrymeela an' the low south wind."

* * *

Of many songs of exquisite tenderness in this cherished volume, fit to bring the tears into our eyes for very loveliness and longing, none excels this one in a quality of almost piercing simplicity:

"I mind the day I'd wish I was a say-gull flyin' far,
For then I'd fly an' find you in the West;
An' I'd wish I was a little rose as sweet as roses are,
For then you'd maybe wear it on your breast,

Achray!

You'd maybe take an' wear it on your breast.

"I'd wish I could be living near, to love
you day an' night,
To let no throuble touch you or annoy;
I'd wish I could be dyin' here to raise a spirit light,
If Them above 'ud let me bring you joy,

Achray!

If Them above 'ud let me win you joy.
"And now I wish no wishes, or ever fall
a tear,
Nor take a thought beyont the way I'm led:
I mind the day that's over-by, an' bless the day that's here,
There be to come a day when we'll be dead,

Achray!

A longer, lighter day when we'll be dead."

Do lovers of poetry need any further introduction to "Songs of the Glens of Antrim"? It is all compact of this fine gold of beauty and sorrow, and the native beauty of the heart. If it has no appeal for you you will be wise to leave it unread; but you must renounce at the same time the belief that you can ever understand that strange and beautiful creation of sunshine and storm, the character of the Irish peasantry, where the spirit of poetry in its flight from great cities has found both sanctuary and home.

WHEN one thinks of all one might have done, and all one ought to have done, there seems to be no time left to think of wrongs we have received or benefits we have missed.—Jowett.

CRITICS OF THE NEW THEOLOGY.*

"ON for five minutes of Martineau, or even of Dale," might well be the cry of those who have seen confusion worse confounded by the tangled ideas of the New Theology, and the further twisting that is now going on. Orthodoxy, it is plain, cannot answer Mr. Campbell, except by entering upon all sorts of new constructions that are foreign to its strongest and best traditions. For it is now evident that when you loosen any of the main joints of the orthodox scheme, the whole fabric begins to dislocate. And the consequence is that the apologists themselves are found to be at variance among themselves. For while one writer thinks it better to weaken on the Virgin Birth, another chooses Eternal Punishment for the subject of concessions, and so the serried phalanx is broken. We see this even in the volume "The Old Faith and the New Theology," which represents the ponderous, dignified, unprogressive Nonconformity, which scarcely feels itself called upon to argue the question, because it is conscious of a great mass of undisturbed conservatism behind it. With the exception of Dr. Forsyth's essay on "Immanence and Incarnation," which is spirited and full of suggestive points, we have here the heavy brigade which just plods on with its old re-iterations. As to Biblical discrepancies, the Rev. Dr. Aubrey tells us that "apparent inconsistencies vanish on inspection, and their existence shows that there could have been no collusion." Yet even here the disturbance is approaching. Dr. Barrett writes on the Virgin Birth that he cannot understand how any one can "reconcile the pre-existence of our Lord with a purely human parentage, unless they adopt some modification of the ancient Gnostic heresy that in some way, after Christ's birth, the Spirit of God descended upon Him, and made Him the son of God." But Dr. Barrett's foes are those of his own household, for in the same volume Dr. Goodrich (p. 22) writes "How became He incarnate? Whether or not by virgin-birth may be left as an open question," and Dr. Adeney says, "the historic churches have departed" from apostolical example in accentuating it as the basis of faith in the Incarnation. Still another phase of disconcerted orthodoxy, trying to speak in the full-voiced tones of ancient certainty, is to be found in Mr. Harold E. Brierley's little book. Here everything is terse, vigorous, and popular. No one could desire a more violent onslaught upon Eternal Punishment than is to be read here, and (what is specially grateful to one who desires that liberalism shall not lose the saving salt of the old truths) the moral point of "hell" is not blunted in the interests of mere rationalistic indifferentism. On the other hand, while Mr. Brierley is quite opposed to Mr. Campbell's system as a whole, he does not show any power of supplying an alternative re-construction. This is, at least, attempted, in outline by Mr. Walker.

* "What about the New Theology?" By W. L. Walker. (T. & T. Clark. 2s. 6d. net.)

"Do we need a New Theology?" By H. E. Brierley. (Jas. Clarke. 1s. 6d. net.)

"The Old Faith and the New Theology." By various writers. Edited by C. H. Vine. (Sampson Low. 4s. 6d. net.)

"What about the New Theology?" shows a stronger grasp upon philosophical positions than Mr. Campbell's, as well as more sobriety of judgment, although also less fertility of invention. Like most present-day apologists, Mr. Walker has his own favourite heresies. He holds that the "death" which Jesus died was not merely "bodily dissolution," physical death, but entire separation from God, entire loss of communion with his Father, "if only for a moment" (p. 147). He also leaves the Virgin birth an open question; and, even if it is accepted, it is not the "incarnation of a pre-existent Divine Being as is commonly supposed," but of "an entirely new being" in whom the Incarnation would gradually take place as Jesus "grew in grace" (pp. 69-70). His Trinity is a modal Trinity, and is scarcely more orthodox than that of Mr. Campbell. Immanence, again, is explained by him in a totally different way from that recognised in theology. "There may be immanence without personal presence," as a man's thought may be immanent in a machine or life in an organism. "There was not a personal God dwelling in the original fire-mist." "In man, till we come to Christ, God was not personally in the world." All this is very interesting, but it relinquishes all that the modern religious mind has gained through the accepted meaning of "immanence." In trying to overcome the difficulties created by Mr. Campbell's theosophising, it burkes the questions he has so valiantly—so light-heartedly—faced.

It looks, then, as if we must expect, for a period, a pouring deluge of these new "constructions," mixed more or less with pseudo-scientific analogies and stray suggestions from Buddhism and modern monisms, in the fashion set by Mr. Campbell himself. And amidst all the welter and the vagary of it, one clear, solid fact emerges:—That these men, New and newer, fail or succeed just in so far as they are aiming at re-constructing a set of given ideas, or at re-interpreting an experience. You cannot, in the strict sense of the word, re-interpret a set of ideas or doctrines except in the way of text-book "explanation." Unfortunately, Mr. Campbell and the rest do not distinguish between these two aims. Really, they are anxious, at the bottom of their good hearts, only to re-interpret the great Christian facts of life and experience. Let them, therefore, begin with the facts and the experience, and not with the doctrines or ideas. Why should they spend so much time on the impossible task of showing that the doctrine of the Trinity, for example, can be deduced from our innate ideas of the world and God? All such explanations are what has been called (in no offensive sense) "a put-up job." The idea of the Trinity did not arise in this way. It arose from the intellectual need of explaining the amazing, overwhelming fact of Christ; and to the intellect of several centuries this explanation seemed satisfactory. But, in our day, these men are trying to explain, not the fact of Christ and his relation to God; they are trying to explain the Trinitarian explanation of this, and make it satisfactory to the modern intellect—and that is quite different a matter. Mr. Campbell has gone wrong just here where we might have expected him to go right. Mr. Walker, for example, is quite right when he urges, as the head and front of Mr. Campbell's offending; that his New Theology everywhere tends to fall back upon unethical conceptions—whether of God, or Sin, or Atonement. It cannot be too much emphasised that what we have to do with, is not the manipulation of general conceptions about human nature, the cosmos, or "unity and diversity." We have to do with a great special achievement of human good already won, and a great hope for its future. How to understand, how to set forth, this astounding reality? You can water it down to mere natural law; you can represent even love unethically, as the mere centripetal tribal instinct of animals. But all this playful, quasi-scientific theology does not come within a thousand miles of the modern man's need of religious re-interpretation. Here, of course, we touch upon the vice of all the theologies. If our own churches had been less concerned to remain rigidly within certain limited philosophies of their own, and more concerned to explain the fact of Travers Madge, we might have made history. And if Mr. Campbell had started with the fact that God is a great reality in human lives rather than a conception to be hammered and modelled, and sin a horror rather than a phenomenon, and Christ a necessity, even to thinkers who will reject his Platonic machinery of archetypal Ideas, he might have helped us; as Mr. Lofthouse's book "Ethics and Atonement" has to some extent helped. The trouble begins when, in your task of interpretation, you wander off by the veriest hair's-breadth from your sensitive contact with spiritual fact; and it makes matters no better that your subsequent "constructions" should be agreeable to Hæckel rather than to Paley. Begin with the great ultimate fact God, and see how far that will carry you before you add other complicating ideas—such as the eternal Christ, the infinite and finite modes of Deity—entities which Mr. Campbell so dexterously evolves. No doubt tremendous problems will arise even then. How does God enter into man's experience? How does God save man? How much of human history is to be put down to divine action? Great problems for any theology, as St. Augustine knew. Now it will be found that these are exactly the same problems which the theologians (and Mr. Campbell among them) have been most anxious to solve in respect to Christ. How did God dwell in him? In what sense was his spirit "at one" with God? And the New Theology doctrine of Immanence is brought in to solve them. But the whole performance is seen to be nugatory when we reflect that even if these questions were satisfactorily cleared up about Christ, they break out again when we come to consider ourselves. Of what use are Mr. Campbell's explanations, seeing that, whatever may be the case with Christ, they do not touch the mystery I find in myself—the way in which God and Man are together in me? Do I not know it? Alas, as to one part of the fact, how can I ever forget it?

For the deepest mystery is not (as these theologians suggest) that God can dwell in man. That is no doubt a mystery. But the mystery which the Christian religion came to enlighten is, that God and Man being together, they should be found at variance; and how they may cease to be so. That is a greater mystery than the Person of Christ. And so, again, with "Atonement." It is a great divine-human fact. The orthodox had taken the human significance out of it. Mr. Campbell therefore replies by taking the suggestion of divine transcendence out of it, and reduces it to a manifestation of the social instinct. And yet the religious fact upon this matter is plain, direct, decisive. The great saving human fellowship is a fact; and so is the affiliation of it, ever since Christ came, to him as its natural organic Leader and Interpreter. And so is the love of God, which acts through it. And so is sin, which it puts away. We want a Theology to set all this forth; neither blinking facts, nor adding fancies.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE August Contemporary Review is marked No. 500. It opens with a paper by Sir Oliver Lodge read at the annual meeting of the Child-Study Association in Birmingham on May 4. "The Religious Education of Children" is the subject, and it contains some curious evidence as to children's attitude towards the religious teaching they have received. It is interesting to read this in connection with Professor Findlay's Hibbert article to which we referred last week. In preparing his paper, Sir Oliver Lodge obtained the following notes from the present Principal of the Egbaston Kindergarten, as to what we should aim at in teaching little children. The notes are so admirable that we cannot refrain from reproducing them here:—

"The religious education of little children ought to have the attributes of Indirectness and Continuousness. It should be Indirect—that is to say, not always consciously given under the name of religion; and Continuous—not once a week, or on specified occasions only, but always, and in the simple acts of life. By 'religious education' I mean an effort on the part of the adult to form such habit of body and mind, and such aspirations of soul as shall tend towards a clean heart and the ultimate condition of a realisation of unity with the Divine Spirit of Good. We worship this Spirit—God—through His manifestations in Man, in Animals, and in Plants, and in the expression (craftmanship) of man, which is (or ought to be) Art. Accordingly, a teacher of little children is teaching religion when she tries to form the elementary habits of cleanliness, order, punctuality, and courtesy. (These qualities are necessary if we wish to show love to our fellows.) She is teaching religion when she helps her children to make animals—wild or domestic—happy and responsive. She is teaching religion when she helps her children to take care of their gardens, plants, and flowers, to leave beautiful things to grow in their own green world, and to exercise self-control in a country lane in June. When a teacher touches her class with a beautiful song, picture, or poem, with the history of our planet and other planets and all the natural lore of the world, she is giving religious teaching. If she turns the instinct of destruction into one of creation, if she helps a self-centred child to make himself useful by preparing the accessories for the next lesson, if she teaches her pupils to respect persons and property—all this is part of religion. Above all, the imagination, the emotions, and the sense of reverence for beauty—anything which awakens these qualities must be religious teaching, for are they not the roads leading to love, which is God? And all these things are taught not by words, but by doing—by action. They are not taught one day and left out of the next day's plan; they are not taught by one special kind of action, but by constant repetition under all the different forms which are supplied by the natural activities of a sane and happy life in the school or home."

In this number Professor James Orr writes on "The Problem of the Old Testament" in reply to Professor Peake, and Miss Edith Sellers has a painfully interesting article on "Poor Relief in the Balkans," bringing out in a striking manner the contrast between the self-reliant heroism of the Montenegrins and the very different condition of the people of Servia. The fine work done by the Queen of Roumania is also described. There is also a brief article by Miss E. M. Caillard on "The Divine Man," which is not explicit enough to be very helpful. What is required is a more careful analysis of the actual meaning of Divine Incarnation, and the manner in which the conviction of the Divine Presence in our life is brought home to men. The starting-point must be the religious experience of our life as it is now, and not the assumptions of ecclesiastical dogma.

In The Nineteenth Century and After Sir Robert Giffen writes on "English Commerce in a Naval War," and, having described in a forcible manner the disasters which must follow upon war, however successful it might ultimately be, draws a general conclusion as to the evils which must result, under present conditions, to all great powers engaging in war. "Before any advantage can come from the proposed attack, almost before the attack can be delivered, there is general ruin to the aggressor as well as to the attacked which no victory can compensate. . . . No big war among the great Powers can pay, and it begins with commercial disaster to all. This is, moreover, a new characteristic of international relationships. . . . The great nations of the world are really interdependent, and a sudden change among them to a state of war would mean a condition infinitely worse than that of any civil war on record."

The Rector of Bermondsey writes on "The Present Condition of the Evangelicals," not despairing of a stronger future for his party in the Church; and the Medical Officer of Health for Portsmouth contributes a salutary article on "Diseased Meat and Milk." Mr. Frederic Harrison, contrasting the Paris he knew in 1851 with the city of 1907, is unsparing in his condemnation of the decadence of its present art, in which it is only clever caricature that flourishes, and notes in conclusion how little outward result the disestablishment of the Church has had. "Peonage in the United States," by Mary Church Terrell, describes the terrible inhumanity of the system of farming out gangs of convicts in the Southern States, and the persistence of incredible cruelties, in spite of the law. In happy contrast to this dark picture is the account, by the Hon. Maude Stanley, of "Working-Girls' Clubs in Italy," in which ladies of position have of late years taken a keen personal interest, while the Queen herself has extended to them her warm and sympathetic patronage.

The Albany Review opens, as usual, with notes on current events, which are followed by an address by Mr. William Archer at the New York Peace Conference on "A Flag for Peace: A Plea for the United States of Europe." He quotes the description in Mr. H. G. Wells' "The Future in America" of a scene witnessed in New York of a schoolful of Jewish children, some of whom had only been in America a month, singing "God Bless Our Native Land" to the accompaniment of a pleasant flag-drill with the Stars and Stripes. As the children were thus being imbued with the spirit of patriotism, and learning to honour the national flag, so Mr. Archer urged that there should at once be raised a new flag for the United States of Europe, to rally all the friends of peace who believe in a union from which international enmity and jealousy has been driven out. It would stand for a noble sentiment which could be infused into the young and become at once the emblem of a great ideal. Mr. Sidney Webb writes on "Paupers and Old-Age Pensions," and Mr. Robert Lawson on "The Civic Import of the Pageant," giving the credit of its recent revival in this country to Mr. Louis Parker, who in 1905 showed what it could accomplish in the Sherborne Pageant. This was followed by Warwick and Glastonbury last year, and, in the present year, Oxford, Bury St. Edmunds, St. Albans, and now Liverpool.

In the August Cornhill Mr. A. C. Benson has the second of his new series of articles, "At Large." The subject is "Contentment," and the essay is to some extent an answer to the critics of his recent book, "Beside Still Waters." "My aim," he says, "has been to show how it is possible for people living quiet and humdrum lives, without any opportunities of gratifying ambition or for taking a leading part on the stage of the world, to make the most of simple conditions, and to live lives of dignity and joy. My own belief is that what is commonly called success has an insidious power of poisoning the clear springs of life, because people who grow to depend upon the stimulus of success sink into dreariness and dulness when that stimulus is withdrawn. . . . I believe with all my heart that happiness depends upon strenuous energy, but I think that this energy ought to be expended upon work, and everyday life, and relations with others, and the accessible pleasures of literature and art."

OBITUARY.

MR. THOMAS GREENFIELD.

By the death of Mr. Thos. Greenfield the Sunderland congregation has lost its oldest member. The deceased gentleman, who had been ailing for some considerable time, passed away on July 31 in his 81st year. He was connected with the Unitarian Church for upwards of sixty years, and was for many years a member of the Church Committee. His intimates knew him as a warm-hearted friend, with a rich fund of humour and possessed of a remarkably brave spirit, and a great lover of books. Mr. Greenfield was widely known, and was much respected. His death will cause much sincere sorrow. The interment took place on Sunday, August 4, at Sunderland Cemetery in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends. The service was conducted by his old friend, Mr. J. G. Stirling, who gave a very impressive address.

CAST THY BURDEN.

CAST thy burden, heart of mine,
On the might of Love Divine;
Heart of man would freely bless,
Will the heart of God do less?
Fear not, doubt not, look above,
Hast thou never heard of Love?
Hast thou heard, but heard in vain?
Why art thou cast down again?

Cast thy burden, heart of mine,
On the might of Truth Divine;
Ere its lightest word decay
Heav'n and earth shall pass away;
Seek no more the shifting sands,
Here the Rock of Ages stands,
Trust thou Truth, and Truth shall be Everlasting Friend to thee.

Cast thy burden, heart of mine,
On the might of Joy Divine;
Love triumphant, Truth the strong,
Be the music of thy song;
Mourn no longer, lift thy voice,
In the Lord of Joy rejoice,
Thou art His, and He is thine—
Thine for ever, heart of mine.

W. G. TARRANT.

You talk of the prosperity of your city I know but one true prosperity. Does the human soul grow and prosper here? Do not point me to your thronged streets. I ask, Who throng them? Is it a low-minded, self-seeking, gold-worshipping, mandespising crowd, which I see rushing through them? . . . Do I meet a grasping multitude, seeking to thrive by concealments and frauds? an anxious multitude, driven by fear of want to doubtful means of gain? an unfeeling multitude, caring nothing for others, if they may themselves prosper or enjoy? In the neighbourhood of your comfortable or splendid dwellings are there abodes of squalid misery, of reckless crime, of bestial intemperance, of half-famished childhood, of profaneness, of dissoluteness, of temptation for thoughtless youth? And are these multiplying with your prosperity, and outstripping and neutralising the influences of truth and virtue? Then your prosperity is a vain show. Its true use is, to make a better people.—Channing.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HOLIDAY WITH GRANDFATHER.

II.

FRED and Susie were rather tired with the long train ride when they reached the end of their journey, and Susie was feeling a little homesick also; but tiredness and homesickness quickly passed off when they left the station and began their walk to grandfather's house, which was about a mile and a half away from the station. Their luggage had been left in charge of the porter, who was directed to put it on the milk cart when it returned from the station to a dairy-farm not far from where grandfather lived. What banished homesickness was the look of joyful affection on grandfather's face. He was so like mother, only older, of course, that Susie went up to him at once and put her hand in his and looked into his face with such trustful love that the old man's heart was quite won. If Susie seemed to see her mother in grandfather's face, he, too, was almost startled to note how much Susie was like her mother had been in the years long past. So, at once, the two became comrades and chums, and though Susie often during the holiday longed to see and have a talk with mother, she was never really homesick again.

And what banished the train-tiredness from both Fred and Susie was something, they did not quite know what, a sort of gladness in being alive. This gladness seemed to be made up of different half-noted things. The robins were singing their evensong; now and again a lark would break into a flood of song; then the rooks, flocking homewards, made the air resound with their cawing. These two children just come from a noisy town heard these sweet peaceful country sounds with a restful joy which they could not put into words; or, when bird's song and rooks' cawing ceased—they listened to the seemingly absolute silence, and marvelled.

And all this while clover and honeysuckle blossoms were filling the evening air with sweetness, and again the children's minds and hearts, without their knowing quite why, were refreshed and uplifted.

The nearer field way home led them first across two meadows, then down a lane with high banks and hazel-hedges on either side. Next came a rather steep zig-zag path leading down to a railed footbridge over a brook. The lane had been attractive to Susie because there were many flowers of many sorts, and, better still, an abundance of ferns, large and small; but the brook was more alluring still, for not only did its banks bristle with all sorts of water-loving plants, but its clear waters were alive with fishes, which just now were busy securing their evening meal of flies. Flies! yes, myriads of them—caddis flies, stone-flies, alder-flies, and dragon flies, sporting in the rays of the setting sun.

So they loitered on the bridge and watched the fishes darting after the water-flies of different kinds, and admiring the tall water plants, great yellow loosestrife, purple loosestrife, meadow sweet, and great spearwort, all lit up and glowing in the light of the sunset. A short distance off the brook widened out, and deepened into a pool, fringed with plummy sedges and bulrushes. The water of the pool was quite smooth, and the surface reflected, perfectly, the image of the gold and crimson sunset clouds. So still were the two children, and the old man, that the birds and other living creatures forgot that they were there, or took no notice of them, and it was a good lesson for Fred and Susie on the best way to study wild life, for whilst they were admiring the silvery fishes playing in the shallow beneath the bridge, a water mole came out of his burrow in the bank and took leisurely little swims and dives quite close to the three delighted nature students, and they had a capital opportunity of noting his warm chestnut fur coat, never wet, and his shining black eyes, and the long feeling whiskers on either side of his face. Whilst they were watching him, in almost breathless stillness, grandfather said in a low and quiet tone, "I want you to look very, very quietly at the end of that broken tree-branch which stands up out of the water, about twelve yards up the stream; turn round ever so slowly and make no noise!"

Fred and Susie did as they were directed, and there, sure enough, at the end of the branch they beheld a real live kingfisher in all his glory of blue and buff and emerald green, and brown and black plumage—a living gem! He sat so still, peering into the water with those bright black eyes of his. Then, sudden as a lightning flash, he pounced, and dived, and came up with a minnow in his beak. Returning to his branch he perched for a moment, just to shake off a few drops of water from his lovely plumage, and then flew right down stream, under the bridge where Fred and Susie and grandfather were standing, so still that he did not notice them! Grandfather was, I believe, the most delighted of them all, for he said, "I have watched Mr. Kingfisher, times enough—at a distance, and I've often enough frightened him, and had to be content with a second's glance at his flashing wings, but never before have I seen him fly up to me and pass me within two yards in the way he has just done. It is a great compliment he has paid you two, to let you see him at close quarters like that. Now, Susie, shall we bring a shot gun to-morrow, and shoot beautiful Mr. Kingfisher, and have him skinned and stuffed, to put in your best Sunday hat?" But Susie being only a girl, and not a grown-up fine young lady, thought herself bonnie enough in a plain hat, and said she hoped to see the beautiful bird often during their holiday, alive. And indeed, I, who write this story of a holiday, believe that many a tender-hearted maiden who is eager to buy a dead bird for her hat, would recoil at the idea of having it killed just on purpose for her, if only she could see it alive and busy about its own business, i.e., the support of its family. But tut-tut! this is rank moralising, and my work is only to tell a tale, "without any tiresome morals at the end of every chapter," as my little brother used to say.

Now, here I am, at the end of my column, so I will tell you the rest of the walk to grandfather's home next week.

SUMMER REST.

BEAUTIFUL for situation is the village of our summer rest—one of thousands scattered over "Happy England"—happy indeed, if only her people could enter into their full inheritance, with leisure to enjoy, and minds and hearts to realise all the wealth of beauty and delight given by the good God equally for all.

On Bank Holiday, out on the open common, with not a house in sight, yet not twenty-five miles from London, among the bracken and the heather in full bloom, with the fir woods giving their own delicious fragrance to the air, there was a great spreading beech tree, into which the children had climbed and made a house there, and discovered a glorious outlook over the tree-top, while some of the long branches below almost swept the ground. And there came along four rough, good-hearted working lads, who had ridden down from London on their bicycles on Sunday evening, bringing a tent with them, and had camped in the open and had a glorious night and day, and that evening would ride home again. They looked up into the great beech tree and seemed to discover a new pleasure there, and soon proved that they too could climb, though, as it seemed, with the caution of men exploring a new country. They picked up the beech nuts which the monkeys up above had been dropping down, and one of them asked, Were they good to eat? The nuts, alas! were still empty, but the lads were reassured that in the autumn they would be very good. And then back they went to their camping-ground, a mile or two away, one of them with a great bunch of heather to carry home.

A trivial incident, may be; yet it set us thinking of how much is being done to make the people inheritors of their own beautiful country, and how much must still be done fully to share all the common blessings of life, of which there is always more than enough for all. It is delightful now to think of the hosts of country-holiday children and summer camps for boys on the moors or the sea-shore, and what teachers and friends who are with them can do to lead them into the wonderland of Nature, and to innocent, healthy pleasures, for a clean, strong life and happy comradeship. One thinks also of how much is done, and how much more may be done even in town schools through simple Nature teaching, and the friendly correspondence between town and country, the sending of flowers and other things for the children's interest and delight, and not least through school gardens—even such a roof-garden amid the wilderness of streets as was recently shown in the Whitechapel "Country in Town" exhibition.

And it is not for the children only, but for all alike that in the cities the beautiful parks are there, and sometimes broad roads with avenues of trees, and patches of grass and flowers tucked in wherever a happy chance allows (which a wise government will always be eager to look for), and then in some favoured cities the great river with its freshening water-way. More and more our people understand that these are the things which must be cared for; and then in the country summer opens wide its gates, and it is a shame that all alike cannot enter in at least for a few days. When wisdom has found a way to make an end of the gross evils of sweated labour, the next thing will be to secure that every tired man and woman in the land, and every pale-faced child, shall have a due portion of summer rest and a glimpse, at least, of "Happy England."

"One of thousands," we said; and yet every time we come down to our village it seems as though no other in the land could be quite so beautiful as this. Hardly more than an hour by rail from London Bridge, and then a quiet half-hour's walk from Holmwood station, by the lanes and through the wood, up to the village, and there we are in Paradise. Lying in a hollow of the hill-side, nested among the trees, with the open common above, and guarded by a little wooded hill, the village appears a very haven of peace, a dream of loveliness in the quiet evening or the fresh morning sunlight, in every season of the year beautiful and homely in the happiest sense. Over the edge of the cup in which it seems to lie, the meadows on one side slope down into a wooded valley northwards, while over a lower edge to the south, dropping down past the village green, by the grounds of a neighbouring house, the trees seem to flow down like an abundant stream into the plain below. From the door of the post-office, which is also the one village shop, one looks out upon the richly wooded plain to the line of the South Downs, and asks for no more perfect view. Seven hundred feet, or more above sea-level, the air is fresh and pure, and close at hand is Leith Hill, the highest point of this southern country, though only with its tower reaching a thousand feet. For the great mountains one must go elsewhere, and for lakes or the sea, but for summer rest in pure, invigorating air, amid a perfect harmony of beauty, rich and manifold on every side, even the common roads in lines of beauty, passing into the woods east and west, and paths in every direction leading to ever fresh surprises of delight, what can be better than this village of ours, here in England, close at hand?

Three minutes to stroll up the sandy path at the back of the school-house and the post-office, among the bushes and the bracken, by the side of the wood and a little way up the hill, then, in a bed of heather, in the shade, if you will, of one of the fir trees that stand around, and the village itself is out of sight, but a new glory of distant views is now unfolded. Over the near woods just below, harmonious lines of other wooded hills, and in between, on either side, and straight in front, the great panorama of the spreading plain, richly wooded all about the meadow lands; southward, as we have said, over where the village lies, to the South Downs, eastward over the same great plain, though in a different setting, and bordered also by the line of the North Downs, and then northward over the rolling lines of low-lying hills to where London is, though we are not eager to see even the distant glimmer of its lights or its towers on the clearest day. Three separate vistas of abundant life, and all beautiful under the heavens of God, morning and evening and at glorious noon, beautiful also as the home of happy people. There comes in the passionate thought in face of such a view over the wide-spreading land:—Oh, for a manhood worthy of a land so rich and beautiful! And much true manhood there is, and many homes truly happy in those villages and in the towns, thankful for daily blessings which such a land provides. But the thought becomes a prayer that men may be more true, and the children may be taught more and more to enjoy and to take their part happily in honourable service, and to know what their inheritance is in this beautiful land. Summer rest gives strength and a new delight in believing, for it is out of the heart of Eternal Goodness that these things are given, a prophecy of the perfecting of the people's life, in truth and justice, in generous kindness, and pure delight, and brotherly love.

THE kingdom of heaven is not come even when God's will is our law. When God's will is our law we are but a kind of noble slaves; when His will is our will we are free children.—George McDonald.

LIVERPOOL'S 700TH ANNIVERSARY FESTIVAL.

"A CASTLE, A TOWER, AND A SHRINE."*

BY THE REV. J. COLLINS ODGERS, B.A.

"And Jotham built the high gate of the house of the Lord, and in the forests he built castles and towers."—2 Chronicles xxvii. 3, 4.

THUS are recited by the historian some of the conspicuous deeds of Jotham, the tenth king of Judah, the son of Uzziah, whom he succeeded B.C. 758. Jotham upheld the worship of Jehovah, "he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord," and consequently received Jehovah's blessing in a secure and prosperous reign. He rebuilt the principal gate of the temple at Jerusalem; whether the gate which he replaced was in a ruinous condition, or was unworthy of the structure to which it gave entrance, we do not know. And to consolidate his rule, and to resist with better chance of success the attacks of the Ammonite marauders he built many a castle and tower in the hill-country of Judea, dotted them about in the forests, the uninhabited districts of his kingdom, to stop the incursion of alien tribes and ungodly heathen. Strong castles for defence; high towers whence his watchmen might give warning of coming danger; an important addition to the building consecrated to the worship of Jehovah, these were the chief of his good deeds. His reign was prosperous because he provided, first, that which would give strength and security to his people; secondly, that which impressed them with the need of watchfulness; and, thirdly—last but not least—that which added to the beauty of the house of God, and lent a deeper consecration to their worship.

So it came about then that this monarch of Judah was celebrated in the history of those times because he built many a castle, many a tower, and helped to restore a church of God. A Castle, a Tower, a Church! Where have we seen in thought, if not in actuality, a Castle, a Tower, a Church in close proximity? Of what locality does this text of Scripture put us in mind? As to-day we join with hearty goodwill in the celebration of the 700th anniversary of the birth of this great city as a free borough, and as our thoughts go back over all the intervening centuries, over all the historic episodes so effectively presented in yesterday's great pageant, we cannot but recall the aspect of Liverpool as it presented itself to the spectator who sailed up the estuary two hundred years, we will suppose, after the signing of King John's famous charter, which raised the little collection of houses near the shore to the dignity of a free borough. What were the three largest buildings on this spot then? A Castle, a Tower, and a Church, and beyond them the unoccupied land, the forests, or the moors, the heath, or the moss, the retreat of the deer, and the lair of the wolf. First, a Castle with its three round turrets and entrance-gate, its massive walls, its moat, its drawbridge, and portcullis, this was the very symbol of strength to the citizens of Liverpool, a strength, no doubt, which at first they had reason to dread, a strength which might at any time crush their hard-won rights and liberties, and exact from them cruel fines and levies, for the Castle was built beside them not at their invitation or expense, but by a noble race of Norman descent, and the burghers could not but feel that they were in one sense the feudal vassals of the lord of that great fortress. They knew its strength; it was impregnable except to the assault of an army of trained warriors. And yet surely these citizens must have felt that in case of need that formidable castle would be able to protect them from any foe. No pirate or sea-robber would dare to land where those dark walls frowned upon them. But whether the castle stood against their liberties, and threatened their rights, or remained as a sure defence in time of common danger, there it was, always the most prominent figure in the landscape, strong and square, well placed, on the rising ground, and planted on the rock, the very symbol of strength.

* A sermon preached in Ullet road Church, Liverpool, on Sunday morning, August 4, in commemoration of the granting of Liverpool's first charter by King John, August, 1207.

Another feature in the aspect of Liverpool in the fifteenth century was its Tower, really a rival fortress, built by another great feudal lord, with embattled walls and narrow windows that could endure a siege, but it was not so formidable as the Castle, was surrounded by no moat, had no drawbridge or portcullis; it was situated at the water's edge, close to the custom-house and the busy walks of commerce; its owner was in touch with the burghers and merchants and knew their wants; he had more in common with them than had the proud possessors of the Castle, and it may well be that on behalf of the citizens who gained their living on the sea, from the summit of the Tower a constant look-out was maintained over the estuary, and all who came and went upon the water were closely watched from those narrow embrasures high above the strand, so that the Tower came, we need not doubt, to be to the people the symbol of Watchfulness. A feudal fortress? Yes. But close as it was to the water's brink, it looked out over the sparkling waves, and no craft upon that water-way could escape the notice of those who kept watch and ward within its walls.

Besides the Castle and the Tower one other building was prominent in the early years of Liverpool's growth, the square front of the Church of St. Nicholas, of which the graveyard walls were daily washed by the tides—the church which had taken the place of the more ancient shrine of St. Mary of the Quay. It was thither that the sea-men came to pay their vows at the altar of St. Nicholas, the patron-saint of sailors and merchants, and the guardian of the little town slowly increasing on the rising ground behind it. That Church, with its tower nearest to the waves, stood as the symbol of trust in a protecting Power, trust in One who could save from peril and disaster, confidence in One who listened to the prayers of the devout, and knew how to defend His own.

May we not say then, as we contemplate the history and growth of the little settlement of Liverpool, that three ideals were prominently presented to the eye of the spectator who approached it from the sea, three ideals which could never be for long absent from the minds of the citizens—the Castle, the Tower, the Shrine—Strength, Watchfulness, Trust in a higher Power? May we not say that the prosperity of Liverpool in the past has depended, in the future will depend, on Liverpool's ability to use the strength of its own resources wisely and well, on Liverpool's disposition to provide with caution and circumspection for coming needs; on Liverpool's reverence for holy things, its willingness to rest in the ordinances of a Supreme Will, and in the ministrations of an Eternal Love?

Strength! Was anything else in higher estimation in those long-past days? The very ideal of strength in the eyes of our ancestors was that of stone walls immensely thick, and narrow embrasures whence the archers could shoot their long and deadly arrows, and battlements on the roofs affording protection to the men-at-arms, a moat and portcullis, posterns and bastions. King Jotham, in ancient Judah, planned castles of defence for the protection of his subjects; but far stronger than any of his structures was the Castle of Liverpool. Yet this castle was taken and re-taken, it suffered siege and was captured, and gradually it became evident that the strength of a city lies not in her walls or in her bulwarks, not in bow, or spear, or arquebus, not even in rifle or cannon, so much as in the goodness and wisdom of her citizens. Moral forces are now more highly prized than physical, the strength of heroic purpose more than the thickness of the walls of a fortress, the self-control of a pure and honest character than the power of muscle or the toughness of steel. It was surely an inspiration far beyond his age which animated the soul of the writer of the Book of Proverbs when he wrote, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." Force may still exist, but it is no longer in evidence; it is there, but it is hidden away, to be used only when no other argument will prevail. We see now no high walls, nor even earthworks, encircling the city; and the Castle itself has gone, and where it once stood is that which reminds all beholders of the achievements of industry, art, science, and learning, and the moral excellences of that great Queen, the strength of whose reign was in the devotion of her people. The ideal of strength has changed, and Liverpool is strong to-day, not because of the number of her police who patrol her streets, nor of the corps of volunteers and regiments of soldiers which she could speedily summon in case of need, but because of the good-heartedness, the patriotism, the self-control, and the devotion of her citizens, their willingness to join together in brave effort when any special task is to be accomplished, their readiness to put aside personal ease at the call of duty, personal gratification when some public good is to be gained. It is honesty, sobriety, unity, co-operation, righteousness, and justice which compose her castle of defence.

And the Tower is gone, that symbol of unslumbering watchfulness, first over the occupants of the Castle, and then over the burghers themselves in the cluster of little streets hard by, and then over the great highway of the Mersey, and all the craft that moved upon its surface. The Tower has gone, yes, because it had become unnecessary when it was itself surrounded by loftier buildings, when improved methods of signalling could render information further than eye could reach, when the approach of vessels, yet below the horizon, could be known with certainty. As time went on, there were discovered other and better methods of keeping watch than by gazing through an embrasure or a loop-hole on the dancing waters of the estuary. But the moral necessity of watchfulness in all things has been learnt very effectually, let us hope, by the people whose ancestors for centuries dwelt beside the Tower of Liverpool. Foresight, caution, coolness, provision for all kinds of future needs as the city grew in wealth and population, better sanitation, improved educational facilities, everything that tends towards the higher discipline of mind and body, may we not say that these are in some measure the unexpected, unforeseen results of the impression made centuries ago upon the burghers of the growing town by the knowledge that their homes were safe only in so far as there were some to watch, by day and by night, aloft in the Tower by the sea? May we not surmise that the necessity for a look-out for possible dangers by sea, all through the Middle Ages, taught the great lesson of vigilance in all things, and imparted the initial impulse to the long series of improvements which has culminated in this our day in numberless beneficent institutions, in the organisation of charity, in the endeavour to save the waifs and strays from moral deterioration, in the erection of a College and a University. There is a precept of Christ which no modern or ancient city may forget with impunity. "Be ye ready also, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

A Castle, a Tower, and a Shrine. Yes; down by the water's brink the Church of St. Nicholas, the friend and guardian of sea-men; and that church took the place of an earlier chapel on the same spot, that of St. Mary of the Quay. The Castle is gone, the Tower is gone, but the church of St. Nicholas, destroyed, restored, re-built, remains to this day. How is that? Because there is an instinct of worship in the soul of man which is the most enduring part of him, and which lasts from generation to generation, from century to century, and in its essence defies all change. It is not this or that form of theology which is everlasting; that which endures is the sentiment of religion in the heart of man. Think of the extraordinary changes in doctrine, practice, profession, which have been witnessed on the site on which St. Nicholas now stands. First that little Roman Catholic shrine built so far back that the date of its erection is unknown; then the larger church of pre-Reformation times, becoming under King Edward VI. a reformed Protestant church. In the century that followed, St. Nicholas may have somewhat violently alternated in its allegiance now to Canterbury and now to Rome. Then it professed Presbyterianism when Parliament set up the Presbyterian system as the State Church of England; then High Episcopalianism in the days of Charles II.; Low Church ideals in the Georgian and early Victorian eras; and now a broader and more genial type of doctrine—a middle course between the two extremes—under the direction of the present rector. How many changes are there, and yet beneath every change there remains the same impulse, the same disposition to turn to the central origin and cause of things divine. The early inhabitants of this city repaired to St. Nicholas to pray for the saint's protection of their lives and cargoes on the sea, to ask his kindly intervention in the time of temptation and distress. The form of petition on men's lips and in their hearts may indeed have changed, our wants may now be very differently expressed, our religious ideals may be wider, may be higher, but do we not still need to fall back upon the Everlasting arms, and to ask help day by day from that divine Pity which overarches all? And thus it would seem that more lasting than stone fortress and all its machinery for attack and defence, more enduring than any apparatus for vigilance at what may be a post of danger, is this impulse in the heart of man which never really dies, the impulse which moves him to worship and adore.

We gladly join to-day, then, in the great thanksgiving whereby the inhabitants of this city would express their gratitude to the Lord of all for His abundant mercies during the last seven hundred years of life and progress. Mighty, indeed, has that progress been, and yet what are seven hundred years in comparison with the history of the universe or of the earth on which we stand? To those of you who have been born and bred upon the spot, it is surely something more than an emporium of trade, something more than a famous sea-port, something more than a great centre of population. I was born beside the southern sea, and among my earliest recollections are the glitter of the sunshine upon the dancing waves and the rocking of the tall masts of yachts and schooners lying at anchor in the bay. I can, therefore, feel with you the charm of a first home beside the sea. But if I understand aright the secrets of your hearts, you love the place of your birth, not because of its worldly greatness or wealth, or beauty, or maritime position, but because of its association with the great and good who have lived here and have left a pure and noble memory behind them. That place is sacred for us which is fraught with an imperishable bequest, the grace and blessing of some great personality, some bright persuasive influence which, when once felt, is never lost. The old crusader could not think of Palestine but of—

"Those holy fields
Over whose acres walked those blessed feet
Which, fourteen hundred years ago, were nailed

For our advantage to the bitter cross." We cannot visit Grasmere and Langdale without being reminded of the poet who felt so deeply the divine Presence behind all the loveliness of nature. We cannot look on Loch Katrine without experiencing the throb of romance inspired by the stories of Sir Walter Scott. We cannot stand in the centre of Oxford without remembering those who for conscience' sake were burnt to death by Baliol's walls. We love this place or that because of some Soul which in our conception still irradiates it with its own glory, still sanctifies it by its own pure trustfulness or self-devotion. Are there not many sacred memories connected with this city which make it a holy place for you? Are there not names inscribed on the marble slabs here in your own cloisters—names of some illustrious for learning, for piety, for philanthropy, for inventive genius, whom Liverpool never can forget, some whose memory may still inspire you to arduous labour for the further progress of the place which gave you birth? Yours is, indeed, a noble inheritance from olden time! May the sons and daughters of those who have brought honour and fame and virtue to this great city be in their day worthy of their forerunners, and prove what they can do to hand on to their successors that great inheritance, untarnished, nay, rendered more sacred, more precious, more glorious, by the lapse of years. And what is so calculated to inspire them with nobleness of heart and sublimity of ideal as those lessons which have seemed to me to be so clearly set forth in the chief features of this city, as it stood some centuries ago, the Castle, the Tower, the Shrine, the emblems of Strength, of Vigilance, and of Trust in the Lord of all.

A RELIGIOUS FAITH FOR TO-DAY.

I.—THE PRINCIPLE OF UNITY.

IN order to make the most of what the present offers, it is sometimes well to forget or ignore the past. We can do this only for a while, and never wholly, even for a while. For the past lives on in the present, and cannot be denied. Nor can we know where we are to-day without knowing something of where other men were yesterday. Yet it is probable that we shall never hear the deepest word of the Spirit of our own age unless we can silence, at times, all the voices of the past, and listen, broad awake, to what life is saying to us just here and now. It is probable that the present will never be all it might be to us until we have rejected the last claim to authority over us of the ideas and beliefs, even of the noblest ideas and beliefs, of former times. For each of us the sun rises anew every morning, and as we walk in its light the mind of the spirit brings its last and fullest revelation of truth to him who hath ears to hear.

In this, and one or two following papers, an attempt is made to express what the life of our own time has made clear to one wistful and doubting soul, amid the confused and conflicting voices of the church and the world. It may be of no value to any one but the writer himself; but in making the attempt, in response to the request of a friend, he has found it good to state thus, in few words, and by homely illustration, the faith which seems to him just now, and for the present, true and sufficing.

A few weeks ago, at the close of a Sunday morning's service, two children came up to me, each holding in his hand a beautiful rose. Silent and smiling they offered their flowers for my acceptance. It was a delightful greeting, and I am not likely soon to forget it. But afterwards, in a prosaic and rationalising mood, I fell to thinking of this beautiful act of theirs. I began to analyse the situation, and to ask why and how it could have such interest and significance and human charm.

There were, it seemed at the time, five quite separate and distinct forms of life represented there—the two children, the two roses, and myself. Each had, or seemed to have, an individual life of its own, which might exist without any relation to the other four. But then I considered that if they were really and intrinsically distinct, one from another—if they were not, in some vital way, united, they could not have anything to do with one another. Unless the flowers, and the children, and the old man were, in some sense, one, they could not have come into that pleasing relation one with another. If something did not unite us we should have been as strangers and aliens. The roses would have had no beauty or perfume for the children or for me, and there would have been no motive for the gift and its glad acceptance.

And this, I considered, is true with reference to all the facts of life and experience. However near, externally, things or persons may be to one another, they are still alien and dis severed, unless they are included in a larger whole. If the space between them, however small, were a vacuum, they would be unable to communicate—indeed they would be entirely unaware of each other's existence. All forms of life that can come into any conscious relation or fellowship of being must be, in their final significance, one life; they must be vital parts of a unity which holds them within itself, and links them together. The stones at our feet, whose history the geologist may read, the stars of boundless space, whose courses the astronomer may trace, the peoples of the earth with whom we may have relations, near or remote, must all be included within a unity of existence, which makes it possible for us to apprehend them, or, even for a moment, to hold them in our consciousness and feel that they and we are in the same world.

I have been reading lately a history of Egypt, telling the story of that wonderful people from the most remote periods of which anything is known. In that book there is the reproduction of a picture preserved in one of the ancient monuments. It was done with colours, on the wall of a predynastic tomb. It is said to be the earliest known painting in the world. It is probably at least 6,000 years old. It represents boats on the Nile, and the figures of men and animals on the land. It is very crude and very funny; but it is quite a living picture. And as I looked at it I was conscious of some strange and real, however remote, human kinship with the artist who painted that picture. The 6,000 years did not separate him from me; something united us; we belonged to the same world, to the same life, to the one reality that pervades all time and space, and is more than they.

Now this principle of unity which brought the flowers and the children and me together, which links the nameless artist of an ancient people with the reader of a book to-day, is not something which either of us could see or hear or touch. It is the silent law, the mysterious power, the invisible life of us all. That is to say, it is spirit; the inner reality, the one essential fact of life and the world, is spirit. And to apprehend this—to have conscious and vital relation with the Spiritual Unity of the whole is to have experience of the innermost truth of religion. The forms and dogmas of religion are many; but the heart of it is a sense of kinship with the life that makes all things one.

It must be confessed that to apprehend this inner spirit of the whole intellectually is an act of faith. For we cannot know the mysterious power which pervades and upholds all things by its life; we cannot comprehend a reality so vast; we can only apprehend and dimly conceive it. We see that the world of manifold things and creatures must be a unity, a universe. For if it were not so, they could not hold together or have any real and fellowly relations one with another. But the Spirit which creates, and is, that unity transcends our thought and eludes the finite understanding. We cannot reason out this conscious experience; we cannot explain the unity; we cannot define God. It is an act of faith; but not of irrational faith. Nay, it is reason itself which demands this faith; it is reason that compels us to affirm the all-embracing unity, because without it the world becomes an irrational process, and nothing is related to anything else, and all things are jumbled together—a chaos of confused and disconnected forms. And the world, obviously, is not that, for if it were no two persons could exchange a thought about it, or have any intelligible relations with it or with one another.

To apprehend the unity of life, then, is an act of faith, but of reasonable faith. The fundamental religious experience, on its intellectual side, is belief—a belief that transcends knowledge, but in no sense contradicts or obscures it.

Yet this intellectual apprehension is only one aspect of religious experience. It is possible to feel the unity which holds all things within itself. A reasoned, or what is called a scientific, knowledge of the All-pervading Life is not possible to the finite intelligence; but the direct and vital experience of feeling is possible. What the mind of a Plato or a Newton cannot compass or comprehend the heart of an unlettered peasant may realise and love. And this perhaps, after all, is knowledge, in the truest and deepest sense; it is intimate, and personal, and often passionate; it is the sure and unquestioning deliverance of consciousness; it is the soul's own knowledge of itself, in relation to the Life which is the Soul of all that is.

When I take a flower from the hand of a child, I may feel that the flower and the child and I are one in the common life we share together. When I look on a copy of the most ancient picture in the world, I may feel some touch of human kinship with the unknown artist who tried to portray the life of his own time. When I look on the hills which were hoary with age before any man or living creature breathed the air of this ancient planet, I may feel a presence there which "disturbs me with joy of elevated thoughts." The forces that brought them into being, æons of ages ago, bring life to you and me this morning. There is no break in the vast order of things, no vacuum separating the old from the new, the little from the great—the heart is in touch with all.

Nor is this feeling of unity and fellowship limited by our range of vision or perception. Beyond the visible forms of things, near and remote, or rather within them, behind them, and, at times, independent of them, there is the Mysterious Life of which they are the partial and finite expression. The Spirit whereof this amazing universe is but the robe, or the bodily form, the spirit within us may commune with now, and may know itself to be at one therewith.

"Wisdom and Spirit of the Universe!
Thou Soul that art the Eternity of thought!
And givest to forms and images a breath
And everlasting motion!"

—the heart of man may have fellowship with That, and in such fellowship the vital reality of religious feeling is possessed and enjoyed.

A little while ago two friends were sitting together amid the open spaces of the hills, conversing of things pertaining to the inner and spiritual life. And as they talked, and then were silent, they remembered how, twenty years before, in a time of much mental conflict and doubt, they had sat and talked thus, in a quiet woodland place, far away. Much had happened since, and they had wrestled with many thoughts, and their outlook upon life and the world had changed. But they agreed that what they had felt together in that earlier time, and what they felt now, of the inner truth of life, was the same. For, as they had realised then, amid the wreck of fallen creeds and crumbling religious forms, that the reality of experience was a communion of soul with the great Life of all, so had it been all through; so was it still. To feel the unity of the whole, to know oneself a part of that unity, to perceive that every other self, in all the seeming confusion and jumble of social strife, is a part of that unity—to live and think and act in fellowship with the Infinite All—this, they felt, is the heart of religion, this, the peace that passeth understanding, and this, the passion and the power of life's eternal joy.

Whatever our beliefs, then, or our unbeliefs, whatever the religious difficulties and spiritual perplexities of the time, we may begin just here; we may plant our feet on the rock of this simple, though, perhaps also, transcendent faith. Intellectually, we may apprehend this strange and complex world as a unity of all life, in which we and all the others must live and move and have our being. Emotionally, we may feel the presence and the power of the Eternal Spirit which makes, and is, this unity, and, feeling that, may know the rest and the comfort and the inspiration of God. And if we have no other faith than this—if none of the creeds of the past or of the present seem true or sufficing, and though we can fashion no new creed for ourselves, yet have we still a real and living faith, strong, and, at times, exultant, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail or the gates of heaven be shut.

ON NOT BEING HURRIED.

BY ADA TYNG GRISWOLD.

In the Christian Register.

Do you remember the girl once seen by Stevenson from the window of a train, balanced on the projecting tiller of a canal boat? — balanced "so precariously," he says, "that it seems as if a fly or the splash of a leaping fish would be enough to disturb the dainty equilibrium, and yet all these hundreds of tons of coal and wood and iron have been precipitated roaring past her very ear, and there is not a start, not a tremor, not a turn of the averted head, to indicate that she has even been conscious of its passage."

What matter if the locomotive whizzing by was an old story to her? What if you suspect that the novelty of a tally-ho horn would have sent her tumbling with indecent haste into the canal? Rather let us gaze at her with awe and admiration—the rare spirit whose poise no light thing can disturb, whose nerves start not at a sudden sound, whose life, passed in monotony on a canal boat, holds steadily to its allotted place, heedless of the hurry, and jar all round.

Of course I am country-bred. I hasten to admit that for the most of my life I have walked leisurely on board walks, and the rush of city folk over stone pavements has never ceased to be distasteful to me. There is among my acquaintance a wide-awake young business man whose course appeals to my old-fashioned notions. This scion of Puritan stock, ambitious and capable beyond the average, actually refused an exceptional opening in Chicago solely because he and his wife preferred a modest and serene life in a small city to existence in the vortex of Chicago hurry. Not for them the fallacy of a few years' mad scrambling, and then retirement with millions and nerves on edge. Still, though by nature moderate in my movements, and by circumstances placed in an abnormally quiet village, I can yet admit at times the necessity of hurry, and can even enjoy an occasional wild race to make a connection. I recognise, too, the hopelessness of protest against the killing pace of business men whose ambition is money, and of faculty wives who must, at any cost, prove the infinite capabilities of "the educated American Drudge." But how about vacations and other lucid intervals? Are you personally able to stop hurrying when there is no occasion for haste?

This fit of moralising is the result of observations made last year when off a-summering on sleepy Cape Cod, and at Nantucket, where, if anywhere, one should be able to loaf and invite his soul. But the moral was pointed on the way thither. For it came to pass that at this time a certain learned professor, a charming professorin, and a plain schoolma'am from the backwoods had planned to flee together from their accustomed haunts. Absolute relaxation was their quest, including incidentally, the killing of a week's time before they were due to make their annual descent on their respective relatives in the East. A trip on the Great Lakes, over the comparatively unfrequented Georgian Bay route, was the chosen means for accomplishing these ends. The hour of meeting at the boat was duly set, several days in advance, and at the appointed time, one by one, the anxious trio appeared at the rendezvous. The week before starting had been one of the kind you all know and dread, crammed as full of a thousand last pleasures and duties as if one never expected to see again a department store or the friends of his youth. Each member of the party had, of course, planned to arrive from his particular town on the train which gave the greatest opportunity for failure to connect with the boat, thus making quite possible the upsetting of the carefully dovetailed itinerary. First came the professor, weary but triumphant, and sat down to contemplate with glee the three yards of tickets and the baggage checks that were a triumph of persistent insistence. But soon, like Bradley Headstone of old, he began to undergo grinding torments, as he watched the clock and wondered whether their undoubted skill in the classics would be of any practical assistance to lonewomen travelling through a rainy night. Presently the plain schoolma'am being encumbered by less knowledge than the professorin, loomed up before his eyes; but it was not until the belated and breathless yet beaming professorin finally hove in sight that all three realised what a strain the likelihood of missing connections had put them under. The moralist here pauses to observe that it was perfectly feasible for any one of them to have taken an earlier train.

Once on the boat, however, vacation began. Oh, the pleasure of that first evening on the water, when the professor read to his companions enticing bits from the steamship company's folder—a prophecy of the joy to come! They greeted its rhapsodies with laughter, as befitted serious students of literature, and yet at times in the days that followed envied the promotor his command of language. For instance, thus saith the guide, "Here one explores the infinite ways of glorious solitudes," where "the lazy surge breaks with laughing mockery on the adamantine crests of countless islands," and "to the imaginative individual our vessel is truly an aerial ship that floats over the mountains and valleys of a submerged world." Here, surely, tired bodies and fagged brains may relax, while a haunting memory from Emerson voices their mood:—

"Of gulfs of sweetness without bound
In Indian wildernesses found;
Of Syrian peace, immortal leisure,
Firmest cheer and birdlike pleasure."

But, alas, for the force of habit! This ideal state of mind endured only while the boat was in motion and action impossible. For at every landing, deserted hamlet though it was, in spite of mutual resolves to sit calmly on the upper deck while the common herd struggled to be first ashore, the time never came when the professor, professorin, or schoolma'am maintained this dignified composure of mind. Each time they joined the crowd in the narrow quarters below, and went ashore with a rush. This, too, with no possible object, in most instances, to be gained. A few moments aimless standing on an almost deserted dock—that was all.

So all through the trip. When motion was physically out of the question, rest was enjoyed to the full. But, whenever change of cars or boat was to be made, who such hustlers as this academic trio, scurrying madly about with an unholy glee in each successful scramble? Indeed, so low had they fallen, that one of the chief charms of the excursion, which was voted by all a grand success, was the making of a series of connections by the narrowest possible margin—they, who had the summer before them, and were travelling purely for the sake of fresh air and unaccustomed scenes!

So at Cape Cod. Leaving the train one hot afternoon to take stage for the hotel we were kept waiting a short half-hour before the coach drove off. After the stuffy cars it was a delight to breathe the salt air, and the village scene was a heavenly change from the clang and roar of elevated and subway. The passengers, however, fretted and fumed as if they had urgent business cares on hand, instead of the passing of a restful Sunday by the sea. And the six-mile drive over good roads through almost continuous forests of pine and birch, with miles of ferns for undergrowth, was to them simply a necessary evil, to be endured for the sake of reaching the goal. And the goal a stuffy chamber in a second-class country hotel! Their object in life simply "getting there!" Going down to Nantucket a few days after this, the boat was late (her normal condition, but whisper it low). Now the passengers, who had hitherto showed every indication of enjoying the voyage—for the day was perfect and the white-capped waves were causing no apparent discomfort to any one—straightway assumed an air of impatience or long-suffering quite unaccountable. They were one and all seeking calm and seclusion. Otherwise, why Nantucket? Had they never heard that on that idyllic island the raging demon of the automobile is forced to move at the decorous pace of four miles an hour? But the glory of red and gold in the sunset or the boundless waste gleaming silvery in moonlight had no charms when once the news spread that the boat was an hour and a half late. Charity bids me entertain the suggestion that some besides myself were haunted by the vision of a friend, who, having snatched a hasty dinner—or, worse still, dinnerless—was standing all this time weary and tired in spirit on the wharf. For my own part, let me shamelessly confess that I enjoyed the splendour of the sea in spite of the vision.

It is needless to multiply instances. You all know how it is. I wonder how many of you could stand the test for serenity of mind that I have often, with some interest, seen applied to my fellow-townsmen. Let me put the case. You are to visit in a neighbouring town, and are obliged, through nefarious rivalry of railroads, to spend the long hours from nine till three in a waiting-room, always dingy, sometimes very dirty. It is the not unnatural custom of victims of this arrangement to bemoan their fate for a week in advance, and to be conscientiously miserable over the discomfort of it all the while they are there. But one serene soul I know says: "At home, or with my friends, I should spend those hours reading or sewing, with an occasional turn out at doors. I can do all those things of the junction." Thus, provided with workbag and book, she forgets that switch-engines are puffing past the grimy windows, or even enjoys vicariously the wedges of apple pie wherewith jolly train men refresh themselves in her sight.

So the moralising schoolma'am asks, How many of you could realise that you were spending nine hours to go a distance of seventy miles, and yet retain your equanimity? It is a greater trick than the poise of Stevenson's canal-boat girl. I am tempted to close with a sentence from Mr. Ames's fine sermon in a late Register, "Why do we keep up the tension and strain, even when we are doing nothing?"

TO SECRETARIES OF CONGREGATIONS.

SIR,—May I make an earnest appeal to secretaries of congregations, and others, to make correct announcements of the services in your calendar and elsewhere. I have recently visited various churches, and have not always found the preacher in the pulpit who is announced in your calendar. To-day I had intended to visit a church in London. The minister is announced to preach, and I particularly wanted to see him. Fortunately, I had occasion to write to him during the week, and he informed me that he would be away. I accordingly went to another church at which the minister is announced to preach, both morning and evening. I found the church locked up, and a notice on the board that "Next Sunday" there would be morning service at 11.15, and that in the evening the Rev. So and So would preach—not the minister of the church. At 11 o'clock on Sunday morning it is uncertain whether "Next Sunday" really means this Sunday or next. I sought out the chapel-keeper, and ascertained that "Next Sunday" meant to-day, and that "Morning at 11.15" without the name of a preacher meant that there would be no morning service at all.

I have nothing to say against the omission of the service, or even the occasional closing of a church in London at this time of year. It is better to have one service well attended than two badly attended, and it does no one any harm to go once in way to some other church than that which he usually attends. Nor do I complain of any personal annoyance or inconvenience. I had a very pleasant morning, and an interesting conversation with two men whom I met in a public garden on my way home. But I do plead, in the interest of the churches themselves, and of the general public, that whatever announcements are made in your calendar, or elsewhere, should be unambiguous and correct.

FRANCIS H. JONES.

Sunday, Aug. 4, 1907.

WITH THE VAN AT WALTHAM.

ON Sunday evening I had my first experience of the van. Arriving about half an hour before commencing I found it "pitched" in the Market-square at Waltham Abbey, and examined with great interest its fittings and arrangements. The ingenious way in which each bit of space is made to do double duty, and the appointments are thus made commodious, reflects great credit alike on the designer and the missionaries who find it possible to use it as a scullery, kitchen, bed-room, dining and drawing-room and library.

But it is about its mission, rather than its design, I want to write.

First, in Mr. Bertram Talbot we have one of those devoted, single-eyed and level-headed enthusiasts who are so real in combining zeal and courtesy with common sense and thoroughness. I noticed this first on the way from the station to the place of meeting, a twenty minutes' walk, giving ample opportunity for a display of tact in distributing advertisements of the meeting. Of the many to whom these were offered with a smile and kindly invitation, not one refused, or failed, so far as I could see, to accept it with thanks.

As eight o'clock approached people began to gather in the square, and when the "organ" voluntary began they soon closed up around the van. I noticed how varied the audience was. A number of working men in work-a-day clothes, then many well-dressed persons, apparently out for a walk; then others who had evidently just left other services, many carrying hymn and prayer books. On one side was a group of Salvation Army officers, and by the time the Scripture reading and prayers were over between 400 and 500 must have been there, a number which did not diminish up to the time when I had to run away for my train.

I had been asked to speak about my own pilgrimage from Methodist to Unitarian.

When I stood up two things impressed me strongly. First, that to many there what I had to say, however carefully expressed, must come with something like a shock; secondly, that with so varied an audience even a bow at a venture must hit somebody, and strike a responsive chord. Thus cautioned and thus encouraged, I spoke for about twenty-five minutes to as attentive a crowd as I ever addressed. Everybody seemed to listen. Nobody interrupted, not even the children, of whom a few had collected close around the "platform."

But the revelation came when I had done. I had always thought of Mr. Rawlings as a quiet, scholarly man, whose discourses, carefully read without rhetorical or oratorical emphasis, were suited only for the solemn dignity of a cultured congregation. Yet here he stood revealed as a popular orator. His voice rang out clear and distinct, filling the market place, reaching and holding the attention even of casual hearers at the outskirts of the crowd. True, one man made occasional remarks, but not enough to interrupt the flow of his discourse, and as he retold in clear and simple language without manuscript the story of the Prodigal Son, and enforced its lessons, showing how exactly they fitted in with Unitarian teaching, I felt that to many of the orthodox present this would come as a new revelation, and the parable itself would be filled with a new meaning.

I felt, too, what a revelation of unsuspected power this must have been to the man himself, power of free utterance, of extempore speech, of which both he and his Hackney congregation would get the benefit, and which might yet be the means of attracting many who find our ordinary services too dull and uninteresting to attract their attendance.

To ministers who shrink from open-air work, and who have, as yet, held aloof from the van, I say, Try it! You will find it a new outlet for your powers that must reflect itself in your pulpit ministrations.

To laymen I say, Come and see for yourselves, and help in the work! You will find in it a stimulus to your zeal, and a new interest in worship and service.

One other suggestion. The one thing lacking at Waltham was singing. Cannot an effort be made to form a van choir from our London churches? If Mr. Harrison would call together the singers he conducts to the annual delight of the gathering at the President's reception, and appeal to them to sing with the van while in the neighbourhood of London, they and the movement alike would benefit—they most of all—and next, the churches in whose ministry of song they bear so helpful a part.

H. G. CHANCELLOR.

THE VAN MISSION.

WHAT follows here is the introductory part of last week's report, which we were unable then to publish:—

The week's work has been marked by a number of little incidents which are a pleasant set-off against the hostility which is so often shown. They may indicate as well the deeper feelings to which the mission appeals. The opposition, however noisy or vehement, is generally confined to a handful of partisans, whose authority is the letter of Scripture, and with whom no other single fact or consideration in the wide world seems to count. In reports of meetings, mention is naturally made of these disturbing elements, but it is not wise to exaggerate their importance. Only on a very few occasions, has the sympathy of a meeting been with our opponents in any marked degree. More generally the crowd enjoys the heckling, but insists on fair play; and more often than not displays impatience as soon as the questioning develops into interruption. The interesting thing would be to ascertain the impression made upon those who do not disturb, and who stand attentively listening two and three hours and often longer. Many of course will simply be indifferent; others are silent in the hearing of a new thing; perhaps weighing it up and establishing mental contrasts for themselves. The missionaries realise that approval is less likely to manifest itself than disapproval. People do not immediately applaud that which is unfamiliar, and which makes a straight and serious appeal to them as thinkers. But the presumption is that the majority if not "for us" are not against us. Night after night, invariably in fact, knots of men remain in eager groups discussing with the missionaries long after the close of the formal proceedings. And it is in this work "on the ground" that the best evidence is found of the acceptance with which our message is heard.

The attendances have again advanced. Three or four meetings have been prevented by rain, and in one instance the proceedings were adjourned for 40 minutes in the hope that matters might improve. Half a hundred folk stood through it all, and the missionary was convinced that four or five times that number would have been present, as in previous and succeeding evenings, had the weather permitted. In Newcastle one whole meeting was held in the wet, and a crowd of 300 was present all the time. Seven meetings have had fewer than 100 persons present; at eighteen the attendance has varied from 200 to 800. As anticipated the news from Scotland is good, seven evenings being responsible for 1,910 adults. The return includes two evenings not included in last week's notes; and excludes children's meetings, of which several have been held with 100 and upwards present on each occasion. Two evenings were lost through rain, and a third through a race-meeting. The experiment with No. 4 Van promises well, and a series of meetings has been held at Newcastle which have increased in size, interest and enthusiasm as the time passed. The total attendance for 29 meetings with the four Vans reaches 7,625, an average of 263.

The meetings for the week just closed show an average attendance of 280. Rainy weather interfered somewhat, but in only two cases were meetings impossible, and only two had audiences of below 100. It was estimated that 1,000 gathered round No. 1 Van on Sunday last at Mansfield. A pleasing feature at Shirebrook was a welcome by the Primitive Methodists who came along to help the singing. The Scottish Van has met with encouraging success at Kilwinning, and again at Saltcoats, where 500 attended last Sunday. Some highly metaphysical questions were propounded at the meetings of No. 3 Van, at Hoddesdon, where a wholly unprecedented interest was manifested in "Monism," the "cosmic" or "extra-cosmic" nature of Deity, the origin of the universe, and the warrant for the "categorical imperative." It is satisfactory to learn that the querist expressed thanks and agreement at the close of his two evenings' catechising. This Van has travelled by way of Hoddesdon to Enfield, Edmonton, and Tottenham, and is therefore now well within the London area. A curious manifestation of the "all-or-nothing" secularism emerged at a meeting of No. 4 Van, at Newcastle-under-Lyme, the first, we believe, of this particular kind of opposition met with this season. It would seem that Secularism itself has felt the influence of changing time and thought. The record of missionaries shows the following as taking part:—No. 1, the Revs. R. P. Farley, A. Hall, and F. H. Vaughan; No. 2, the Revs. J. Forrest and E. T. Russell; No. 3, the Revs. J. A. Pearson, H. Rawlings, and T. E. M. Edwards; No. 4, the Revs. B. C. Constable, T. Paxton, and W. L. Schroeder.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Atherton.—Chowbent Chapel is closed for considerable repairs, installation of electric light, redecoration, &c. Services are being held in the school-room. Rev. J. J. Wright is just concluding a series of Sunday morning sermons on: "What Some Non-Theological People are Thinking and Saying about Religion." Among books and writers taken by way of illustration have been: "The House of Quiet," "The Thread of Gold," "The Upton Settlers," "From a College Window," and "Beside the Still Waters," by A. C. Benson. "Worry: The Disease of the Age," by Dr. C. W. Saleeby; "Happiness," by Carl Hilty; "The Way to Happiness," by T. R. Slicer. In consequence of the chapel being closed for a much longer period than was expected, the school sermons usually held in July are to be in the Volunteer Hall on Sept. 1, and Mr. Wright is to preach them just previous to setting sail for the international meetings in Boston.

London.—Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence again had a large party of teachers from our Sunday-schools at Ascot, on Monday. There were between 200 and 300 present, including the Revs. Gordon Cooper, A. Gordon, F. Hankinson, C. Read, F. Summers, W. G. Tarrant, and W. Wooding, and the Revs. G. W. Kent and Dr. Sellick (Universalist), of U.S.A. The day was delightful, and the unremitting kindness of the host and hostess made the occasion a most enjoyable one. In acknowledging a vote of thanks, Lady Durning-Lawrence made special reference to London friends who are to attend the Boston Conference, wishing them a pleasant voyage and safe return. This year's Ascot outing is, we believe, the 27th annual party of the kind. The Rev. G. Toye, as in recent years, superintended the railway arrangements.

London: Islington.—The Flower Show, which has become one of the important annual events of Unity Church Sunday-school, took place on July 24. The Rev. E. Savell Hicks presided. Mrs. Roper, of Kilburn, delivered an interesting address to the scholars, dwelling on the refining influence of plant culture upon character. Every one present was delighted to have the unexpected pleasure of seeing Miss Preston at the gathering, and she kindly consented, at short notice, to distribute the prizes, prefacing that part of the proceedings with a vigorous and able speech to the young people. The school choir, which had been trained by Miss Harris, gave various musical items during the evening in a very creditable manner, and the Rev. Charles Roper also made an excellent speech. The exhibition this year has been the most successful yet held—some 113 plants being shown, which number includes 10 old plants.

London: Stratford.—An interesting social meeting of young people and friends connected with the church was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday, July 31, when a presentation was made to Mr. and Mrs. Harry Maguire on the occasion of their marriage. Refreshments were supplied by the generosity of a few friends. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, in presenting the gift, stated that he had known both bride and bridegroom from childhood, and referred to their close connection with the church. Mr. Maguire represented the fourth generation that had been interested in the church, his great-grandfather having been one of the founders. The marriage of Miss Greenhalgh and Mr. Harry Maguire, B.Sc., took place on the previous Saturday, the ceremony being performed by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

Moneyrea.—The annual meeting of the members of the above church was held on Sunday last, at the close of morning service. The Rev. George J. Slipper presided, and the reports of the congregational committee and the Sunday and day schools were submitted by the hon. secretary (Mr. S. McK. Turkington). These were all encouraging, the record for the year being one of progress and hopefulness. Tributes were paid to the minister, choir, and organist for their respective services, and the various reports, along with the treasurer's statement of accounts, presented by Mr. R. Kennedy, hon. treasurer, were unanimously adopted. Mr. A. K. Stewart, treasurer to the Lyttle Memorial fund, in seconding the adoption of the report, also stated that the preliminary arrangements for erecting the memorial school were now completed, after unavoidable delays, occasioned by obtaining lease of ground, and the building of the school would proceed at an early date.

Newport: Mon.—On Thursday, July 25, the members of this church held their annual outing, the party numbering nearly 50. After a drive of 12 miles to Caerwent, the extensive Roman remains there were inspected. Tea having been partaken of, the village and neighbourhood were explored until the time arrived for the homeward journey. Everybody present united in voting the outing most enjoyable.

West Bromwich (Welcome Meeting).—On Monday evening, July 29, a public meeting was held, after a well-attended tea, to welcome back the Rev. F. A. Homer as minister of the Lodge-road Unitarian Church. Mr. Homer was the third minister of the church, and was obliged, by a breakdown of health, to resign the charge. Recently he has been minister at Taunton, and now, the pulpit having been vacant since the removal of the Rev. E. A. Voysey to Northampton, Mr. and Mrs. Homer return to West Bromwich. At the welcome meeting Mr. Byng Kenrick, president of the Midland Christian Union, presided, and there was a good attendance of neighbouring ministers and other friends. The Chairman expressed his great satisfaction that they had at last secured a minister for the church, but warned the congregation that if they expected great things from their minister they would be disappointed, unless they were prepared to do great things themselves. He congratulated the church on the way the members had held together during the time they had been without a minister, noted with pleasure the many encouraging and cheerful signs, and expressed the hope that they would now go forward and accomplish a good work. A number of members of the church and representatives of the school joined in the welcome, expressing their great pleasure in having Mr. and Mrs. Homer back again. Mr. Bowater, one of these, said they remembered the excellent work Mr. Homer did in his former ministry among them—his earnestness, enthusiasm, industry, and self-sacrifice. He hoped the members of the church would match those high characteristics which they knew Mr. Homer to possess, and that by the same unselfishness, earnestness, and self-sacrificing labour they would make the future of the church a great success. The Rev. Joseph Wood, on behalf of brother ministers and the Union, warmly welcomed Mr. Homer on his return to the district, and urged the congregation to remember that they were all ministers, and must loyally co-operate in carrying on the work of the church. No church could live merely by the preaching, however eloquent, of the minister. He especially urged that if their churches were to succeed they must be worshipping churches, for a worshipping congregation would be a working congregation. The Rev. F. A. Homer, in response, expressed his great happiness in being among them again, and grateful for the cordial welcome they had given him. If he had not got health in the West he had gathered some knowledge, and a few grains of wisdom for their benefit as well as his own. He was glad to see some new faces among the congregation, and he congratulated them on the splendid way in which they had held together during the time that they had been without a minister.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AFTER fifteen months' ministry Dr. Tudor Jones continues to send us good news of the movement at Wellington. The Sunday evening attendance is well maintained, and when Dr. Jones preached the first of a series of sermons on "New Investigations of Scholars concerning Jesus and Christianity" the hall, which seats 400 people, was crowded to the doors. Besides the work in Wellington itself, Dr. Jones, as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and accompanied by his wife, recently undertook a mission tour in the South Island, preaching and lecturing at Dunedin and Christchurch. At Dunedin intense enthusiasm was shown, in spite of the weather being so rough that for three days no boats were able to leave the harbour. On the evening of the first lecture over 200 people were present. Dr. Jones took as his subject "The New Movement in Theology in Britain, France, Germany, and Italy." The lecture occupied from 8 to 9.30, after which the meeting (which lasted until 11 o'clock) was thrown open for questions. At the second lecture on "My Pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism" about 250 people attended, although the storm was still raging. A large number of students from the University were present and took a lively part in the discussion. Several local ministers and students for the ministry visited Dr. Jones at his hotel, and expressed their interest in and sympathy with the movement, and at the lecture there was "almost a scramble" to secure pamphlets which had been placed on the table for free distribution. A large number of men and women also gave in their names as being ready to help in the movement. Dr. Jones is of opinion that the prospects at Dunedin are very hopeful for future efforts. At Christchurch, the weather being favourable, there were large and enthusiastic Sunday meetings, and sympathy was shown by repeated loud applause. The two week-evening lectures were not so largely attended owing to bad weather, but considerable interest was shown. All the meetings were fully reported in the daily papers, as was also an interview given by Dr. Jones to a representative of the Evening Star.

AMONG the distinguished scholars upon whom honorary degrees have been conferred on occasion of the tercentenary of the University of Giessen are Dr. H. C. Lea, of Philadelphia; Mr. F. C. Conybeare, of Oxford, "the meritorious interpreter and translator of the Armenian early Christian literature"; Professor Jean Réville, of Paris; and M. Paul Sabatier. Professor Rudolf Otto, of Göttingen, is also among the new Doctors of Theology, and Professor Albert Eichhorn, of Kiel. The announcement of these honours was made from the pulpit of the town church by Dr Krüger, on the second day of the celebration, with appropriate reference to each of the new doctors. His last announcement was of two names, linking together their thankful reverence for ripe old age and joyful encouragement of fearless youth, in the persons of Professor Friedrich Paulsen, of Berlin, the distinguished philosopher; and Lic. Friedrich Michael Schiele, of Tübingen, editor of the little weekly, Chronik der Christlichen Welt, and also of that invaluable popular series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, of which Bousset's "Jesus," Wernle's "Sources," and Wrede's "Paul" (shortly to be published) have already been translated into English.

THE Guardian's American correspondent uttered a lament last week over King's Chapel, Boston, the old Episcopal chapel, which, on the Declaration of Independence, discarded both the prayers for King George and the doctrine of the Trinity. The present lament is in connection with the new arrangement made by the Trustees of the Chapel, by which its services are henceforth to be in the hands of the Harvard Divinity School. That means that they will be of a broadly Catholic and undenominational character. But "We Churchmen," the Guardian's correspondent writes, "had cherished a hope, which has grown stronger of late years, that the remnant of the congregation might return to the faith of their fathers, and that the Nicene Creed and the Doxology to the Trinity might again be heard where they were so long rehearsed in Anglican liturgical forms; and some of us, who have from time to time, when we found the door of the Chapel open, entered and silently repeated the Creed, have added the prayer that the Church might soon come to her own again; but the prospect of a fulfilment of the hope and the prayer now seems far removed." So pious Roman Catholics still pray that the true Church may once more return to its inheritance in the great English cathedrals and parish churches. But for King's Chapel a better fate is reserved in its new dedication to a wider religious fellowship.

AT the closing session of the Congress on School Hygiene it was stated that 1,650 members and delegates had attended the 50 meetings of the congress, representing, besides foreign Governments, nearly 400 educational authorities. The congress adopted resolutions affirming the importance of training all teachers in the principles and practice of hygiene and physical training; demanding special schools for deaf children; the inspection of secondary schools on hygienic and sanitary grounds; and the medical inspection of school children, not merely for contagious diseases, but for general physical condition. A permanent international committee was appointed, and it was decided that the next meeting should be held in Paris.

THE Prime Minister and Mr. John Burns, President of the Local Government Board, expressed hearty sympathy last week with a deputation from the important Association of Municipal Corporations representing many of the largest municipalities in England, when they came to urge the importance of legislation giving to local authorities power to determine beforehand the plan of districts over which towns are likely to extend. Mr. Burns spoke of a draft Bill on town or suburb planning, which he said the Government had prepared, and which he considered preferable to the scheme presented by the deputation. The announcement of its provisions will be awaited with great interest.

THE principles of John Ruskin applied to manufacture have been successful, even in a commercial sense, at the Woodhouse Mills, Huddersfield, where for twenty-one years William Thompson & Son have put into practice his teaching, which was defined in the Spectator some years ago as being "based not, as ignominiously supposed, on the abolition of machinery, but on the two-fold principle of complete honesty and veracity in production and exchange, and in a true subordination of the production of wealth to the wider aims of man." Mr. George Thompson was a friend and disciple of Ruskin, and despite grave difficulties with customers, he established and maintained the system of supplying goods, all wool and no shoddy, paying the highest wages customary in the district, with an eight hours day for the workers and a fixed weekly wage, and sharing profits with them. A pension fund and sick relief fund have been established. No married women are employed, but on the marriage of a woman who has been long in the employ of the Society £5 or £10 is given. Profit-sharing is of the essence of the scheme, and the division is made in proportion to the wages earned by each member, Mr. Thompson included. The profits have been credited to workers in shares on which 5 per cent., the maximum rate of interest, has been paid. The celebration of the "majority" of the firm was the occasion for sincere congratulations and happiness, and of an affectionate tribute to Mr. Thompson, the man who reorganised the firm on what may be called Ruskinian lines.

PROFESSOR GEDDES recently gave an address at Chelsea, pointing out the possibilities of the district as an art and culture city, and a "Chelsea Embellishment Society" has been formed, with Sir Thomas Barclay (who suggested the organisation) as chairman. To a representative of the Tribune Sir Thomas Barclay explained that the intention is to do what German "Verschönerungsverein" do for their cities, with money privately subscribed, and often with the assistance of grants from the civic treasury. Paths are made in attractive places for the use of the public, seats provided where there is a pleasant outlook, and in many ways beauty and the enjoyment of beauty are secured. The immediate aim of Professor Geddes is illustrated by what he has done at Dundee and Edinburgh. In Dundee, for example, the asphalt near the walls round one of the elementary school playgrounds has been broken up, and a border of flowers and shrubs put in its place. Without much expense, he considers we might in many places have flowers and plants instead of asphalt. The "Country in Town" exhibition, recently noticed in these columns, was designed with the like object of replacing ugliness and monotony by beauty, even without any large schemes of re-building and clearing the ground.

"THE Gains of Faith from the Advance of Science" was the subject of a fine sermon preached at Leicester by Canon J. M. Wilson, of Worcester, during the meeting of the British Association, and published in last week's Guardian. 1 Cor. xiv. 15, was the text, "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also." Faith in the true sense of a reverent conviction of there being behind the veil of this visible world an infinite Wisdom and Power and Purpose, is vastly strengthened, he said, by the increase of knowledge which we owe to science, and men of science are men of strong faith. Whatever opposition there has been or still remains, "is not between science and faith, but science and theology, for theology has often been rigid and inelastic, while both science and faith have expanded with the thoughts and knowledge of men. Unhappily, but almost inevitably, faith has often identified itself with the theology of the day, or rather with a theology, already seriously modified by living theologians, and has, therefore, been drawn into an opposition to science which is purely imaginary. Men of science are not foes of faith; they are proving that faith—Christian faith—is not to be identified with popular theology and its literal interpretation. And the gain, the relief to faith, can scarcely be over-estimated. Faith is being relieved from an intolerable confusion of ideas."

"THE thought of evolution," Canon Wilson further said, "has transformed revelation into insight and discovery, and the world is slowly learning that this transformation is not inconsistent with Christian faith. We cannot at present bridge the chasm between our conceptions of the personality of the Father to whom we pray, and that of the Universal Spirit which is the life of all that lives; nor that between necessity and freedom; nor can we understand ultimate mysteries in any case. But these limitations need trouble no one; we can hold fast to God and Christ, and truth and right and duty, retaining our familiar modes of thought while they serve us, and play our part in the world, without dreaming that we can know the whole, and prematurely constructing a new theology."

ANOTHER gain to faith from Science, which Canon Wilson noted, was that it helps us "to see that the different forms of faith and worship are not related to one another as one true, and all the rest false; but as higher and lower, as adapted to varied stages in intellectual and moral development, as processes of approximation to truth, of education of the spirit of man. It is, therefore, making possible not only a spirit of tolerance, but, what is far greater, the existence of a really Catholic Church, in which in all humility the various Christian bodies in our own land, and on a wider scale all the nations of the world, will be content to do their work side by side, not as jealous and aggressive rivals, but as ministering to different temperaments and types and stages of development amongst men, exponents of the manifold wisdom of God. Surely thus our world must appear in the eyes of the All-seeing Father."

A VALUABLE Blue-book on old age pensions has just been issued, containing a résumé of the investigations made by Royal Commissions and Parliamentary Committees since 1893, and their results as affecting the problem to-day. The first was the Commission on the Aged Poor under Lord Aberdare, which reported in 1895 that from financial reasons it could recommend nothing. In 1898 followed Lord Rothschild's Committee's report, which was also negative. Mr. Chaplin's Committee, in the next year, was more hopeful. It declared that the evidence favoured belief in the practicability of the scheme for old age pensions to all, but certain specified classes, who should attain the age of 65. Another Departmental Committee, under Sir Edward Hamilton, attempted to calculate the cost of this proposal. Again in 1903 a select committee was appointed to consider the Aged Pensioners' Bill. This Committee endorsed the main outlines laid down by its predecessor of 1903.

THE tables in the new Blue-book contain a mass of important statistics. They show the number of pensionable persons in the United Kingdom under the Chaplin scheme, as about 686,000. In other words, of 20 persons of 65 years of age and upwards, 8 are disqualified because they have an income of 10s. a week, 5 have received disqualifying poor relief, and one is ruled out for other reasons; but 6 remain. Out of 20 persons, only 8 are disqualified by comparative comfort. The cost of such pensions, including administrative expenses, has been estimated roughly at nearly eleven millions pounds; and if half of this were defrayed out of local rates, it would entail the levying of a rate of about 5d. in the pound. If, however, the pensionable age were at first raised to 75 years, the cost would be reduced to little more than a quarter (about £3,000,000). These fifty pages of sober statements are full of the tragedy of the aged poor. They deserve the widest and most patient consideration. But after so many years' investigation the time for legislative action has arrived.

THE Yorkshire Unitarian Club will entertain the Rev. Robert Collyer to dinner on Saturday, September 28 next, in the Leeds and County Liberal Club, Quebec-street, Leeds. Applications for tickets may be made to the hon. secretary, Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield-mount, Beeston, Leeds.

MISS MONTGOMERY, of Withington, the Christian World recorded last week, celebrated her hundredth birthday on Tuesday, August 6. She is a member of Union Chapel, Manchester, the scene of Dr. Maclaren's long ministry, and was present at the church meeting in 1858, when Dr. Maclaren, then of Southampton, was invited to the pastorate. Miss Montgomery's health is good, and her interest in public matters is still quite alert.

THE visit of the Housing Congress to Liverpool was of special interest. It is stated that the average workman there earns only 16s. a week, and has a large family. This condition has been taken into consideration by the municipal authorities in their housing enterprises; and Dr. Albrecht, of Berlin, stated that they had grappled with their problem more successfully than any others. The foreign visitors were, however, shocked by the sight of the ragged children who grow up in them.

THE first of our Westward-bound brethren to report progress to us from the other side is the Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope, from whom a letter, describing the voyage of the Empress of India, has just come in. We hope to print it in our next issue, and to follow it up with other communications from one or another as these adventurous weeks go on.

A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.*

WE have had the opportunity of testing the value of Miss Kate Warren's specimens of English literature in some of the uses for which her book was primarily intended. We have found it of service in a literature class; and it has been of particular value in our endeavour to impart some slight knowledge of the matter and manner of our earlier English writers.

The plan of the book follows very closely that of Dr. Stopford Brooke's Primer of English Literature, as a companion to which it has been prepared in the first instance. The only deviations are the inclusion of a few writers who did not call for treatment in the Primer, and the exclusion of the dramatists, whom to represent would have required an indefinite, and unreasonable, extension of the thousand pages which make up Miss Warren's book. Her apology for this curtailment, the plea of space, is in itself sufficient; we may add to it the contention that adequately to represent English drama, even apart from the work of Charles Lamb, would have demanded a volume of the same dimensions. As a matter of fact, no anthology of the drama can faithfully represent the drama: the diversity of interest and the variety of manner, method, and action in the work of any great dramatic writer, of the time of Elizabeth or later—to say nothing of mysteries and moralities—preclude necessarily brief excerpts as unmistakably misleading.

Shakespeare still suffers in the elegant extracts of books provided for such as the popular elocutionist—witness the "seriousity," as a friend calls it, of the drivelling morality of Polonius's "advice" to Laertes, complete in its smugness and senility to the very last sentence, which only means in that foolish mouth, "Be selfish, and you will be right with the world." Miss Warren has been judicious in leaving drama religiously alone, save for two pages of fine examples of Marlowe's "mighty line" in Tamburlaine the Great.

Appropriately, Dr. Stopford Brooke has written an introduction, wonderfully comprehensive for its length, penetrating, solid, and—to use a feminine word—charming. It gives the reader a clear indication of the extent of our literature, and, what is more important, its complexity and intensity. It is ten pages of brilliant essay-writing, a splendid piece of descriptive literary work which commends Miss Warren's book by adding to its value.

Coming to the Treasury itself, we have passages of verse and prose representative of authors from the seventh century to the nineteenth. Of the earliest of these we have presented a text as close as possible to the original, with prose translations of distinct quality and the briefest necessary explanations and notes. There are good specimens of Beowulf, Caedmon, Cynewulf, King Alfred, and Layamon, an interesting rune song, riddles, and extracts from the chief epics, romances, and chronicles. Following upon these we have fourteenth and fifteenth century work, which only needs interpretation by means of the glossaries supplied. The original spelling is preserved to the time of Spenser—then the general reader is in his free element.

Here we may intercept a word for first things. As a general rule, an author is best understood in a first edition—this is our only reason for securing first editions where we can, for he who buys books to sell again, particularly for a profit, is an enemy of all goodness! And, as an infallible rule, an author is best understood as his words are read in their original spelling; we draw the line only at his punctuation. He, or his editors, may not have known how exactly to measure out the sense of his sentences, but he did know the exact sound-value of his words. So to-day there are some of us who, for love of him, detest spellings like "labor," and all other Americo-Latinisms, and cleave to "labour" with its long drawl, the drawl of the full-voiced poet and of the ages. To read a man as he wrote is to get at more than the facts he wrote, and the thoughts—it is to get behind these, and behind his errors and emptiness, to the very soul of him. To do this is not to read books; it is to read literature. It is to be a sensible person. In spite of what critics say, Shakespeare is better in a first folio, when we come upon one, than in—I forget which publisher is "up-to-date" and cheapest. They say he could not spell his name; nor could several others—nor can President Roosevelt. Why trouble, then? But if we would understand, we must in authors go to the first things, even as for Christianity we must go to Christ. Poor Chatterton! one of the deepest of my literary loves, he cannot be known in our spelling; in his bad spelling and grammar is half the beauty of his best verse.

"Mie love ys dedde,

Gonne to hys deathe-bedde,

Al under the yllowe tree."

Tell me not that "My love is dead"—four sharp sounds with a jerk—can compare with the soft, long, pathetic music of the original. So is my contention established against every assault.

Two-thirds of Miss Warren's book consists, of course, of specimens from the time of Spenser downwards, and here the reader will meet with some of the best poems of four centuries and, particularly, with prose pieces which give an excellent idea of the styles of the greatest romancers, historians, philosophers, and essayists. These latter specimens make her work of exceptional value; we do not know any similar compilation which in this particular is so extensive in range and variety. One can turn to almost any author to be satisfied that here he is fairly represented; and most of the selections have the advantage of being practically complete in themselves.

Miss Warren in her preface disarms criticism of the objectionable sort with the confession that "it is too much to hope that every one will agree with the selection made." It must also be borne in mind that every anthology depends almost exclusively upon the taste of its compiler. Else had we, and everybody, something to say. Of certain authors we have completely read, and in a manner studied, we should not say that Miss Warren has given us, according to our individual taste, passages which are thoroughly representative—nor have other anthologists—but our objection is further disarmed, it is disabled, by her remark that "it goes to the heart of the lover of true literature when stern exigencies of space compel him, in his character of compiler, to omit or curtail some interesting or beautiful or time-honoured or personally-endearred lines." We lay our finger on the lip of all captious or hostile criticism.

"She has tried to select passages interesting in their subject-matter, or in their literary relationships, as well as representative of the authors in their best and most characteristic manner." Considering that these passages cover practically the whole field of our literature, except the drama, we must say that in this endeavour, which occupied more than five years, she has been remarkably successful in producing a volume of selections which is likely to be extensively used as a book of reference and a guide to the chief works of our great writers. We think, too, that it will send many who procure it back to the reading of authors they have deserted. For two instances among several we might name—many will be disposed to turn again, under the inducement of Miss Warren, to William Cowper, one of our most neglected, but here justly treated, and, among prose writers, to Samuel Johnson, known to-day, so far as he is known, not too much through Boswell, but too little through his own writings. But we believe that this book will especially help to create a desire for the better knowledge of our literature before Chaucer and to encourage a closer acquaintance with writers between him and Shakespeare. It will tend, particularly in this second period, to promote regard for not a few who have been thrown out of view by the exceptional genius of Spenser and Shakespeare, but who have their own certain measure of greatness. In this sense Miss Warren's book is more than an ordinary anthology, that it is not built upon one or two slender principles but upon principles as subtle as the complexity and as distinct as the variety of our literature. It is such a book as, were our literature lost, would give no inadequate idea of what it was.

FUTURE PROBATION.*

MR. BUCKLE tells us that since his retirement from the Burma Commission he has devoted his leisure to the study of the subject of the future life, and the work before us consists mainly of extracts from the books he has consulted. The work has certain very obvious faults: it is rather amateurish in execution, and being so largely a compilation, it presents a somewhat amorphous and disjointed character. But as it gathers together, from a variety of sources, much that has been written in regard to such terms as Heaven, Hell, Hades, Gehenna, Paradise, and Eternal Punishment, it makes not uninteresting reading, and ought to prove of use and value.

Our author looks to Scripture for the words of the after life. These words he does not profess always to understand, but so far as he does claim to understand them, he takes them as for the most part literally descriptive of the things behind the veil. Thus he introduces nearly twenty pages of Scriptural quotations with the remark that in them "we have some glimpses of heaven"—a matter-of-fact way of dealing with the utterances of faith and hope and pious imagination that does not quite commend itself to the modern spirit. But uncritical as is his attitude towards the Scriptures, he manages to convey a fairly good impression of what they say on the subject. And he finds that with much that is said by them the doctrine prevalent in most of Christendom to-day is inconsistent. According to New Testament teaching, he says, all souls pass at death to Hades, of which Paradise was regarded as merely the happier part or sphere. Hades is the place of probation, of further training for the good, of further mercy and opportunity of repentance for the wicked; and such as have never heard the Gospel in this world have it preached to them there. The intermediate state continues till the day of judgment, when those who are worthy of eternal life will receive it, and the hopelessly wicked, upon whom all the resources of mercy have been exercised in vain, will be condemned to the second death, that is, to utter annihilation. Without doubt this is the general drift of New Testament teaching, and Catholicism, with its doctrine of Purgatory, seems at first sight to be more in harmony with it than the ordinary Protestantism, which maintains that at death the soul is ushered immediately into Heaven or Hell. Mr. Buckle, however, justly points out that the agreement between Scriptural and Romish doctrine is more apparent than real; for, according to the latter, the fate of every soul is fixed at death, Purgatory being merely a place of discipline for those who are destined, but not yet fit, for Heaven. Our author does not raise the question as to whether they who have accepted the Gospel and lived good lives in this world may not fall away from grace, and be finally among the reprobate in the next. But, indeed, Scripture could furnish him with very little data or suggestion on the point, and he does not profess to go beyond that which is written. What he says and quotes in repudiation of the doctrine of eternal punishment, as commonly understood, will be approved by many in these days. So also, perhaps, will his championship of the idea of conditional immortality. But better, we think, than this latter is the view that the human spirit is by its very nature immortal; that salvation, more life and fuller, is the destiny of all; and that, at the very worst, "God unmakes but to re-make the soul."

PRESIDENT ELIOT ON RICHES.*

THE high value set upon the insight and wisdom of the President of Harvard University we indicated in our leading article of Aug. 3, when we printed also Dr. Eliot's address on "More Harvard Graduates for the Ministry." The little book here noted is a welcome example of that wisdom. It is an essay of only 38 pages, and may be taken as a lay sermon on the dangers and the opportunities of great wealth.

The irresponsible position of the modern American millionaire is contrasted with that of the feudal chief or great landlord of earlier times, and the moral dangers involved, especially to the children of the wealthy man, are clearly set forth. There must be great strength of character and high moral purpose in the man of great riches, in directing the education of his children, and determining their career in some worthy direction, to avoid otherwise certain disaster.

President Eliot does not minimise the advantages of great wealth in its power of command, but dispassionately sets forth successively what it can do for comforts, pleasures, luxuries, to gain objects of beauty, and secure aids to health, but then he shows the limitations of the rich man's powers and indicates how the balance is held in the matter of true happiness. Here is one example:

"To build a palace at fifty years of age in city or country, and maintain it handsomely for his family, seems to be a natural performance for a very rich man. It is interesting to build a palace, and it affords some temporary occupation; but it is incredible that this achievement should give as much pleasure to the owner as a young mechanic gets who has saved a few hundred dollars, and then builds a six-room cottage, to which he brings a young wife. He, being skilful at his trade, builds the cottage largely with his own hands, and she, out of her savings, provides the household linen and her own wardrobe. The achievement of the mechanic and his wife is a personal one, hallowed by the most sacred loves and hopes. The palace is the rich owner's public triumph, finely executed by hired artists and labourers. It is a personal achievement only in an indirect way" (p. 14).

The great services a rich man can render in the improvement of estates, in the creation of museums, parks and gardens, the endowment of universities, libraries, hospitals, &c., is then set forth, and a note on the difficulties of wise and really helpful giving follows. Academic and similar endowments Dr. Eliot holds to be far the wisest and most truly beneficent, as they have become in America happily the commonest, because they are much more than palliations of evil. "They are creators and diffusers of good. Through this change the chance of the very rich man to do perpetual good with his money has been greatly increased; and surely the hope of doing some perpetual good with the product of one's intelligence, skill, and industry is one of the brightest of human hopes" (p. 25).

BOOKS ON PEACE AND WAR.*

THE Speaker, which has since become the Nation, some little time ago offered prizes for lists of the best hundred books on Peace and War, and we have here four of those lists, with a brief explanatory introduction and an index of authors. This last contains 274 names, showing, as was to be expected, that a good many authors are found in two or more of the lists. Thus, the De Jure Belli et Pacis of Hugo Grotius (1625) is in all four lists, as is also Mr. J. A. Hobson's Imperialism, while Jeremy Bentham is quoted by three. Tolstoy is, naturally, in all the lists, and Zola's Debauch in three. So is the Rev. Walter Walsh's Moral Damage of War, of which Mr. Charles Sturge, the compiler of the first list, says: "A useful book marred by over-emphasis and by a needless attack on the Hague Conference." Mr. Sturge's list is the most useful of the four, because it adds descriptive notes and occasional comments on the books named. Frequently, in addition to the date of a book, with modern books the publisher is given, and, much less frequently, the price. If publisher and price could have been uniformly given for all books which are still to be bought, it would have added much to the usefulness of this valuable compilation. In the index of authors we note that the initials of Mr. C. E. Maurice have been given also to Dr. Martineau.

Mr. Sturge's classification of his hundred books is as follows:—

- (a) Works of reference.
- (b) General statements of the case against war and for possible substitutes.
- (c) Defences of war (including Ruskin's Crown of Wild Olives and Tennyson's Maud).
- (d) War as it is.
- (e) War from religious and ethical standpoints.
- (f) Commercial and financial aspects.
- (g) Modern developments and tendencies in their bearing on the question of peace.
- (h) International law.
- (i) Specific proposals for restricting or abolishing war, practical applications of such proposals and criticism thereon (24 volumes).
- (j) Biographies dealing largely with the question (Lives of Cobden, Henry Richard, and Joseph Sturge).
- (k) Miscellaneous (including Clarkson's Life of Penn, Cobden's The Three Panics, and More's Utopia, and three other publications).

BELIEVE in the best thoughts and whisperings that visit thy heart. If thou dost catch at times some gleams of the divining; of charity, of the glory of sacrifice, of the grandeur of faith, of the sky-piercing power of prayer, like mountain peaks jutting through fogs, or slopes afar off in the horizon light, believe in them with more enthusiasm than in the stupid dust of the beaten roads. Make your home where they will inspire you, and where you can easily ascend their slopes, and see the world from a higher point, and feel the everlasting presence of God.—Starr King.

SCIENCE AND THE FUTURE LIFE.

IF conviction went by comprehensiveness and copiousness of argument, we might all become persuaded of the truth of immortality. But that is the one question upon which argument least avails. Hence the wisest teachers, aware how a little personal experience is worth all the revelations in the world, point the way to its acquisition as the royal road to peace. We are all souls, and in our soul lie the proofs of its past history, its present powers, and the promise of its future destiny. So Browning would have us believe.

"Truth is within ourselves; it takes no rise

From outward things, whate'er you may believe.

There is an inmost centre in us all,
Where truth abides in fulness; and to know

Rather consists in opening out a way
Whence the imprisoned splendour may escape,

Than in effecting entry for a light Supposed to be without."

Meanwhile, and until the truthseeker gains boldness to take the steep, short path, there is a choice of circuitous roads. M. Louis Elbé describes* such a road. He seeks to build up a strong case in favour of the theory of survival by the accumulation of probabilities, and, with that aim, he divides his work into two parts. The first half is devoted to recapitulating all that the ancients believed upon the subject, while the second section discusses the evidence of tradition in the light of the theories put forward by modern science.

Universal Testimony.

No one will complain of the lack of width in his survey. From the archaeological remains of pre-historic races down to modern Spiritualism and Theosophy, from the customs of savage tribes to Christian belief, through China and Egypt, India and Gaul, Chaldæa and Greece, he bears us along in rapid flight, culling from every garden and at last nearly burying us in blossoms. He has no difficulty in showing how, throughout the whole history of antiquity, the idea of immortality exercised a paramount influence upon and determined the organisation of the family, and, through the family, of the city and the state. The task has been so often accomplished that there is little new to be said on this score. He is, however, not content merely to catalogue the beliefs and practices, in the manner, say, of Mr. Sidney Hartland. His research into the mysteries, the oracles, funeral rites, burial customs, cannibalism, embalming, insect symbols, weird superstitions, ideas of re-birth and guardian angels—are all animated by his main purpose, and touched with brief but illuminative explanations. We become more prone to drop the contempt nursed by the superior person who takes up these subjects to prove how much wiser we are than those who went before us.

Thus it was a sensible practice in vogue among the Gauls to wait for five years after condemning a criminal before they put him to death, so as to give him time for repentance, and fearing to sully the world beyond with the presence of guilty souls (p. 90). This clemency based on occultism seems to us more merciful than our civilised seven days' grace and the judge's blasphemous commendation to a mercy he violates. Moreover, the poetic materialism of primitive races that inspired them to bury a body in the same bent-up position as that of the unborn foetus, on the theory of replacing it in the womb of mankind's universal mother to await a new birth at the resurrection (p. 22), appears no whit less sensible than the hopeless materialism of Hæckel, or less religious than the cheerful materialism of the Anglican's faith in the resurrection of the body.

There is, further, a deeper humaneness in the ancient conception of the participation of ancestral spirits in the concerns of the family than in the modern Protestant neglect in thought or act of the thrice-blessed dead. Their functions in the Roman and Chinese household are summed up as follows (p. 129):—(1) They were present at the admission of the new-born child; (2) also of the young bride who came to take her place at the family hearth in order to perpetuate their lineage. (3) They received the renunciation of the maiden who, when about to enter a new family, required their consent to leave them. (4) They were always at hand to receive into their midst the souls of such of their children as were about to die.

More than a living practical conviction of survival flourished in ancient times; among many peoples there was taught a definite account of the complex constitution of the human soul. Compare Ovid's caro, umbra, manes, spiritus, and the more subtle systems in the Kabala, in Druidism, and the esoteric schools of Egypt and India. It would appear as though the victory of Christianity was not a triumph of a superior religious philosophy, but rather of a more vivid and earnest ethical enthusiasm. M. Elbé shows us also the diversity of effect of the same belief upon a dissimilar racial temperament. Thus a faith in the development of the soul through a series of successive lives, led the Gauls to joy in existence as means of furthering progress, led to a happy activity and strenuous effort; while with the Hindus the truth was accepted with sorrow, life was a burden to be rid of, and passivity the way of salvation.

The Witness of Science.

When our author endeavours to connect this universal tradition of immortality with the teachings of science, like the bridge of Kinvat, his arch becomes thinner and slenderer toward the latter side. He warns us that absolute certainty is impossible, but he is confident that we may discover " manifold evidences the concordance of which, owing to their very number, may attain to a probability indefinitely approximating to certitude." Among the deductions of science he begins with those from Astronomy.

Negatively they destroy a belief in a material heaven and hell, and suggest that the soul's life is immaterial. They render it impossible to suppose our insignificant planet should possess the monopoly of intelligent life; and a plurality of inhabited worlds allows the theory of a plurality of lives. Intelligent life may very well be simply transferred from one planet to another. From physics he derives such help as is furnished by the paramount importance of the law of the indestructibility of energy (thought, conscience, love being forms of energy) and the operation of the ether. Amid the destruction of the atom he notes the permanence of the etheric vortex, and from the analogy borrows a scientific nucleus for a soul. Our bodies are not our own; their constituent elements incessantly change; we possess only the usufruct; yet through the detritation of a number of bodies worn in a single lifetime we preserve an abiding identity. He records the growing importance attached in science to the consideration of imponderable elements eluding all observation by the senses. In order to explain the grossest and most palpable phenomena, science is obliged to fall back upon the conception of an invisible principle—the ether. How much more necessary, in order to explain mental facts, is it to fall back upon a medium which is so much more subtle than the ether as ether is, compared with the group of atoms forming a tree or a rock!

On its material side life itself "constitutes nothing more than a mere chapter in the history of carbons," but what is life in its inherent essential nature? Does it not imply a new force far more inaccessible than the ether? M. Elbé shows reason why life must be regarded as independent of its material manifestation, though temporarily associating itself with a molecular structure, which it turns away from and replaces with others. He sees no possibility of confining psychological experience to modifications of visible matter, as does M. Le Dantec.

The Life-Force and its Medium.

We need not evade the supposition that the highest spiritual forces have their appropriate medium to operate in, as the physical forces have the ether. In his chapter on "Odic Force" our author discusses the probability of the vital force in man being associated with a grouping of infinitely attenuated corpuscles even more subtle than those of the ether, and directing the etheric vortices just as the latter direct the material atoms which they attract. If, as Emerson says, every cause is the effect of a finer cause, we are obliged, in order to account for the accredited facts of clairvoyance and telepathy, to fall back upon a universal astral and mental medium, interpenetrating the ether as the ether interpenetrates all things. Mr. Myers named this hypothetical medium the "met-etherial environment."

These are still debatable theories, but M. Elbé records the names of a large number of scientific men who hold them in one form or another. They are not purely gratuitous speculations; they are called for to account for the proven facts. As we cannot explain wireless telegraphy without the hypothesis of ether, so we cannot explain the nature of memory the tapping of which by a sensitive psychical person appears otherwise so miraculous; nor the permanent invisible groupings which must attach themselves to the primordial germ in the process of heredity; nor veridical hallucinations, nor present visions of people at a distance, nor many of the numerous facts attested and verified in the course of psychical research, without postulating a transcendental medium, a universal soul of which ours are indissoluble and eternal parts.

M. Elbé believes science to be upon the way of proving the existence of man's astral body, in which the soul functions after death, and the demonstration of which will bring the question of immortality within the region of experimental science.

Gathering all his suggestions together, he concludes that the idea of the existence in man of an independent immaterial element forces itself upon us with a probability which equals, if it does not surpass, that of all the theoretical conceptions of positive science.

We are not sure but that the case already stands on higher ground than this modest platform. It is, however, rare to find so open a mind and unprejudiced a temper brought to bear upon the question of immortality from the scientific standpoint. The work is characterised by a wide range of knowledge, and is quite up to date. Though a translation, the English version is simple and idiomatic and reads smoothly. Those who do not affect scientific disquisitions will find in this attempt at popularising scientific deductions a little mine of information brought to bear upon a question which is of the deepest personal concern to each and all.

SEA-SAND.

SEA-SAND. It is a simple theme. But, as Shakespeare reminds us, those who seek may find "tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything." Certain it is that there are thousands in this island of ours to whom summer comes in vain unless it transports them to some refreshing vision by the seashore. And perhaps for weary men and women there is no couch like a sand dune, for never weary children no playground like a broad and unfenced sand stretch by the sea.

One characteristic of sea-sand which delights us is its cleanness. It is so different from the dust of our streets. Twice a day it is laved and lifted and cleansed by the ebbing and flowing tides. We handle it, and, so far from getting soiled by it, we are cleansed. And we readily appreciate that provision of the Koran which prescribes, where water is not obtainable, sand for ceremonial purification. We even suspect some efficacy in the alleged sand cure for fever. Then, how soft is sea-sand to the tread! To walk on it other than barefoot is sacrilege to those who have once felt how benign and yielding is sand to human feet. Here is a natural pavement—a mosaic unmatched in the world's richest city or finest palace. And when the receding waves have just re-washed the level floor, what myriads of minute facets flash light and colour in the sun. What a luxury to tread this jewelled pavement! A Scandinavian visitor to England, accustomed to more Spartan surroundings, was wont to pace barefoot his bedroom night and morn enjoying the delicious sensation of the soft foothold of a velvet pile carpet. Who has not felt something of the same fascination and delight in treading sea-sand? Civilisation, unfortunately, is fast robbing us of the wonderful capacity for pleasurable sensation which resides in the foot. Mark the shapely, nobly formed foot of the Oriental man and woman; note the deftness with which it will pick up a handkerchief or even a pin. Then ponder those many inventions of man which have robbed this member of its nobility, beauty, and dignity. The foot has the lowest place, yet its arch carries the whole body. A little child's foot is amongst the superbest creations of Nature's moulding. More than this, it is full of feeling. But so clumsy are man's devices that, so far, he has been unable to protect the foot from weather without dulling its sensitiveness and crippling its power. But sea-sand has done something to save the foot. Sea-sand has recovered for the child, during the summer months at least, the sandal. But even this is superfluous on the shore itself. There both child and adult, treading barefoot, feel a nameless exaltation, an inexplicable liberty, as though they trod the outer court of some holy temple; and such indeed they do, for here God meets with them and speaks with them in a voice, now softer than the south wind, now louder than the thunder-breaker.

Black, white, and brown, mingled with the endless iridescent colours of powdered sea-shells. What a wealth of bright gems! Here are diamond, and jet, and sapphire, and garnet, ruby, and mother-of-pearl. Every grain separate, polished, and crystalline. Whence this polish? A thousand thousand storms have contributed to it. These particles were once compact of the solid rocks. The sea tore huge masses from the shore; pounded and grated and ground them in her mortar, with ceaseless ebb and flow polished and purified them on ocean floor for centuries and ages. Sermons in stones? Aye. Conflict, eternal conflict, has beautified these broken particles, washed away all muddy elements, left only the rounded or the crystal shaped jewels, and spread them in one endless glorious strand: symbol of that conflict which does so much for the making of man; the storms which batter, cleanse, and transfigure us—or should. The ordeal which, as this or that excrescence is chipped or worn away, seems disintegrating and disastrous, may leave us at last shapely, polished, pure, meet for a place, however insignificant, in that temple of living stones—the church of all souls who have sought the highest and endured the scorn and buffets of the world.

Perhaps the most noticeable feature of sea-sand is its wonderful multiplicity. On examination we find it consists of fine grains, finer grains, and still finer, like dust particles. Many of the finest grains cannot be detected save under the microscope. Our readiest symbol for immeasurable numbers is "as the sand by the seashore." The sand grains, quite as forcibly as the sea waves, suggest infinity. Take a handful. They are more than you can number. Infinite, infinite! That is one message of the sea-sand. To attempt to number the sea-sand is to run sheer up against one of our limitations. Men can count the seas and the continents, but they cannot count the sand. They can count the trees of the forest, but they cannot count the leaves. Even were it worth while, life is not long enough. But the mere impossibility suggests to us some greater mind which can lay hold upon these infinities with as much ease as we lay hold upon the finite. Is there not One who is able to take in the number of the sand, and the stars, and the very hairs of our head? In other words, is there not One who cares for trifles? Not these trifles, perhaps, but those details of human life and destiny of which they are symbolic. "Your heavenly Father knoweth what things ye have need of." The infinitely small somehow speaks to us of the infinitely great, tells of a love which is measureless. A sand grain and a sparrow—alike small, but alike insignificant? Nay, no arithmetical progression can measure the distance between them. The sparrow is a living, sentient creature. And "not a sparrow falleth to the ground without your Father."

And again, sea-sand suggests mutability, mortality. Borne on the wings of the wind, or driven and tossed and drawn under by the waves, the fine grains form dunes to-day, treacherous hollows to-morrow; to-day the pleasure-ground of the living, to-morrow the winding-sheet of the dead. The bather knows the treacherousness of the sandpits; the boatman knows that the anchor plunged in the sand may drift with the current. The children build their castles, but they soon learn that the particles lack cohesion, and before the advancing wave melt in the common level of the shore. And the memory of earth's millions is as names written on sand. In a moment of abstraction on a summer's day you take a handful of sand and hold it, watching the fine shower which slips through your fingers. That is your life and mine. The sands are running out. The things we grasp slip from us even whilst we hold them.

"I stand amid the roar
Of a surf-tormented shore,
And I hold within my hand
Grains of the golden sand;
How few! yet how they creep
Through my fingers to the deep,
While I weep—while I weep!
O God! can I not grasp
Them with a tighter clasp?
O God! can I not save
One from the pitiless wave?
Is all that we see or seem
But a dream within a dream?"

Ah, it is not what we hold, but what we are, that matters. Life is but a brief gift. Many of the best things it gives we can keep but for a season. "Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure." It is only as we realise the oneness of our life and God's that we live. "How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! How great is the sum of them! If I should count them they are more in number than the sand." A. T.

We have no heavenly life in us, nor fitness for it, unless it gives meaning, richness, glory, and the joy of promise to the earth.—John Hamilton Thom.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HOLIDAY WITH GRANDFATHER.

III.

By this time it was getting dusk, and Fred and his sister were quite ready to continue their walk to grandfather's house. After leaving the stream their way led them through a wood, and so dark was it under the trees that they could but just see their path. Oh, how still it was! so silent and dim; indeed, that Susie was glad to have grandfather's hand to hold, and to listen to his quiet voice while he told them the names of the trees, as each giant was passed. Now there was a clump of Scotch fir, then a group of white-barked silver birches, next two mighty beech trees, one on either side of the path, then more Scotch firs and larches. After this came a clearing with a lot of undergrowth, and, as the evening glow lit that part of the way up, Fred was full of excitement as he noted great numbers of big night-flying moths, swarming and fluttering about the honeysuckle blossom.

Suddenly there came a blood-curdling hoot: "Too-whoooo!" "Towhit!" "Too-whoooo!" The sound seemed to come out of the air quite near them, but they could see nothing. Susie was quite frightened, and even Fred felt a sort of cold shiver down his back. But grandfather only gave a quiet little chuckle, and drew the two children into the shade of some bushes and told them to watch. Then, in the gloaming, the old man began to whistle in a low key, exactly imitating the weird sounds which had startled the two young folk. "Too-whooo, Towhit, Towhit, Too-whoooo!" This he did three or four times, and, soon, out of the dark fir trees a great soft feathered owl came silently sailing down towards them—so silently! quite noiselessly indeed: it was the nearest thing to Susie's idea of of a ghost, and in her fright she gave a little cry, and squeezed grandfather's hand tightly. Her cry startled the owl, which had been deceived by grandfather's imitation into the belief that his mate was calling him. At once the grey soft feathered bird, with a little ejaculation of alarm and disgust, wheeled off back into the dark fir clump. Grandfather laughed heartily, and asked Susie if she didn't think him a wonderful magician as he was able to talk bird language. But Susie had had enough of magic for that turn, and confessed that she would be glad to get out of the enchanted wood, and revisit it, next time, in broad daylight.

So they continued their way, and the only other enchanted thing which they saw was a belated glow-worm "shining with all her might." Grandfather explained that June and July were the months to look for glow-worms, and Fred must consider himself favoured in seeing a specimen so late in the season. The old man then picked up the glow-worm and placed it on Susie's hat—"not as a decoration," he said, "but to light her on her way out of the enchanted forest."

They had not gone far, after leaving the wood, before they saw lights twinkling in a house a short distance ahead. This was a welcome sight to our two young travellers, who, though they had walked really only a mile and a half, had seen and heard so much, and were also beginning to want their inner boy, and girl, refreshed. It did not take them long to reach the house, where, in a room which was half kitchen and half sitting-room, they found a most welcome meal, a sort of tea-supper spread out ready for them. As they had taken rather a long time with their walk home, they found that their luggage had already arrived, so, after being shown their rooms and finding them very delightful, they fell to work on the good fare provided by Mrs. Simpson, grandfather's cheery housekeeper, and did their best to make up for lost time.

Grandfather's household was not a very large one. Beside himself and Mrs. Simpson there was only Cholly, the Irish terrier, who, on the arrival of the two young visitors, gazed for a moment into their faces, to see if they were of the right sort. It was quite evident that he was entirely satisfied, for his short tail gave little wags of welcome, and he allowed them to pat his head, and fondle him, then looked up into grandfather's face and gave a short cheerful bark, which meant, so grandfather said, that he, Cholly, adopted them into the family circle, and constituted himself their "guide, philosopher, and friend." Cholly was not a young dog; he was, indeed, in the prime of early old age. There was no nonsense about Cholly, no silly fawning or fussiness about him. His teeth were still sound, and they were at the service of his master and his master's friends. Woe betide the tramp, and the stranger at the gate, whose appearance did not fully satisfy Cholly! When any such appeared, Cholly would just say an ugly word in dog language, "with a nasal inflection," then he would smile up into the unwelcome stranger's face—a dog smile, which showed all his teeth! The stranger quickly saw the points of Cholly's little joke, and departed hurriedly in peace, not in pieces! But Cholly's motto was, "once a friend always a friend," which is a good motto for a dog, and not a bad one for boys and girls; and men and women, too!

When the evening meal was finished the old man took his two guests out into the garden. It was now quite dark, so but few of the flowers could be seen—here and there the white ones gleamed in the starlight, but, overhead, the glorious garden of the heavens was ablaze with stars. Oh, how wonderful they appeared to the two children, fresh from a big smoky town, where the stars, at the best, shine only dimly through the murky air, and where the eyes are dazzled by the glare of lamps and electric lights! Out in the country, where it is really dark at night, the stars shine, and twinkle so brightly and seem so near and friendly that it is a joy and delight to behold them.

Grandfather told the children how quickly the light from the stars hurried in its journey—nearly 200,000 miles each second—"And yet," said he, "so far are they away, that the light from the nearest to us has taken not less than ten years to come. When Susie was a baby, just starting to walk, the light from the nearest stars started to fly to us, and coming so quickly, is but just arriving; nay," said grandfather, "the light from yet more distant stars, which started when I myself was a wee toddler, is but now arriving." The two young folk were bewildered, and, indeed, who among older folk is not, when these miracles of romantic science are revealed to us!

And on the grass of the lawn, close by, was yet another gleaming star, for grandfather had been careful to place there Susie's glowworm, where its joy and comfort were displayed by its bright shining. So ended the first day of Fred and Susie's holiday.

AFTER THE RAIN.

AFTER the rain

How cool the air, how sweet the scent,
How fragrant all the earth,
When morning dawns with brilliant sun
And birds awake to greet its birth,
After the rain.

The dewdrops glitter on each leaf.
Red gold the pine tree stem,
Red gold the fallen leaves that lie
Beneath the raindrops' diadem,
After the rain.

The insects stretch their dainty wings,
And fly with joyous whirr,
The squirrels leave their sheltering hole,
And scud and leap from fir to fir,
After the rain.

The mountains that were veiled in cloud,
Rise grandly through the mist,
Vaguely majestic, golden hued,
By shimmering sunshine softly kissed,
After the rain.

Oh! summer morn, how fair art thou,
How graciously divine,
Rejoicing life rings out thy praise
And worships gladly at thy shrine,
After the rain.

SUNSET.

BEAUTIFUL evening light, how peacefully
you fall,
On village and forest and lake, and mountain and all.
Out of a perfect day, a perfect eve is bred,
Gold, with a tinge of red.

Out of the marvellous union of reds and blues,
Purple is born that the distance alone can lose,
But from the snow-line above, all shadow has fled,
All is gold, with a tinge of red.

Now watch! for the clouds are melting before the sun,
And the battle with his sinking might is fought and won.
A glow of rosiest fire lights on each mountain head,
Not gold, but a flame of red!

When the battle of life is over and done with at length,
Shall we see it in sunset glow of gathering strength?
Shall we not think this earth, with troubles and sorrows fled,
Was gold, with a tinge of red? —F. L.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE IN GENEVA.

THE separation of Church and State in the city and canton of Geneva, determined by an unexpected majority in a popular vote on June 30, to take effect on January 1, 1909, is an event of far greater interest to the religious world than the number of the people directly concerned might lead one to suppose. Under CALVIN'S rule Geneva became one of the great cities of the world, great in spiritual power and intellectual significance; and there as completely as in Rome itself, the Church was the dominant power in the State. Latterly, indeed, the independence of the State from ecclesiastical control has been largely vindicated, while in the Church itself a more democratic form of parochial management has been established, and in the University there has been an independent Faculty of Theology. But the maintenance of the clergy was still provided by the State, and the great body of Protestants held warmly to the traditional connection between Church and State, with its history of close upon four hundred years.

When in 1880 M. FAZY, one of the leaders of the Radical party, brought forward a proposal of separation, it was negatived by the people with a majority of 5,000; now, a similar proposal, made by the same leader, has secured a majority of 800 votes, the numbers, roughly speaking, being 7,500 to 6,700. And remembering what has just been happening in France, the curious thing is that it is the Roman Catholic vote (together with a large number of abstentions) which has been the determining factor in this election.

A Geneva correspondent of our Paris contemporary, Le Protestant, estimates that of the majority in favour of separation, 4,000 were votes of Roman Catholics, 2,500 of Socialists and Radicals, and 1,000 perhaps of ultra-Protestants who desired separation either on the ground of abstract principle, or because they wished by this means to be separated also from the liberals of their own church. On the other hand, there was a great deal of indifference, for out of the constituency of 25,000 only some 14,300 voted. A good many, perhaps, abstained from over-confidence in the security of the old position, others from genuine perplexity of mind, for there were seventeen of the Protestant clergy who issued a manifesto in favour of separation (met by a much more numerous signed manifesto on the other side); but large numbers, undoubtedly, were simply indifferent to the subject. On the other hand, the Roman Catholic vote was solidly given, sick men were brought from their beds to vote, and there has been great jubilation over the victory. It was the country districts, which formerly belonged to Savoy, but now are included in the Canton of Geneva, which largely furnished this dominant Catholic vote. The inwardness of the matter, as compared with the contrary attitude of the Roman Church in France, is to be found in the conflict between the Roman and the National Catholics in Geneva. Since 1873 the National Catholics have been in possession of the old churches, and have been recognised by the State, and though they offered the simultaneum, the joint use of the churches to their Roman brethren, this was refused, and the latter have since maintained the attitude of aggrieved martyrs. Now they have their revenge, for the Radicals made alliance with the Roman Catholics to secure separation, under the form of suppression of the State contribution to the churches, suppression du budget des cultes, and the measure is described by the correspondent of Le Protestant as having been so far "Romanised" that the old churches will now pass from the hands of the "National" once more into those of the Roman Catholics, while at the same time the simultaneum is made impossible. Another description of the situation in a recent number of the Christliche Welt also points to the growing political power of the Roman Catholics in Geneva, and the waning influence of the Old Catholics; and attributes the passing of the measure to the conviction that it was the only way to do justice all round. To include the Roman Catholics also in the State endowment of religion was felt to be out of the question, the difficulty therefore must be solved by withdrawing all such State recognition of the churches.

It is, however, with the effect of this measure upon the Protestant Church of Geneva that we are most directly concerned. The result is said to have been quite unexpected, and to have been received with dismay and grief by those who loved the old tradition of their church. But at the same time it appears that what was feared to be a serious disaster will prove to be a wholesome tonic to the Church, and call forth not only fresh energies of personal service and self-sacrifice, but a fine spirit of tolerance and brotherly unity. All the signs point at present in that hopeful direction, and if that should prove permanently to be the case, the contrast on this side also will once more be most marked with the condition of affairs in France. There, as Professor RÉVILLE recently described in these columns, separation has meant, for the present, at any rate, the division of the forces of the Reformed Protestant Church under three distinct, if not altogether separate organisations; but in Geneva the immediate effect of the vote for separation has been to call forth a remarkable manifestation of unity of spirit, and a common determination to maintain an undivided Church.

At a meeting of the Consistory of the Church held after the decisive vote, the President, M. BORDIER, distinctly repudiated the suggestion that any attempt should be made to obtain a reversal of the popular decision. There must be an end of religious strife, he declared; the new situation must be accepted without bitterness, and they must frankly turn their faces to the future. He then made a strong appeal for unity in the presence of common foes, and described the course to be pursued, for the effective organising of an Independent Protestant Church, which must be made truly national by including all the forces of Protestantism in their midst. As a result of this determination a consultative Assembly was called, which met on July 9, and appointed a representative committee to prepare a draft constitution for the Church under the new conditions. The ideal to be aimed at was clearly set forth in the Semaine Religieuse three days before that meeting, and there appears to be a unanimous desire to realise it. The different schools of thought within the Protestant communion are frankly recognised, and none are to be excluded under the new constitution who desire fellowship with the National Church of Geneva, as a branch of the Church Universal, of which JESUS CHRIST is the chief corner stone. The Constitution, it is proposed, should open, not with a dogmatic statement as the basis of union, but with a simple religious affirmation that they who unite in this Church, as one of the Reformed churches of Switzerland, have for their aim the preaching of the Gospel and the advancement of the Kingdom of God. In this affirmation, liberal and conservative alike could join, and within the fellowship on this broad foundation there should be room for each party to organise for the promotion of its own convictions of truth, with mutual tolerance and regard for the scruples of others and a true brotherly sympathy.

Such is the spirit in which the leaders of Protestantism in Geneva are setting themselves to prepare for the future. There will, of course, be many practical questions to be solved, apart from that of raising a sufficient income. It remains to be seen whether the independent churches, which have hitherto maintained a separate existence, will join the National Church now that the connection with the State is at an end, and one very important question will have to be decided, as to who shall have the right to vote in the several parishes. The editor of Le Protestant also asks, What is to be the future of the Faculty of Theology in the University?

The great thing, however, over which we must all rejoice, is this earnest determination to maintain in the Church a true unity of spirit in the bond of peace. No doubt the fact of the growing power of Rome on the one hand, and of the hostile forces of Radicalism on the other, has contributed to this desire for a concentration of forces, but there are manifest signs that a deeper spirit is at work, making for a true ideal of inclusive religious fellowship, and for this we must hope an abundant fruition.

TIDINGS FROM THE SOUL.*

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
M.A., Litt.D.

Ecclesiasticus xxxvii. 14.—“A man's soul is sometimes wont to bring him tidings, more than seven watchmen that sit on high on a watch-tower.”

THE watchmen sit on high on the mighty tower of knowledge which this University has reared through centuries of toil. From many homes in the United Kingdom, from colonies beyond the sea, from the countries of Europe and the United States of America, even from the ocean-girt shores of China and Japan, students are gathered in this city. You are come to sit and listen to the watchmen of learning, the sevenfold teachers of History, Language, Literature, Philosophy, Art, Science, and the youngest of the sisterhood, Sociology, the manifold products of the human spirit as it investigates the past, studies the present, and looks forward to the future—all folded within the Eternal, the everlasting home of the ideal. During the next three weeks knowledge, laboriously acquired, will be freely dispensed. What tidings more will your souls bring you? Remember that each one of you will add something to what you receive. Unless you are content to be mere pleasure excursionists at a big University picnic, if you have any serious purpose of self-improvement, the way in which you yourselves shape and frame the manifold impressions which flow in upon you, will prove the most important thing of all. You will carry away memories of a great historic city. You will have felt the charm of grey walls and shady gardens. You will have rested from the roar of life in busy seats of industry, in daily drudgery of school work, and a hundred other exhausting occupations, and felt the peace of the river, the meadows, and the woods. You will recall the personal aspects of distinguished lecturers; you will be quickened by contact with other minds, stimulated by fresh suggestions of study. New pleasures of enquiry will have become accessible to you, and insights into unfamiliar fields of thought will have opened up whole provinces of knowledge that before seemed dull. A more vivid sense of the wonder and the multiplicity of life will be awakened in you; problems that before seemed simple and easy of solution will bear another aspect as you realise their baffling complexity; but you will gain courage through comradeship for laborious toil. You will reflect on all these varying elements of the intellectual feast, but you will not draw from them their ripest fruit for the conduct of your days, till you have listened to the tidings of your soul. While your knowledge remains in the sphere of what I will venture to call (without disrespect) mental dissipation, indulgence of a curious or delicate appetite at the great banquet of ideas; while it is only a matter of agreeable pastime, and you do not bring it into vital relation with the great aims and purposes of your whole being—you are not realising all that this place can give, because you are not fittingly prepared to receive. Let not the truths of history or science, therefore, remain unaccompanied in the chambers of mere thought; let emotion, conscience, aspiration, play round them, find their hidden meanings, and make their connections with the Unseen. I suggest to you a message from the soul summed up in three words—Progress, Freedom, God.

I.

You are invited to study the history of Oxford. A panorama of ten centuries will be unfolded before you. It is but a small fragment of the vast chain of human development, but it will serve as a type for the longer story of the race. How will you read it? Is it only “a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing”? No one will wish to go back even to the piety of S. Frideswide, or the scholastic zeal of Theobald, or the science of Roger Bacon, or the theology of Wyclif, and stay there, any more than he would wish to return to the forests that once covered this valley, and sheltered in such numbers (as at Yarnton, four miles away) the elephant and the boar. The difference between human conditions then and now we sum up in the one word which I have already named—Progress. But when we inquire of some modern philosophers, they tell us that the narrative is only one long tragedy, and history is grimly described as “the martyrdom of man.” Survey the past, and you will see that its record is of blood and tears, of helpless blundering, of wild revolt, of stupid acquiescence, of empty aspiration. Do you gaze forth into the future, and feel within you the promise of a power greater than you can express—the inarticulate thought and love reaching forward to fuller utterance and ampler joy? As you look out upon the world with its vast and shifting crowds, does your soul bring you tidings of a day of purer manners, happier homes, of industry organised by equity, of wider culture, nobler public spirit, even of trust and peace among the nations? Cherish no such dreams. It is all an illusion. Because man, it is asked, has got thus far, is his future progress to be indefinite? If he differs from the animals only in degree, will not his fate differ from theirs only in degree also? He, too, will reach a point, if he has not reached it already, beyond which no variation will bring increased intellectual grasp, increased vigour of imagination, increased moralisation of will, increased capacity for social life.

It is a dismal picture, but it must be faced. There is a school of thinkers at the present day who, when they look out upon the past, can see in it nothing but disorder. The scanty products which we prize so highly—knowledge, philosophy, art, poetry, even religion—are but poor things at the best. They are only the blind gropings of a fitful energy that has stumbled for once into something not quite so unlovely as the day before. Do not suppose that they are the promise and potency of worthier achievements by and by. Be not deluded, look at things as they are. The future, indeed, is dark, but still it is wisdom to recognise the truth. Man can know nothing more, at least, upon the path of natural knowledge, than that he is insignificant and vile. One of the most brilliant of modern Oxford historians, who became also one of the most resolute of prelates—the late Dr. Creighton—actually committed himself to this cynical judgment as the issue of his life-long studies: “I know that we ought to believe that mighty movements always swayed the hearts of men. So they have, when they made for their pecuniary interest. But I believe that ideas were always second thoughts in politics; they were the garb which covered the nudity of their practical desires. I mean,” he goes on, “that I can never ask myself what mighty ideas swelled in the hearts of men, but what made men see a chance of saving sixpence, of gaining sixpence, of escaping being robbed of sixpence? What man was clever enough to devise a formula round which men could rally for this purpose?” If Oxford had no better lessons to teach than this, I should say we had better close her lecture-rooms and all go home. But out of the writer's own mouth I will confute his episcopal scepticism. The samelips tell us that the greatest of all centuries was the thirteenth, which produced S. Francis and Dante, S. Louis and Edward I.; and the same tongue warns us that the greatest of all dangers is the absence of high aspirations. But it is in vain that the pessimist, if he happens to be orthodox, endeavours to restore on supernatural authority the faith which he has dissipated on the field of experience. To assure us that there is a Providence, though from the account which he has given of man you would not think so—that you must not expect to see him at work here—that in this world, it is true, he does not provide, he is reserving himself for the next—this is the deepest note of all mistrust. I cannot ask in these brief moments what are the sacrifices which progress involves, at what cost or (more important still) at whose cost the successive stages of advance are secured. These are recorded in the remembrance of God, who suffers and conquers with us. But there is no scepticism so fatal as that which denies that God is with us now. It is in vain that you will paint a kingdom of heaven upon the skies if you look on the earth as an arena for a kind of inhuman sport. What hope can there be for the fulfilment of a divine purpose by and by if this world is only a gigantic game of chance? This is the meaning of the doctrine which has been pressed upon us lately with such urgency in what is called the New Theology—the doctrine, viz., of the immanence of God. I am not concerned now to discuss, or still more to defend, the particular forms in which it has been presented; but I say that the idea of progress, which carries with it the idea of a divine education of the race, is one of the deepest roots of our religion. It is the great picture-lesson of the Bible, which begins with the shivering pair cast out from Eden to win a scanty living from the ground, and ends with the New Jerusalem and the multitude that no man can number, out of every nation, speaking every tongue, fed in the shining city from the fruits of the tree of life. It is the mighty truth of history as we advance from the savage who has no names for number above three, to the astronomer who this week addressed the British Association at Leicester, and depicted the confluence of two mighty streams of hundreds of millions of worlds which constitute the universe we know, and still leave room in the illimitable space for other universes wrought on other plans. It is the sublime, and in my faith the trustworthy testimony of the soul which brings us

Authentic tidings of invisible things,
Of ebb and flow and ever during power,
And central peace subsisting at the heart
Of endless agitation.

Or, to use the no less familiar words of Tennyson:

That God which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far off divine event
To which the whole creation moves.

II.

But progress can only be orderly and effective upon one condition, viz., freedom. In the social sphere it consists in the gradual enlistment of the rule of strength on the side of justice. As moral insight widens, and political experience gathers range and volume, the energies of the human spirit learn how to adapt themselves to the conditions which surround them; and political advance is accomplished, as we have seen in this country during the last two centuries, by legislative change without explosive revolution. In ancient days the power of sheer personal might in the primeval clan gave way to the ordered conception of lordship and service in mediæval feudalism; and the powers of land and capital, as we see them operating now in modern industrial society, may in their turn give way to new ideals of social obligation which may better harmonise the needs of the weak with the capacities of the strong. But the essential element of such advance is liberty. There must be openness of discussion, such as will be set before you in the coming week. There must also—at least, as I think—be opportunity for social experiment, which will bring methodised observation to bear on the complex varieties of moral, intellectual, and social forces, that weave the mighty web of human affairs. We are undoubtedly learning this in the field of economic and social science from the great teachers who have wrought out the processes of investigation in the physical sphere. May we not hope in the future that similar freedom shall be realised in the realm of religion?

The real beginnings of English science go back to the meetings which were held by Dr. Wilkins at Wadham in the last days of the Commonwealth. True, it may be that the progress of science has not been equal in all departments. The advance in our knowledge of physiology, I suppose, since Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood, cannot be compared to the difference between Boyle's outlook on the universe and that of a modern physicist; but then, the scale of the human frame is microscopic compared with the vastness of the cosmos which astronomy has revealed. But consider what would have been the limitations of the progress of knowledge if the Royal Society had been founded on a charter of contemporary scientific orthodoxy, like the Act of Uniformity which was imposed upon the Church in the same year. It is a curious synchronism. The path of truth is opened for the national science, but closed for the national religion. The way of the explorer is limited by no preconceived laws, the word of the minister is bound by articles and creeds. The whole field of God's world is offered to those who seek to understand it, and the story of his dealings with man is shut up in sacred tongues from a distant past, to be handled only by those who would subscribe such propositions as a dissolute king, a grasping hierarchy (Sheldon of Oxford among the most influential), and a subservient Parliament chose between them to enforce. It was a fortunate accident for the English Church that its standards did not forbid the independent analysis of its Scriptures simply because the divines of the sixteenth century never contemplated the modern processes of literary inquiry, and took no pains, therefore, to bar them out. I am to relate this week the course of events which secured liberty for the Church in that direction, and the noble use which the theologians at our Universities have made of it I may not stay to recount. But behind the literary study lie great questions of historic reality which the progress of theological science is rapidly forcing to the front. On all sides thought is wakening, and the elder Churches utter poignant cries of alarm. Only a fortnight ago Rome spoke with decisive voice against the new learning which is undermining the ancient faith. In this country it is the cold judgment of a committee of the Privy Council that decides, and not the hot eagerness of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition. Were it not better, however, to be free of both? Some day, perhaps, we shall choose the other path. This College was founded, more than a hundred and twenty years ago, by heirs of the ejected Two Thousand who, on that black Bartholomew's day, August 24, 1662, went forth from their livings to poverty, to imprisonment, and suffering, rather than submit to what they called "human impositions." We have never repented. Our theology has been open to progressive change, but the continuity of our religion has been preserved. No teacher or student within our walls has ever been called upon to sign a declaration of faith, to subscribe an article, or confess a creed. On his own responsibility he may do so elsewhere;

we, at least, will impose no obligation on him. From the seven-fold band on the watch tower of human life we have learned much; we hope to learn still more; but only because our souls have brought us first the tidings that truth is the goal of religion as of science, and the only access to it lies through liberty.

III.

And to this conclusion the Churches are slowly coming as they ponder on the third word of the message which I have suggested to you—the august name of God. The marvels of his being, the wonders of his grace, are no longer to be confined in ancient definitions, or the words upon a printed page. The standards which were once the symbols of victory, the triumphant utterances of faith, are no longer subscribed with unfeigned assent of mind and heart. They are accepted with apologies as historical, but not true; they are hidden out of sight as far as possible in obscurity and neglect. A wider view is gaining strength from day to day. Our age is recognising the authentic Gospel. Men are turning from their catechisms and opening their Bibles—the greater Bible of the human race, the record of its vast and varied religious aspiration. They have gone to psalmist and prophet, to singer and saint and seer, to Palestine and India, to China as well as to Greece, and they are gathering new lessons of love and trust, of hope and joy, of justice, mercy, peace. They are learning to see life laid in the encompassing loving-kindness of the Lord, and the whole world and all that is therein perpetually upheld by his supporting arms. And they have pressed into the throng around the Teacher of teachers on the mountain-side, on the lake-shore, by the highway, or in the common homes of men, and they have heard anew from his lips such words as these: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness"; "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant"; "A new commandment I give you, that ye love one another"; "Be ye perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect." The real foundation of religion, that is, lies not in ecclesiastical authority, but in moral experience. This is a universal fact, a part of our heritage as men. Here are tidings which the soul is never weary of repeating, for they are its life, and the religion of the future will learn to rest in them without fear. For they reveal to us our place in the mighty order round us, the vast and encompassing unity which includes the dust on the highway no less than the myriad stars of heaven, and counts a soul more precious than them all. They bring us into fellowship with the Infinite Mind and Heart, the great world-Spirit of love and holiness, from whom we have sprung, in union with whom alone we live, and with whom we trust to abide in ever-growing fellowship through eternity. In this faith all the principles that guide our life as individuals, as families, as citizens, as a nation, fall at once into their places, and are linked with the everlasting issues of good and ill. Nothing, in the long run, can escape. The deep questions of social ethics, the redemption of the perishing classes, the problems of labour, of commerce, of politics, art, science, and philosophy, will all be brought into connection with it, and will receive its aid as we work towards the goal. A discovery such as this is little short of a revolution in our conception of what religion is, what man is, and society shall be. Nay, it is not revolution, it is restoration. It is the thought of Jesus as we read it, disengaged from the local forms in which it was often clothed, relieved of the accidents of his time and country, and translated from the dialect of Galilee into the language of modern life, for all the world. When it is realised, we shall have fulfilled his prayer:

"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done,
On earth, as it is in heaven."

BOSTON VISITORS.

THE following notes by Dr. Edward Everett Hale were published in the Christian Register (July 2, 1903) in anticipation of a visit of an Educational Convention to Boston. The first part of the article referred to this and to the free schools of the city, and then it went on:—But it is well-nigh certain that, with thirty thousand teachers there, twenty-nine thousand will not wish to confine their visit wholly to matters of professional method. They will want to see the Boston of the Revolution, the Boston of the Stamp Act, and of the Massacre, and of Bunker Hill. Alas! the march of improvement is so rapid that we have not too many monuments to show them; but they will be made welcome, first in the archive chamber of the State House, where the accomplished historians who are on duty there will gladly show them autographs of Benjamin Franklin, of John and Samuel Adams, of James Bowdoin, not enough remembered, of John Hancock and the rest of the men who led in the great struggle. They can see Gates's original despatch, describing the surrender of Burgoyne. They can see Stark's letter with which he sent his trophies from Bennington, or they see can, what to me is quite as pathetic, the return of the captain of Pepperell's minute men, written on the 20th of April, which tells how his men, summoned before daylight, marched to Charlestown Neck before seven in the evening,— "And we drove them and drove them, and drove them all day."

They can see in the letter the reminder to the Provincial Congress that, when these men lunched at such an "ordinary," every man paid his scot of ninepence, so that the Government must not pay again five shillings for that luncheon. I count this as one of the magnificent illustrations of the way in which people began a war against the man who was yesterday their sovereign. Bunker Hill monument will give our visitors what is perhaps the best panorama of Revolutionary history. They can see Concord and Lexington without going so far. But, if they choose to see the places where the "embattled freemen stood," you can hardly suggest trolley rides more beautiful than those which will take them to one of those battle-grounds or the other.

At Dorchester Heights, on the other side of Boston, where Ward and Putnam between sunset and sunrise threw up the works which Howe's officers described as resembling the works of genii in the "Arabian Nights," they will find, as they ought to find, one of the noblest school buildings in the world. They will find an accomplished gentleman at the head of it, who is well informed in all the historical memorials of the place. They will go down to a pretty park. It is here Lord Percy wanted to land and attack the new-built works, but a stiff gale prevented him; and there was no second carnage of Bunker Hill. They will find a charming walk which shall take them to what was in those days Fort William and what is now Fort Independence, the first fort built in Massachusetts. They will be glad to remember that this fort or fortress, if you please, never fired a shot in anger, and that the island is now the playground for the children of the town.

A very pretty trolley ride will take them to Squantum, of which the memory runs farther back. It was under the cliff at Squantum that the Pilgrim Fathers ate lobsters together on the very first voyage up the bay. And, alas! they left in their records their regrets that they had not settled here rather than at Plymouth. On a journey there they will cross the line of the Quincy Railroad, the first railroad built in America. The mountain quarries above them are on what we call the "Blue Hills." But our predecessors called them the "Great Hills." In their language the word "Massachusetts" meant "Great Hills," and from that name Massachusetts Bay and the Bay State derived its name.

Another excursion, but one which need not take but half a day, will take them to Plymouth and Forefathers' Rock. An excursion not so long will take them to Salem, where the Massachusetts Company first planted themselves, and where are the memories of the first bloodshed of the Revolution and of the witchcraft.

A few of the most interesting historical localities have been marked by the Sons and Daughters of the Revolution with appropriate tablets of inscriptions. The story is told of a man born in Killarney who supposed that the tea was thrown overboard from T Wharf, but this is hardly possible now. Paul Revere's home, the spire of the lanterns, the scenes of the Boston Massacre, the Griffin's Wharf of the Tea Party, the Old South Meeting-house, are all fitly inscribed.

But for the homes of the great men of Boston the memorials are not so definite. The birthplace of Franklin was opposite the Old South Meeting-house on Milk-street. The Transcript office now occupies the spot. Cotton lived on Cotton Hill, not far from the present Court-house. In later times Emerson was born in Summer-street, near Chauncey-street, which has its name from Chauncey of the First Church. Channing lived in the house still standing a little above Louisburg-square on Mount Vernon-street. Daniel Webster lived where Summer-street passes into High-street. Freeman Clarke was born in Eaton-street, in a house still standing.

An excellent story is told of a Cuban lady, who was here at the Summer School three years ago, leaving on her return to Havana with the impression that the police of Boston is a staff of men whose duty it is to attend on ladies who do not know their way and guide them to the objects of interest which they wish to see. I cannot but hope that our readers may be so fortunate as to think that such is the business of every person whom they meet in Boston.

EDWARD E. HALE.

A CONSERVATIVE REFORMER.

SEVERAL interesting pamphlets from the pen of M. Nicolas Népluyeff, and published in Paris at Fischbacher's, have recently come under our notice. M. Népluyeff is the founder and president of the working confraternity of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, at Vosdvigensk, in Ukraine. His pamphlets are filled with regret at the present revolutionary movement in Russia, and, as it seems to us, with misunderstanding of its motive force. But they contain much valuable and suggestive thought on the basis of social reform. He, himself a loyal Russian and orthodox Greek Christian, seems to have been working out these ideas for a quarter of a century upon his own large estates, where he has established two agricultural schools, one for youths and another for girls, as well as the working confraternity already mentioned. He has, to use his own words, been creating a sort of moral sanatorium: a living, healthy cell of the new social order. Now, an old man, he makes his appeal to all reformers to eschew talk and parties, and to work along constructive lines. Let them recognise that love is the only cement which can truly bind any society together, and that until men have become conscious of love as an inward authority there can be, properly speaking, no moral order, but only a congeries of individuals organised under compulsion or greed. Let them unite in a common purpose, to create a community in which love is the sole ruler; coming out, for this end, from among those who are actuated by other purposes.

He regrets and condemns the fear, which he discerns among good people, of thus separating and organising for the work of the Kingdom of God. He sees no hope in any form of communion, or social control, save that of a true church; to which, as to the visible and active representative of their social ideals, people would of their own will make over their possessions, as he has given his to the fraternity. Property is the measure of a man's freedom, so long as fear and greed rule society. To be the slave of a majority is to be a slave indeed. But M. Népluyeff seems to forget that our social problem is very largely this, that we have yet to create even this measure of personal freedom for an increasing number of our fellow citizens.

His argument that the only true liberty is the liberty to live well—that all else is mere libertinism, the deadliest enemy of that which is the child of discipline and self-sacrifice—is admirable and often admirably put. But it seems to be associated in his mind with a species of Nihilism; Nihilism which does not understand the modern political consciousness, the moving spirit of Democracy. The peoples are becoming slowly articulate; they wish to speak; they wish to learn the use of laws and of whatever else may express and give a body to their social needs and faculties. And neither the present revolution in Russia, nor the social movement in the West, will end in the mere brutal anarchy which M. Népluyeff foresees and deplores. It is not the mere dominance of the mob which awaits us; the mob itself is slowly, surely, becoming human.

A RELIGIOUS FAITH FOR TO-DAY.

II.—IMMANENCE AND PERSONALITY.

If the argument or appeal of last week's paper should seem in any wise convincing to any, they will agree that the idea of unity should hold a more significant place in the creed of the modern world than in most of the creeds of other days. There is, it was contended, a principle of order and law which holds within itself all the manifold of experience; for only thus can we account for the simple fact that things have real relations one to another, or that conscious beings are aware of each other's existence. The totality of things and creatures is a unity, not a mere aggregation of parts. Hence it might be granted to lovers of that much-abused word "Unitarian" to say, The Universe itself is Unitarian, so lifting their religious name above all suspicion of denominational exclusiveness or sectarian pride.

And, seeing that, not by physical contact, but by subtle inward communings, we apprehend and realise the great fellowship of life and the world, we must claim that this unity of the whole is spiritual. It is in the unity of our own spiritual consciousness that things and persons are discerned as standing in vital relation one to another. Thus it becomes entirely natural to conceive the ultimate reality of the whole as Spirit. Universal Consciousness is at once the simplest and the highest term whereby to express that reality. In their final significance all things exist, and are made one, in the spirit of the whole; and the great saying, "God is Spirit," may prove to be the last word of philosophy, even as it is the purest and noblest ideal of religion.

But now we are confronted by that old-world problem which is, perhaps, the most entrancing and delightful of all the problems which have perplexed the human mind—How can there be any real individual, personal life if one Universal Spirit pervades the world and holds within itself everything that is? If God be all in all, how can man be, what he so fondly thinks himself to be, "a simple separate person," with power on his own act and will, with freedom to live his own morally responsible life? How can you and I be ourselves, in any vital and effective way, if the Eternal Spirit of all is immanent and effective in us, always and everywhere?

It will be wise to confess at once that probably no finite mind will ever solve that problem, and also that no serious thinker will ever be able to ignore it. It will always confront him, and for ever lure him on to try and reckon with it and, in highest moments, to rejoice in its mystery and its overwhelming significance. It is the divinely beautiful paradox of the spiritual life from which we cannot escape and should never wish to escape. Our strength lies in holding fast to both the seemingly opposing facts—our weakness, in surrendering either and becoming fatalists on the one hand, or puny self-assertive individualists on the other. The world is one, and the Spirit which constitutes that oneness, of all things and creatures, must be in all things and creatures, and effective in them. And yet we are directly conscious of an individual life; in every movement of thought and will we are made aware of a living self which has its own reflective and volitional responsibility, to be surrendered only at the price of mental and moral death. These two facts of experience seem mutually exclusive or contradictory; they remind us of that old puzzle: "What would happen if an irresistible force were brought to bear on an immovable point?" The immanence of God seems to render impossible the free activity of man; yet reason compels us to believe in the one, and our direct personal experience, in everyday life, bears witness to the other.

It is well to remind ourselves that when face to face with two ideas or propositions, both of which seem true and yet contradictory, the difficulty may lie in the fact that we do not know enough about either of them to enable us to see how they can exist together. This universe is governed by law, and therefore everything that happens in it is determined by the whole force of the cosmic process. And yet the very creatures to whom this is so convincing are conscious of individual freedom; and the conviction of moral responsibility is one of the most vital experiences of life. The task of reconciling these, in thought, may prove too great for us; but this should not be strange, seeing that we have not yet comprehended the full significance of either. The depths of the human personality, the breadth and height of cosmic power, no finite intelligence can explore. It should not, then, surprise us that we cannot tell how both may be true.

I stood the other day by a field of growing corn. The tall green stalks stood up, each in its place, each with its roots holding to the soil as the wind swayed them, each lifting its ear, laden with grain, into the air and sunlight. They grew together there in the one field, a countless multitude of individual forms, yet all obedient to the law of corn-life, all descended from some ancestral germ or cell, all expressions of a particular kind of grain which we know as wheat. The charm of those broad acres of grain as "waves of shadow" went over them, the loveliness that was there, over and above the utility and economic value of the field, was due, I thought, to the harmony of its abundant life—to the unity of its manifold forms. Every one of those forms was living and growing as a distinct plant, no two of them exactly alike; yet all were included in that one species which nature and man had evolved. Wheat—those thousands of separately growing things could be gathered together in the unity of that one conception. But these stalks and ears of corn are not persons, we say; they have no conscious responsible life such as we have. Perhaps not—though we are not to be too sure even there. I had my suspicions that in some dim way they were happily aware of themselves, and were each doing their best, in the sun and rain. Anyhow, the illustration may serve to make us more familiar and friendly with the idea of the one and the many—of the one in the many.

Let me venture an example of the more human sort. I was listening, not long ago, to a speaker addressing a number of people on a subject of great interest. He spoke with much seriousness and intensity of conviction, and as he spoke the spell of his quiet eloquence was upon us all. The thought or faith which he was expounding seemed to pervade the assembly and to hold the minds of his listeners in close and concentrated attention; it gathered that group of persons, of many and varied creeds, into a unity of interest and aspiration which was very real and very impressive. And when he ceased to speak it was, at first, as if his message had taken possession of us all—as if the truth, as he conceived and presented it, had won the heart and claimed the intellectual assent of everyone present. But then followed questions and a discussion; and lo! it appeared that nearly everyone saw things differently—that each mind, facing the same question, looked at it from a different point of view. No one, perhaps, differed entirely from the speaker. Something, deep down, was common to all and held us in the unity of a great ideal. But every mind, playing freely and more or less intelligently on the speaker's theme, approached it and apprehended it in its own way. The unity of interest and purpose and aspiration was not despoiled, but the diversity of thought and feeling was made clear. The spell of a convincing sincerity was not broken, but the freedom of personal conviction and insight was maintained.

This, too, but partially and very imperfectly, illustrates the truth of the one life and the many forms through which it finds expression. I know that it fails altogether in the last resort. No analogy, in the finite realm of things, can do more than hint of the meaning of infinite relations. It is only in deep moments of vital experience that we discern the reality of personal freedom moving within the all-embracing unity of spiritual law. Yet few of us, I think, are so poor as not to have known that experience. We have felt the encompassing and commanding power of the One Life. From that Life our own is derived; by it we are sustained every moment; outside it there is no life for any creature; yet within it there exists this personal life which we know and feel. We are conscious of our own thought, our own will, our own activity; it is our own, and yet still more it is not our own—it is His who includes and sustains it. And our intellectual satisfaction lies in the fuller realisation of both these conceptions; our moral wisdom, in bringing our finite thought and will into conscious harmony with the infinite thought and will; our spiritual freedom, in choosing the highest we know—in saying, "I will to do Thy will; I choose to obey; I desire only to serve, and in that service to find my fullest liberty and my surest rest."

We may, then, allow to the doctrine of Immanence its most exacting claim; we need not shrink from the inevitable inference that One Life indwells with all, that it pervades and interpenetrates the whole—that the solid rock, the swaying sea, the starry spaces, the immeasurable ages, the innumerable creatures, the sensitive nerve and brain centres of the animals, the speculative intellect, the loving heart, the mysterious will of man—are all included in the life of God. And we need not fear that this means the submerging of personality, the denial of moral freedom, the collapse or the confusion of a real and vital individuality. The divine is in the human; the human is one with the divine and can never be exiled from it. The One Eternal Spirit gives of its own life every moment, and yet our individual life is actual, vivid, intense, personal; it is ours and it is also God's. And we are strong and happy and wise when we exert our will and make our choice as free, responsible beings, sure that, in the very act of asserting ourselves thus, we may be surrendering to the highest law we know—that while doing our own work with all our might, "it is God who worketh in us to will and to do of His good pleasure." And in this assurance the bold words of Paul may not seem too bold: "We are the fellow-labourers of God"; nor his solemn appeal too solemn: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"

MR. LAMBLEY'S FAREWELL.

(From a Melbourne Correspondent.)

A SOMEWHAT unusual series of meetings connected with the departure of the Rev. R. H. Lambley from Melbourne reached their culmination on July 4, when a great gathering of friends took place in the Church Hall to bid good-bye to the retiring minister who, after a service extending over nine and a half years, leaves for England, and carries away with him the highest regard of the church and the respect of the community.

Mr. Lambley has taken an active part in several movements of a social and religious kind, and the friends of these several movements marked in some way their sense of loss by his removal from Melbourne. The first of the series of gatherings referred to began on June 12, when Mr. Lambley delivered a lecture before the Peace Society on "Australia's Place in Peace and War." The audience was large and enthusiastic, and showed the greatest interest in the subject, and, at the close, manifested the kindest sentiments towards the speaker and the best of good wishes for his future. Mr. Justice Higgins, of the High Court of the Commonwealth of Australia, took the chair, and had many good things to say of Mr. Lambley and his services to the cause of peace and the social good of the community. The lecture itself was an attempt to state the subject from the purely Australian point of view, and the effort was so highly appreciated that the lecture is to be printed in the form of a booklet over the signature of the Peace Society.

Some eight or ten days later, that is, on June 23, Mr. Lambley, at the request of the Rev. Dr. Strong, took leave of the members of the Australian Church, with which he has enjoyed the most cordial relations during the whole of his stay in Melbourne. On the evening of that day he preached to a large congregation, and at the close of the service an informal meeting of the members of the church was held, at which Mr. a'Beckett, acting for the committee of management and the congregation, presented an address to Mr. Lambley in a gracious speech, which was suitably acknowledged.

On the following Sunday, June 30, Mr. Lambley preached two farewell sermons in the Unitarian Church, to large congregations, and so concluded his period of service amongst us, a conclusion that is deeply regretted both by the congregation and the town as a whole, for he has won the highest regard from a very large circle of friends, both inside and outside of the church.

This fact was proved in a manner which must have been as great a surprise to Mr. Lambley as it was to us, a surprise which, whilst it heightened our regard for our minister, if that is possible, deepened our regret at our loss. For at the farewell "send off" arranged for July 4, one of the largest and most representative gatherings assembled to wish Mr. and Mrs. Lambley and family "Bon voyage." There were present the Rev. Dr. Rentoul, of Ormond College; Rev. Dr. Strong, of the Australian Church; Rabbi Danglow, representing the Hebrew congregations; Father Kantopoulos, of the Orthodox Greek Church; Rev. Edward Taylor, S. Stephenson, M.A., Rev. J. Meadowcraft, Congregationalists; the Hon. John Murray, M.L.A.; G. M. Prendergast, M.L.A., leader of the Labour Party in the State Parliament; Dr. Malloney, M.P. for the City of Melbourne in the Federal House, and several other prominent citizens, amongst whom were Hebrews, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, and others. All these various gentlemen united in expressing the greatest regret that Mr. Lambley was leaving the town, and the highest regard for him and the work he had done amongst them. Such a meeting was a compliment of which any man might well be proud; a ministry could not be altogether in vain which had made it possible.

Mr. H. Gyles Turner, the lifelong friend of the church, presided, and presented to Mr. Lambley a purse of sovereigns—a "symbol," so he truly said, "of the golden opinions Mr. Lambley had won in Australia." Then Dr. Rentoul took the platform, and in a very beautiful speech presented to Mr. Lambley an address from those outside the church, that is, "a number of your fellow-citizens, as representing various elements of opinion and of public life in Australia." "You have been," declared the address, "in our midst one of the kindest and most brotherly of men, tolerant always of the beliefs and feelings of others, whilst, at the same time, fearless in the claim of freedom for the maintenance of your own convictions." This address was signed by men who fill the most commanding positions in the State and Commonwealth, that is to say, by Dr. Rentoul, Prof. Laurie, of the Melbourne University; his Honour Mr. Justice Higgins, of the High Court; Mr. David Syme, the proprietor of the Age, Australia's most powerful paper; the Hon. J. Murray, M.L.A.; Dr. Malloney, M.P. for the city; Dr. Strong, and several others of scarcely less note. And then the Hon. J. Murray presented Mr. Lambley with a cheque subscribed by friends outside the church, who desired to acknowledge his services in some way.

Then Mrs. H. G. Turner, on behalf of the ladies of the congregation, presented to Mrs. Lambley a purse of gold, and to her sister a beautiful gold brooch with a diamond centre. After all these functions Mr. Lambley had the difficult task of responding to all the kind words and wishes of so many friends—a difficult task appropriately discharged. And thus ended a remarkable, interesting, but all the same, sad meeting, as must always be the case when we part from those we love and esteem. Pending the arrival of the minister, Mr. Turner is to take the services. Mr. Lambley sails for Europe July 18.

THE VAN MISSION.

SOME GREAT MEETINGS.

LAST week's reports from all the Vans are uniformly good, and that from No. 1 exceptionally so. Its six meetings account for no less than 5,300 people; No. 4, with seven meetings, had 2,950; No. 3, with nine meetings, 1,850; and No. 2, with four meetings, 1,150. Three times No. 1 Van passed the thousand; seven meetings had 750 or upwards; and 20 had an attendance of 200 and over, including the earlier figures. The week's record stands at a gross attendance of 11,250 for 26 meetings, an average of 430. During the last five weeks 124 meetings have been held, with an aggregate attendance of 36,640, and an average of just over 295. These figures afford a basis of comparison with the work of No. 1 Van last season, which was on the road for 21 weeks, and held 139 meetings with a gross attendance of 24,516, giving an average of 176 per meeting.

The Rev. A. Hall (Norwich) reports much that is of interest from "No. 1," at Mansfield and district. The eagerness of the crowds has been extreme. On the last night at Mansfield 800 stood in the rain; at Shirebrook some 200 stood in "heavy rain" for two hours! Some vigorous questioning took place, chiefly by orthodox champions of the Bible, who had to retire discomfited. Other, and more profitable, questioning ranged over moral problems, conscience, temptation, &c. Testimonies of a very touching kind were given personally after the meetings closed by men who had realised, for the first time, that a faith exists for them after they have given up the puerilities of the traditional scheme of doctrine. "The doctrine of the Trinity is dead; the doctrine of Hell is not; the doctrine of the Atonement is alive." Mr. Hall notes "as a bad sign" that out of thirty questions or so each evening, not one was put on the subjects of Prayer or Worship: A zealous, but not strictly truthful, "Evangelist" was scornfully ejected by the crowd, after denying—contrary to evidence supplied among listening strangers—that he had been circulating leaflets.

This Van has been working north towards Sheffield, and the missionaries have been the Rev. Simon Jones (Swansea) and Mr. W. F. Kennedy; the Rev. H. S. Tayler and friends assisted at Chesterfield. Next week the Rev. T. A. Gorton (Moseley) and the Sheffield ministers (Revs. C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, J. Ruddle, and W. J. Cock) will work in Sheffield.

No 2 Van (Rev. E. T. Russell) has done well, in spite of roaring weather, at Saltcoats and Largs. The Rev. T. P. Spedding has visited here.

No. 3 has had some lively meetings at Waltham Abbey, Enfield, and Edmonton; in addition to those mentioned last week the following have taken part:—Mr. Frank Talbot and Mr. G. Ward. Dinner hour meetings were held with success at the Enfield Gun Factory. The Rev. E. S. Hicks began at Walthamstow on Thursday this week; the Van will move on to Ilford and Barking, and the Rev. J. T. Davis (Chatham) is next missionary.

No. 4 Van (Revs. T. Paxton and W. L. Schröder) has met with much encouragement in the Potteries. At Burslem a donation of a sovereign and a promise of £5 towards cost of winter lectures were given. At Hanley 500 were present to start, becoming double the number as soon as the missionary began to speak. The Socialists here closed their meeting early one night, and cancelled a meeting altogether on another, in order not to interrupt the missionaries. The Rev. W. A. Weatherall (Crumlin) has taken up duty at Tunstall; next week the Van goes to Crewe.

Friends interested in this truly remarkable work are reminded that subscriptions in aid, postal mission inquiries, and other communications should be sent to Rev. T. P. Spedding, Buckingham-road, Heaton Chapel, Manchester.

IMPRESSIONS OF VAN WORK.

I GLADLY respond to the Editor's request for a few notes. On August 1, I went to the Van at Waltham Abbey, believing in Van-work. A week of actual experience has convinced me that this work is, to say the least, among the best we are doing. I have been taught and inspired by it from beginning to end. As to being taught by it, I came away from the last of my twelve meetings feeling that I had learned as much from that as from any of the series. I have learned a great deal as to what men need—both those who are in the churches and those who are outside—and as to the true method of meeting their needs. I have learned more about these things in this one week than in the 24 years of my ministry. As to being inspired by the work, the circumstances gave me quite a new feeling. I felt, as never before, what it is to be an imitator of Christ. I have always felt how easy and unprofitable it is to use the precept "Follow the example of Jesus" in a glib and general way. It is often used as if it pointed to a brief and plain manual of conduct, which will save us the trouble of thought. But by most men it cannot be acted upon literally, even in the main lines of their life; and to say that it only refers to the spirit of the life of Jesus is to appeal to a vague principle which requires interpretation by some clearer and deeper principle. I have felt all conventional use of the precept to be peculiarly inappropriate in any minister who does not take his message to the people as Jesus did. Hence a certain reserve on my part in the use of the precept—and more. But, working on the Van, I felt that the "imitation of Christ" might be more fully and consistently realised by me than ever before. I felt nearer to the heart of the great lover and teacher of men than in all my ministry. I felt nearer to such men as St. Francis, George Fox, John Wesley.

One great fact has stared me in the face all the time—there is an immense need and call for our work outside our churches. Many of the unchurched are conscious of their need and will listen to us with eagerness. Hardly a voice was raised in opposition from this side. Many churchgoers listen with quiet thoughtfulness, glad to hear their silently cherished beliefs spoken publicly. Even the sternly orthodox cannot keep away, for they must come and show that we are wrong—thus giving us the opportunity of placing the alternatives vividly before the people. Nothing has more clearly revealed to me the darkness in which great numbers, both of churchgoers and non-churchgoers, are than the general ignorance of the revised version of the Bible and of the significance of its changes. I have made much use of the revised Bible in showing the orthodox that they are in spiritual bondage, and in showing others that they may be religious and yet free from bondage.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Blackpool.—On Sunday-week a gold albert and pendant were presented to Mr. R. A. Underwood, retiring secretary of the North Shore Unitarian Church, on the occasion of his leaving the town for London. The Rev. R. McGee, who made the presentation on behalf of the subscribers, Mr. J. H. Wood, treasurer of the church, and Mr. J. J. Horne spoke of Mr. Underwood's useful work for the church, and expressed good wishes for his future, which Mr. Underwood cordially acknowledged.

Chorley.—The annual sermons were preached to large and appreciative audiences, on Sunday last, by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle. Two solos were sung by Mrs. W. Porter. The collections for the general funds of the church amounted to £8 8s.

Coalville.—A public tea was provided by Mr. and Mrs. Goacher, in a large room lent by Mr. Goddard, on Wednesday week, and a very enjoyable social evening was spent. The Rev. Walter H. Burgess, of Loughborough, presided, and urged the friends to remain united, as the prospects of the future were very encouraging. He hoped the time was not far distant when a convenient site might be secured, and a substantial building erected thereon. An entertainment followed. Hearty votes of thanks brought the meeting to a close. The proceeds will be handed over to the treasurer of the building fund.

Crewe.—The annual flower services were held on Sunday, August 4. A novel feature of the proceedings was a choir of little girls, dressed in colours and wearing flowers, who sang a number of appropriate hymns. The Mayor of Crewe presided in the afternoon, and made a sympathetic speech. Several of the children gave recitations and solos. At the evening service Rev. H. Fisher Short preached on "The Little Flowers of St. Francis."

London: Bell-street Mission (Appointment).—The Rev. E. P. Farley, B.A., of St. Helen's, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation from the Committee of the London Domestic Mission to take charge of the Bell-street Mission, in succession to the Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., and will take up the work at the beginning of October.

London: Mansford Street.—The 23rd Annual Flower Show took place on Wednesday, July 24th, when some 125 pot plants were brought in for competition, having been cared for by adults or children since the beginning of last May. The geraniums (in two kinds) and the fuchsias were fully in flower, but owing to the cold season, the begonias had not reached their best condition. Mr. G. H. Ellis again kindly acted as judge. At 8.30 the Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A., took the chair, and Mrs. Rawlings distributed the prizes both for the plants there exhibited, and also for the bulbs best grown and exhibited at the Spring Show. The secretary was able to read the report and announce the winners of the prizes kindly provided by the Metropolitan Gardens Association for the best kept window boxes in the surrounding neighbourhood. This competition was only introduced this season, and, although small, was distinctly encouraging, and did somewhat to brighten the streets round about.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, August 11th, we commemorated the 196th Anniversary of this Church—founded by Robert Cosens in 1711. Sermons were preached by Rev. Samuel Burrows, of Hastings. Both were full of thought, and greatly enjoyed by the congregations, which were larger than usual; the collections were nearly double last year's.

Tavistock (Appointment).—Rev. E. B. Betham, recently assistant to Rev. T. W. Chignell, at George's Meeting, Exeter, and since Mr. Chignell's death minister in charge of George's Meeting, has received and accepted a unanimous and cordial invitation to the pulpit of the Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, and will begin his ministry on the first Sunday in October.

Whitby.—On Sunday last a large congregation attended the inauguration of an eagle lectern carved in oak, to the order of Mrs. Tattersfield, and presented to the congregation by her on the forty-third anniversary of the marriage day of the Rev. F. Haydn Williams, both Mr. and Mrs. Williams being nearly 71 years of age. The day was further notable by Mr. Williams's demolition of a new encroaching fence in Green lane, which the Urban District Council had decided to connive at. A tea-party of children will be given on the recovered land by Mrs. Tattersfield.

MANY of us have noted with profound regret the support given to the military training of schoolboys by medical and educational bodies. A very effective and timely protest has been sent to the members of the Association of Headmasters by Mr. Arthur Rowntree, of the famous Quaker School at Bootham, York, and appears in last week's Friend. He regards the introduction of rifle shooting into secondary schools as a departure from all true educational progress. The boy is a filibuster by nature, his combative instinct needs no culture. It is far more difficult, and important, to train his judgment, than to make him a marksman. And to train schoolboys for practical defence is to fill their minds with suspicions of possible invaders, whether German or French. The danger of the military spirit is far greater than that of invasion; it is the spirit which substitutes vast "armaments" for social reform. Finally, Mr. Rowntree says: "In calling your attention to the educational aspect of this question, I am at one with you in desiring to train boys for national work and service, and I submit that it is our privilege and duty as Headmasters to see that the young men who leave our schools are qualified by mental habits and training to take their places as leaders of rational movements, able and willing to guide their country in the paths of peace."

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE have this week another most welcome "In the Crow's Nest" article; from the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who is now fully installed as a minister of the Swiss Reformed Church in the Canton of Graubünden. Three other articles will follow from week to week, continuing his story. Mr. Lummis told us on June 8 of his first preaching in German, and on June 29 of his visit to the three parishes in the Münstertal which had united to ask him to be their minister. He is now settled in his parsonage at Fuldera, with the churches at Chierfs and Lü also to serve. The Münstertal is in the extreme east of Switzerland, close to the frontier of Tyrol and also of Italy. It is reached from the Upper Engadin, as Mr. Lummis has told us, by way of Zernez and the Ofener Pass. It is a very happy circumstance that the liberal Church of Graubünden has thus received our friend into fellowship. Continued residence in that glorious mountain country cannot fail to be of benefit to him and his, and the heartiest good wishes of many friends at home will be with him in his new sphere of work.

WHEN the Peace Conference at the Hague has completed its session, we hope to be able to estimate what has been achieved. One important step was taken last Saturday, though it falls far short of what the eager friends of peace had hoped of this second Conference. Sir Edward Fry, the senior British delegate, then made on behalf of his Government the following declaration:—

"The Government of Great Britain would be prepared annually to communicate to the Powers who would do the same the programme of construction for new vessels of war and the expenditure entailed by that programme. This exchange of information would facilitate an exchange of views between the Governments as to the reductions which might be effected by mutual agreement. The British Government believes that in this way an understanding might be reached as to the expenditure which the States who agree to follow this course would be justified in providing for in their budgets." And in conclusion he offered this resolution:—"The Conference confirms the resolution adopted by the Conference of 1899 with regard to the limitation of military charges, and, seeing that military charges have considerably increased in nearly every country since that year, the Conference declares it highly desirable that the Governments should resume the serious study of this question."

IN the course of his speech he called to mind the fact that the intolerable burden of armaments and the desire to find some mitigation of the evil had been the first object of the Emperor of Russia in calling together the Conference of 1899, and he went on to show how, since then, the burden had been immensely increased. "Thus," he said, "according to the very accurate information which I have received, this expenditure reached in 1898 (that is, in the year which immediately preceded the first Hague Conference) a total of more than £251,000,000 for European countries, with the exception of Turkey and Montenegro (on which I have no information) and the United States and Japan; while the expenditure in the same countries for the year 1906 amounted to more than £320,000,000. It will be seen, therefore, that in the interval between these two Conferences the annual military expenditure was increased by a sum of £69,000,000 or over 1,725,000,000 fr.—an enormous growth."

"Such," exclaimed Sir Edward Fry, "is the Christian peace of the civilised world in the twentieth century."

AT the conclusion of the speech of the British delegate, the President read a letter from Mr. Choate supporting the proposal on behalf of the Government of the United States. This was followed by a speech by M. Bourgeois, giving the support of France. Finally, at the suggestion of the President, the proposal was adopted by acclamation. It is a pious aspiration; but it is something that the purpose should at least be kept in view.

WE printed last week the sermon preached by Dr. Carpenter in Manchester College Chapel on Sunday morning, August 4, in connection with the Summer Meeting of University Extension students at Oxford. In the Non-Official Theological lectures, which, however, the Delegacy courteously note in the programme, Manchester College again bore its part. The Principal gave four lectures on "The Movements of English Theology from the time of Locke" (with special reference to the influence of Oxford), and Mr. Addis three lectures on "Religion in the Psalms." On the Sunday evenings, August 4 and 11, Dr. Carpenter also lectured on "The First Three Gospels, and how to Read them," when there was a very large attendance.

THE summer meeting, which opened on August 1, and closes on Monday next, has been devoted, on the historical side, to "Oxford, and its place in National History, with special reference to the Seventeenth Century." On the side of Economics special attention was given to "some of the more pressing Social-Economic Problems of the day, in their general relation to the contrasted ideals of Socialism and Individualism." Among the lecturers have been the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, on the Schoolmen and Scholastic Philosophy; Dr. J. Edwin Odgers, on Puritan Rule in Oxford; the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, on W. Savage Landor; and Professor Muirhead, on the Philosophy of T. H. Green.

THE promoters of the Summer School of New Theology, recently concluded at Penmaenmawr, are more than satisfied with the success of the venture. The school was held under the auspices of the Alpha Union, of which the Rev. J. Bruce Wallace, of Letchworth (Garden City), is the secretary and organiser. This Union (the purpose of which we noted in the Inquirer of July 13) "seeks to bring into touch with each other people who, whatever their minor differences, recognise that man's nature is essentially spiritual." Differences, however, were decidedly more than "minor." Both as to judicial temper and philosophical standpoint the New Theologians were as far asunder as the poles. An occasional note of finality and infallibility jarred on those who necessarily associate with a liberal movement modesty of utterance and an open mind.

DR. HUNTER's paper on "Inspiration, Ancient and Modern," was in excellent tone and taste, luminous with many suggestive and forceful passages. It was a fine plea for the recognition of an element of inspiration in all high and surpassingly good work. If Bezaleel's cunning work for the ancient tabernacle was an "inspiration," why not Watt's invention of the steam engine, Arkwright's of the spinning jenny, Morse's of the telegraph? "When we read that Moses was divinely guided to find the promised land for the people of Israel, are we not also right in thinking that Columbus was just as divinely guided to discover America? Who that reflects upon the consequences to human progress involved in the discovery of America can hesitate to interpret those strange, unaccountable, unescapable impressions which haunted the soul of Columbus, and which left him no peace until he found a New World, as the inspiration of the Eternal Spirit who is guiding in mysterious ways the progress of mankind?"

A BREEZY and interesting speaker at Penmaenmawr, who readily captured his audiences, was Dr. Algernon Crapsey, who, after trial and appeal, has been expelled from the Anglican Episcopal Church of America for heresy. We do not wonder. His address on "Practical Implications of Divine Immanence" wholly exonerates that body (being what it is) from any charge of inadequate grounds of action. Dr. Crapsey's Gospel is too large altogether for any church bound by ancient formularies. He makes a clean sweep of the conventionalities which separate man from man. Even nationality must go down before universality. Instead of erecting artificial barriers which prevent us from getting at our brother men, we should rather go out of our way to show that, elementally, we are all one. Neither Britain, nor the Anglican communion, constitutes the whole of God's universe. "If you want to love a man you simply have to know him."

DR. CRAPSEY's address was on the "Practical Implications of the Doctrine of Divine Immanence." Towards its close he alluded to the heavy fine in which the Standard Oil Company had recently been mulcted, and vigorously declared that "the laws of God are working inevitably to the destruction of our civilisation" as at present constituted. It was only by radical reform that it could escape the fate which overtook the civilisation of Rome, or of the France of the eighteenth century.

THE Rev. J. Stitt Wilson, M.A., of Berkeley, Cal., speaking upon a similar topic, described the "social struggle of the people for freedom" as "the historic revelation of the Christ." He conceived that the modern interpretation of the teaching of Jesus with regard to the kingdom of God would produce certain definite results, viz., (1) "The release into the present surging current of modern society of 'Christed' [anointed] personalities of a new type," inspired social reformers; (2) The advent of a new type of religious conversion, which would change the whole social attitude of the persons affected; and (3) The practical recognition of the Christ-presence in the suffering body of all the poor and oppressed. He was followed by Mr. Bruce Wallace, who spoke in the same vein, dwelling especially upon the moral dissatisfaction of many prosperous people who are "uneasy about a gain which means others' loss." There was a growing consciousness of solidarity, a recognition and realisation of the universal indwelling God. Reports of all the addresses are given in last week's Christian Commonwealth.

ONE advantage of the Wesley hymns is that so many of them, like so many of the Psalms in the Bible, were evidently occasional compositions. Having been written in view of some particular occasion of grief or joy, at a time of many conversions, or at a moment when many had strayed and wandered away, they have the glow of truth in them; they bear repetition just because the occasions which gave rise to them are repeated over and over in the life of every church which sings them. At the last meeting of the last Bible Christian Conference, when every soul was full of suppressed emotion, when, according to the report, the mover of the resolution that the Journal be signed uttered his words with breaking voice, full of the thought that the individual life of the denomination had come to an end, and was merged into the larger life of the United Methodist Church, it was not difficult, even then, to find exactly the right hymn as if the occasion had been foreseen. "We all shall think and speak the same" is the prophecy of one of the verses then sung, and immediately after follows the prayer, "Unite and perfect us in one." In these moments of ecstasy, when the experience of many past years seems concentrated into a few brief moments, a stanza that at another time and to other men might seem but a commonplace utterance, comes as an inspired word from the Spirit of all good. Happy the singer who, like Charles Wesley, becomes thus a medium by which the thoughts of God are borne to men, and the prayers of men addressed to God.

REFERRING to "J.B.'s" trenchant article on the theology carried abroad by the Missionary Societies, the Rev. E. P. Rice gave in the Christian World the result of his thirty-four years' experience in India. He says: "I have, regretfully, to bear my testimony that the untenableness of much of the traditional theology found in the books of an earlier generation of missionaries, and still circulated, has had much to do with keeping the thinking classes of India outside the Christian Church. It is doubtless true that moral and social causes very largely determine their attitude, but the Justification for that attitude they draw from our theology. A frank revision of traditional theological statements is imperative, not only in the general interests of truth, but also in the special interests of those great Eastern nations to which God has appointed us the almoners of the evangelic faith. Many, I know, will think this an impious suggestion, and tremble at the thought of what it might involve. I, for my part, am convinced that the everlasting Gospel will suffer nothing in the process, but will rather shine forth with greater splendour as gold refined in the fire."

DIVINE Immanence and Transcendence continue to perplex the theologian, the preacher, and the man in the street, and to interest them all. Dr. Horton recently preached on the subject, and remarked that it is a popular error to regard immanence and transcendence as mutually exclusive, because each really derives its religious value from the other. After this admission it seems strange for Dr. Horton to insist that Jesus in his person is the reconciliation of the transcendence and immanence of God; though, perhaps, what he actually means is that Jesus is a proof to us that the two attributes need no reconciliation. The sermon, which helps us because of its spiritual earnestness, does nothing to elucidate the problem, as the following curious piece of reasoning will show: "The student of the person of Jesus Christ is equally bound to admit that God is in Jesus to the full, and yet that God is beyond and above Jesus Christ. If Christ, of course, had been the whole Godhead, if we could say that the Infinite Being was contracted to the person of Jesus, living a human life, then we should have known nothing of the transcendence of God. If, on the other hand, he had been a mere man, an ordinary human being, speculating about God, and appealing to God as a distant eternal being, we should have known nothing about the immanence of God. The reason why we can judge of the immanence and the transcendence of God as a fact is the marvellous and unique person of Jesus, for there in that person we cannot avoid the conclusion that God is, and yet that God is beyond."

MOUND BAYON, Mi., is a successful negro social experiment. It is planted in some 30,000 acres, owned and worked exclusively by about 4,000 enterprising coloured people. The land has been acquired from a railway company, and is now free from mortgage. Mound Bayon is a model township in which the negro has learned and practises a local self-government which he has built up for himself without white intervention. Its founder was born a slave; he is now sixty years of age and full of faith in the future.

A VERY different picture of life in the Southern States is given in last week's Friend. The leasing out of gangs of convict labourers, mostly negroes, is highly profitable to corrupt officials and public bodies, and still continues. Numbers of men are condemned to long periods of hard labour for mere misdemeanours, such as walking on the grass in public parks, and are treated with cruel severity by the overseers in charge of the gangs. It is much to be regretted that public opinion in the Southern communities is still callous enough to permit the continuance of this form of slavery, which is a blot upon the good name of American civilisation. On this painful subject, we have already called attention to the article which appears in the current Nineteenth Century and After, "Peonage in the United States."

AN enormous book of more than 600 pages on the mode of administering the ordinance of baptism has been issued from the Wesleyan publishing house (C. H. Kelly). Thoroughly earnest study devoted to almost any subject under the sun can hardly be entirely in vain; either some forgotten fact will be brought to light, or some general mistake corrected, or at the least some known facts will be newly grouped. But study could hardly deal with a subject less alive, less capable of being revived perhaps, than the old controversy between Baptists and Pædobaptists concerning the mode of baptism.

BISHOP GORE, in urging the duty of the Church in social reform, at Oxford recently, disclaimed any purpose in himself or his fellow Churchmen of the Christian Social Union of capturing anyone for the Church. He was convinced, he said, that labour had to work out its own problems. The Church and the Labour Party must act by different means. The object of the Christian Social Union was to lead Churchmen to know their own position and their own duty. They desired that every Christian community should arouse its own members in the same way, so that they could combine on a common platform when it came to the matter of taking action and bringing influence to bear on society in the social interest. He saw with regard to Socialism that any advance in that direction laid on people a deeper and deeper ethical claim, and made a greater and greater demand on moral character. Their business was to keep that claim on the moral character in view.

LET old men and young alike read the article in last Saturday's Nation on "A League of Age," recently established, with its motto "Old and Bold," and its single precept, "We must grow old, but need not grow nasty." There is no subscription, and women are admitted to membership on equal terms with men. "Had Wordsworth lived into these days," the writer says, "he would have been spared the bathos of a line that mars one of the noblest English poems. If he had known how quick would be the transfer between the attributes of youth and age, he would not have written about the 'years that bring the philosophic mind.' The gain to truth as well as beauty in his glorious Ode would have equalled the pleasure of another half-century of life. Years no longer bring the philosophic mind; rather, they take it away, for it is the young who now philosophise. Or, if ageing minds philosophise at all, they follow the cheerful and concrete schools of fishing, golf, and cabbages."

OUR Leaguer deprecates the needless miseries entailed upon those who have followed Cicero in supposing that the properest human study is to die. He refers to the gloomy terrors which haunted Dr. Johnson "by nature so blithe and venturesome to the last," and to the deliberate Stoicism of Matthew Arnold, who wrote unpleasant things about the meaning of growing old. He in his happier humour turns the other way:—"How much more human is the ordinance in Plato's Laws that old men should be allowed a little wine to make them sing!

How much more divine Spinoza's deduction that the free man's meditation will not be a meditation of death, but of life! It were almost profane to call the Rabbi Ben Ezra jolly; yet, compared to that chilling Stoic, what a merry note he chants from his first lines onward:—

'Grow old along with me!

The best is yet to be,

The last of life for which the first was made.'

ONE more quotation we must be allowed from the Nation article. In his celebration of the "League of Age" the writer says:—

"The average age of high achievement is rising. When he began his essays, Montaigne was still short of forty, yet he writes as though his active career were as necessarily over as a modern Leicester operative's of the same age. He is inclined to think that all the great enterprises of mankind have been accomplished by men under thirty, and he gives as instances that Augustus was supreme judge of the world at nineteen, and Alexander died at thirty-two. But life has now become more secure, the opportunities of genius are distributed over greater length of years, and if Alexander had been permeated with quinine, he might have discovered the other hemisphere, and the United States had now been Hellenic instead of Yankee. Kant was nearly sixty when he shook the theology of ages. Moltke waited till seventy before he won his chiefest glory on the field. Gladstone was seventy-five before he set out upon the noblest and most daring revolution of his life. In all fiction there are but two faultless masculine characters—Don Quixote and Mr. Pickwick—and both are men of mature age. In Mr. Pickwick we see the sunlit benevolence of years, the unlimited tolerance, the imperturbable temper that, when a difficulty arises about hot water, can still exclaim: 'Thank you; cool will do!' That is the lovable temperament which we may suppose the League of Age aims at inculcating by its precept that we must grow old but need not grow nasty."

GRATEFUL memories of many hours of pure delight are recalled by the news of Joachim's death, who passed away on Thursday week, at Berlin, in his seventy-seventh year—memories of the old days of the Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall, when the coming of the Joachim quartette was the great event, and George Eliot and Browning and James Martineau and others, with whom it was a privilege to hear such music, were often there. Joachim was of Jewish parentage, born in Hungary, in 1831. As a boy of thirteen, he paid his first visit and had his first triumph in this country, when he played a Beethoven violin concerto at a Philharmonic concert, which Mendelssohn conducted. That same concerto he played sixty years later in the Queen's Hall, when there was a great demonstration of honour and affection, and, in acknowledging the presentation of his portrait by Mr. Balfour, then Prime Minister, Joachim spoke of England as his second home.

home, but for many years he paid an annual visit to this country, and Oxford and Cambridge had both given him honorary degrees. There was a wonderful charm of simplicity and sincerity about this great violinist, a man of unaffected modesty and noble disposition, a master utterly devoted to his music. "On the music of three great composers," says the writer of an admirable notice of Joachim in this week's Guardian, "his genius shed a special illumination—Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms" (Brahms was his close personal friend). "Mozart is another of the classical composers with whom Joachim's name will always be associated; he played him, even in his old age, with a wonderfully youthful gaiety and light-heartedness, and with never a touch of exaggeration or, still less, affectation. . . . It must be remembered that when he first appeared in public as a Wunderkind, it was his technical proficiency that chiefly impressed his hearers, who saw in him a second Paganini, or Vieuxtemps. No one thinks of him now as a brilliant virtuoso. It was not that his technique was in any way inadequate to meet the most exacting demands made on it. But it was always his servant, not his master; and when he might have astonished an unthinking public with dazzling feats of execution, he set himself instead, with unswerving tenacity of purpose, to the controlled and reverent interpretation of the greatest music."

THE Christian Register of August 1, reports with great regret the resignation of Rev. Charles E. St. John as secretary of the American Unitarian Association. It does not, says the Register, come as a surprise to his more intimate friends and associates. A year ago Mr. St. John's customary good health showed signs of breaking. The directors of the Association gave him leave of absence, and he spent the winter and early spring in the South. This rest and a simple operation to which he submitted after his return have combined to completely restore his health. He is advised, however, that he should not again assume the strenuous labours of the secretaryship. Even Mr. St. John's unusual bodily vigour has suffered from the steady strain, the incessant public speaking, the constant travel, involving sudden changes of climate and diet, which are incident to the office he has held. He has never, until the last year, spared himself, but has been at the service of the churches in season and out of season. He will take with him to whatever new service for our cause may claim him a renewed vigour, a wealth of experience, and the admiration and affection of many friends all over the country. It is understood that his resignation takes effect in September, and that he will at once enter upon a three months' engagement in charge of the pulpit of the First Church in Philadelphia.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

THE late Gaston Frommel was not, perhaps, as widely known outside his own university as some of his other colleagues at Geneva; but he was one of the teachers who had the gift of making a deep impression upon his pupils and friends, and when he died, in 1906, at the early age of forty-two, there was a poignant feeling of great hopes only partially fulfilled. Perhaps his literary executors are a little too anxious for his posthumous fame when they promise us eight or ten volumes from his pen, but the two which have appeared already, "Études littéraires et morales" and "Études morales et religieuses," are full of varied interest. The first of these, which lies before us, contains essays on Pierre Loti, Amiel, Paul Bourget, Edmond Scherer, and Tolstoi, and a long study of Alexandre Vinet as writer and theologian.

In 1848-9 the late William Johnson Fox delivered a course of fifteen lectures on "The Religious Ideas" in South-place Chapel, Finsbury. They have just been re-issued in a cheap form from Essex Hall, with a short biographical introduction. "Readers of the present day," it is said, "will find in these pages some remarkable anticipations of the main principles of that 'New Theology' recently enunciated by the Rev. R. J. Campbell at the City Temple." Whether we agree in all respects with the panegyric of this anonymous writer or not—"Mr. Fox left behind him no orator, either in the pulpit or the senate, possessing his humour, his power of sarcasm, his acquaintance with English literature, his command of polished language, his expressive yet calm delivery, his gentleness—almost as touching as that of woman"—this little volume should be heartily welcomed. It will revive fading memories or restore to a new generation the influence of a teacher too soon forgotten. It is interesting to learn that a full biography of W. J. Fox will be issued shortly. His daughter received the valuable help of the late Dr. Richard Garnett in its compilation.

The following letter, which we take the liberty of inserting in full, has appeared recently:—

LEXICON OF PATRISTIC GREEK.

SIR,—A lexicon of this character has long been a desideratum among theologians. Sophocles' lexicon and Suicer do something, it is true, to supply the need, but neither is anything like exhaustive. An attempt is now being made to supply the need, and competent scholars are being invited to assist in the collection of materials. The idea originated with the Central Society of Sacred Study, and its Warden, Dr. Swete, Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. Members of that society are specially invited to help, but the co-operation of other scholars is also desired, and will be welcomed. Having undertaken to act as editor, I shall be glad to receive communications from any persons who can assist in the work, at 10, Idol-lane, London, E.C. The present idea is to include the Greek Fathers down to A.D. 500, though, if sufficient workers can be found, it might be extended as far as John of Damascus (A.D. 750).

I am, Sir, &c., HENRY A. REDPATH.

Dr. H. A. Redpath, who is so well known for his labours on the Concordance to the Septuagint, is clearly the right editor for this new enterprise. We hope that his appeal for help will meet with a cordial response from many who love knowledge for its own sake too well to shirk slow and unpopular tasks. It would be very creditable to English scholarship if it can do for Patristic Greek what Du Cange accomplished long ago for mediæval Latin.

* * *

It is probably too soon to look for a lexicon of the New Testament which shall embody the new knowledge in regard to Hellenistic Greek which has accumulated so quickly in recent years from the study of inscriptions and papyri. It would be very useful to have this new illustrative material, at present scattered through many volumes, brought together for easy reference. Meanwhile, Cremer and Thayer hold the field for the careful student of idiom and the exact meaning of words.

The Expository Times, edited by Dr. Hastings, is one of the brightest and most useful of the theological magazines. It covers a wide field and appeals to very varied interests. Its point of view is that of scholarly Evangelicalism, and it has succeeded in enlisting the services of a number of thoroughly competent contributors. Thus the present number has articles or comments from Professor Sayce, Principal Iverach of Aberdeen, Professor Moffill, Dr. John Kelman, Professor Nestle of Maulbronn, and the late Professor Friedrich Blass of Halle.

The needs of the busy man who wants to know something briefly and to the point about the best English and foreign books are kept steadily in view. The substance of Professor Deissmann's new book, "New Light on the New Testament from Records of the Græco-Roman Period," appeared originally in the Expository Times, and the last few numbers have contained a series of short articles by the late Professor Blass on the Origin and Character of our Gospels. Occasionally the criticism which appears in its pages seems to us rather trivial in its quality, or quite wrong-headed in its prejudice, but we recognise the great advantage of reading far beyond the limits of our own opinions. Often the mind grows more by intelligent difference than by complacent agreement. All we have a right to ask for is careful work and sincere thinking, and the rigid avoidance of the soft and plausible substitutes for thought and fact which have won for themselves a fatal popularity in some religious circles.

* * *

Another popular magazine, which caters for a very different class of readers, is The Book Monthly, which contains, usually, a great deal of pleasant chat about new books and literary bric-à-brac. It has made a special feature recently of the portraits of popular writers. Its literary criticism need not be taken seriously. It follows popular taste instead of guiding it, and is written too much in the style of a high-flown trade advertisement. But its classified list of new books, new editions, and reprints is distinctly useful; and, for the rest, we all have our moods when gossip is harmless and amusing. Moreover, to the discriminating, literary gossip has a fine flavour of its own.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNALS.

THE International Journal of Ethics opens with an interesting article by Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, of Reading, on "The Relation of Theological Dogma to Religion." The writer appears to have been much influenced by Dr. McTaggart's recent work, "Some Dogmas of Religion"; and he accordingly reaches the conclusion that all theological dogmas, such as a Personal God, Free Will, and Immortality are losing their hold on considerable numbers of competent students of religion, and are on their way to that nirvāna in which they "will finally disappear." While Mr. Shrubsole argues that there is no necessary connection between vital religion and any theological dogmas, he still holds, with Dr. McTaggart, that religious belief does require for its basis some metaphysical principle. What the principle is on which he thinks religion will finally rest is not very clearly stated. In the earlier part of the paper it seems to be "the feeling that the world is good as a whole, good enough at least for us to continue to live in it; good enough, also, to have maintained its existence." We are told, however, that "it is well we should not think too highly of the world, for we need to regard it as improvable in order to call forth our energy to the task of endeavouring to make it better." But what the author really regards as the basal fact which gives reality and vitality to religion is the sentiment of love for other persons. He quotes with approval from Dr. McTaggart: "Love will not cease, there are other persons to love; and the non-existence of God would leave it as possible as it was before that love should be the central fact of all reality." "We were told," says Mr. Shrubsole, "on high authority that love to God and our neighbour comprehended the spirit of the Jewish religion. We enlarge that idea by turning it into love of the all. . . . The reality is thus still left to us when the illusions have faded. Religion is left, and religion, as here understood, is the most potent and most beautiful thing in the world." Mr. Shrubsole's fundamental principle of religion appears on the surface to be akin to, if not identical with, the basal religious idea which Jesus expressed in the words: "God is Love." But the crucial question is, does our author regard love as Jesus did, i.e., as a metaphysical reality which is partially manifested in the sentiment which we feel towards persons, but which is itself self-existent and eternal, and would therefore remain if the persons, in whom it is at present in a measure revealed, were to cease to exist?

If love is "the central fact of all reality," it would seem that it is necessarily antecedent to all finite persons, that it is, in truth, the basal creative principle in which the world of things and persons has its origin. If it is so regarded, it does not seem possible to deny to it the attribute of self-consciousness, seeing that out of it all self-conscious persons arise. It may, indeed, be super-personal; but that which is higher than our conception of personality must, at least, contain all that is most vital and excellent in personality. If Mr. Shrubsole were to develop his idea of the basal reality of the universe in this direction, he would, we venture to think, reach the conclusion that some theological dogma is essential to all real religion.

After a good paper by Professor Sorley on "The Ethical Aspects of Economics," and another, equally good, on the question: "Has Sociology a Moral Basis?" we reach a very original and important paper on "The Ought and Reality," by Professor John E. Boodin, of the University of Kansas. Professor Boodin's aim is to show that a teleological and ethical purpose must run through and finally dominate all evolution and all history. There is an "Eternal Ought," a principle of absolute direction—which sets a limit to possible divergences from the real purpose of the universe. This is a paper which demands, and will, we think, repay careful study. The following passage will perhaps give some idea of its leading conception:—"The ethical process of the universe cannot be like the Buddhist Karma, for if life is simply the causal result of what precedes, there can be no attainment of an ideal; there can be neither good nor bad, but simply the automatic record of the cumulative result. Life must remain imprisoned in the iron grasp of the past. No: causality itself must be relative. There must be some fluency in the process. But most of all the ethical criterion itself must not be simply a product of the past, but an independent variable, in order that it may pass upon causality and flux alike. The Karma admits of no salvation, no waking-up from the evil nightmare. The horrible dream must go on. The faith in an absolute direction furnishes a sufficient guarantee for our ideal striving. This is not a mere Utopian or laissez faire optimism. There is real evil in the world, real maladjustments, false view points. But, though the wicked flourish like a green bay tree, their type shall not prevail. The servant of Jehovah shall eventually triumph, though, perhaps, through labour and suffering. Only the just state can maintain itself. . . . The divine direction of history will see to it, in the struggle of ideals, that the superficial and ephemeral are eliminated. Thus man can labour and wait with confidence as regards the final outcome. And if he is made of the right stuff he will be willing to have his ideals, yea, even himself, eliminated, if unworthy to survive."

Another paper in this excellent number calls for special mention. In it Mr. Harrold Johnson writes on "Some Essentials of Moral Education." Moral education, he points out, must not be conceived as too specifically moral. We must live resolutely, not only in the good, narrowly conceived, but in the beautiful and in the true; in short, our only sanity is discoverable in living in the whole. Particularly interesting and valuable are Mr. Johnson's remarks on the vital and essential connection between moral and religious education. "Moral education, without vista, is no education at all; it is truncated pedantry. Moral education only then begins to exercise its more potent ministry when it confronts and astounds and overwhelms us with categorical imperatives, whose origins are wrapped in mystery, but whose obligatoriness upon us for this very reason is immediate and certain, and bows us in submission and awe. . . . The moral education that inspires a due sense of wonder, reverence, and awe in the contemplation of this mysterious and vast universe of being, and a disinterested passion for the service of our kind, is alone adequate to the ends of human life." With profound truth, then, does Mr. Johnson say in conclusion: "We are only now, at length, beginning to recognise the moral significance of the common school, the sacred apostolate of the teacher, and to realise that he, or she, who ministers behind the teacher's desk stands on consecrated ground."

We have left ourselves but little room to refer to the contents of the July number of Mind. We can only say that the four articles which constitute the greater part of the number well sustain the high reputation of Mind as the leading review of current philosophical thought. Those who are interested in the battle which is now being vehemently waged between Oxford Intellectualism and Pragmatism will find the latter most ably defended in a long article by Professor Dewey on "Reality and the Criterion for Truth of Ideas"; and in a brilliant paper by Dr. F. C. S. Schiller on "Mr. Bradley's Theory of Truth." Among the critical notices the most important are that by Dr. H. R. Mackintosh of Höfding's "Philosophy of Religion" and that by Professor A. E. Taylor of Mr. Sturt's "Idola Theatri."

STOIC AND CHRISTIAN.*

MR. ALSTON in his little work on Stoic and Christian thought in the second century has made a distinct contribution to a subject of more than ordinary interest. Most students are agreed that Stoicism above all other influences paved the way for the spread of Christianity in the Roman Empire, and that though they were unconscious of it, many of the later Stoics held a conception of the universe and of man's place in it very similar to that which characterised the Christian. Dean Farrar, Matthew Arnold, and others have, perhaps, over-emphasised this fact, and in one aspect Mr. Alston's book is a corrective of this tendency towards over-identification.

The title is somewhat too general to indicate the true range of the present work. Mr. Alston gives us a study of one Stoic only, and a comparison of his teaching with that of the second century Christians. This is Marcus Aurelius, whom he has fitly described as "the latest of first-class thinkers to whom Christianity is only a vague name." From this narrowing of the scope of the book springs a certain defect. Marcus Aurelius has a place in a great philosophical movement, and he needs to be interpreted in the light of that movement. Mr. Alston is too much inclined to interpret the movement in the light of Marcus Aurelius. The reader needs to beware of regarding the Roman Emperor's opinions as always characteristically Stoic—especially if some of Mr. Alston's interpretations be correct. Many contrasts with early Christian teaching can be drawn from Marcus Aurelius which could not be drawn from Seneca or Epictetus.

The author has a strong sense of these contrasts, and he develops them in an illuminating and closely reasoned manner. One or two may be referred to here:—

(a) Marcus Aurelius thinks of the guiding central force of the universe as "Impersonal Reason," the early Christians as a "Personal Will." The author writes: "Despite occasional utterances in the contrary sense, Marcus Aurelius's God is not normally thought of as a personal God." This could hardly be asserted as regards Epictetus. The Stoics varied in their sense of the personality of the guiding power of the world. If this was, on the whole, weak in Marcus Aurelius, it nevertheless remains true of him that "the presence of Design is assumed in all his statements," as Mr. Alston admits. So that the concept of personality may often have been nearer to his mind than now to us appears. In comparing any Stoic with the second century Christian writers one has also to bear in mind the difference between a philosophical or semi-philosophical treatise and an epistle or manual written by a religious enthusiast. Similar fundamental thoughts and feelings will find very dissimilar forms of expression.

(b) Marcus Aurelius's teaching concerning the relation of man to man falls short of the Christian conception of "brotherhood" and the ideal of Christian love. This also is held in the present work to be characteristic of Stoicism in general. Although this view has considerable authoritative support, it is greatly open to criticism. The statement that a "sense of dignity rather than an enthusiasm for humanity" is the controlling element in the philosophic system of Marcus Aurelius will be considered by many as extreme. Marcus Aurelius as a true Stoic teaches that the end of the individual and of the social whole is one, and that the individual finds his life through serving the common interest. Of course it is open for the critic to say that thus mankind becomes simply the medium through which the individual may fulfil his proper function. But the same might with equally good reason be alleged against Christian teaching, and the inference be drawn that the Christian "finds the centre of his ethical system within him." It is all a question of the way to interpret the truth. "He that loseth his life shall find it." Stoic and Christian held that truth. Why emphasise the "find" when interpreting Stoic thought, and the "lose" when interpreting Christian? The attempt to water down Stoic "love" into a kind of refined selfishness that the Christian teaching may be glorified by contrast ought to be abandoned with all the sophistries attendant on the process.

(c) The point at which Christianity really presents a vital contrast with Stoicism is dealt with, and dealt with finely in the last chapter. "Christianity is much more than a philosophic framework for the conduct of life." To quote again—"It is not a system put together synthetically from a selection of concepts and syllogisms, but the vision of a fuller life, based upon what is perceived of a personality deemed Divine." We agree with Mr. Alston. Here lay the secret of the power of Christianity. Here was the treasure which Stoicism had not, and could not, therefore, give to the world—the inspiration of the personality of Christ.

THE LEIDEN TRANSLATION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

In the year 1900 a great work was completed in the publication at Leiden of a new translation into Dutch of the Old Testament. The authorised version in Holland was that determined upon by the Synod of Dort, 1618-1619, and completed in 1637. It was made from an imperfect text, and, like our own version of 1611, was greatly in need of revision. The scholars who completed this work were Dr. A. Kuenen, Dr. I. Hooykaas, Dr. W. H. Kusters, and Dr. H. Oort. They prepared a critical text and translated it into modern Dutch, and so issued the Old Testament with introductions and notes to the several books.

So masterly was this work by the leading Old Testament scholars of Holland that a strong desire soon made itself felt to bring it within reach of the general public of thoughtful readers. Apart from the difficulty of price, there was much in the introductions of technical scholarship which only the trained student could appreciate, and there was clearly room for a popular edition, which with the new translation should embody the results of the introductions and the notes in a form suited to the general reader, and at a price which would ensure a wide circulation.

This has now been accomplished. Of the original translators and editors only Dr. Oort remains, and the issue of this popular edition, which was undertaken by the Rev. I. Hooykaas, of Amersfoort, a son of another of the original four, has had the advantage of his supervision. The publication began two years ago in monthly parts, and is now completed: "Het Oude Testament naar de Leidsche Vertaling, met verkorte Inleidingen en Toelichtingen, bewerkt door I. Hooykaas, Predikant te Amersfoort. Onder toezicht van Prof. H. Oort. Leiden: Boekhandel en Drukkerij voorheen E. J. Brill. f. 6 (10s.)."

Professor Oort has devoted an immense amount of patient labour to this popularising of a work which for years he has had very much at heart, and both he and Mr. Hooykaas are to be warmly congratulated on the completion of their task. To the work of revision Professor Oort has added in the general introduction a brief sketch of the history of Israel throughout the centuries covered by the books of the Old Testament, which is a great help in setting the literature in its true light, a sketch to which many details are added in the several introductions which follow throughout the volume. Those of our readers who understand Dutch will be thankful to possess so admirable an aid to the intelligent reading of the Old Testament.

AN edition of the works of William Dunbar just issued from the Cambridge University Press serves to remind us that they are not extensively read, and that the poet is to the general reader little more than, if as much as, a literary name. For this neglect there are intelligible reasons: the indisposition of readers towards writings which have not been transferred into a modernized form; the difficulty of ready acquaintance with language which has largely passed out of common speech; and what is perhaps the chief, as we consider Dunbar's relation to the national stock, the unrivalled popularity of Burns.

On this last point a word may be urged. While the popularity of any writer necessarily enters into the literary estimate of him, the grounds of this popularity may be very distinct from those on which a purely literary appreciation is to be made. The great reputation of Burns does not rest wholly, if indeed it may be said to rest chiefly, upon his writings. It depends, at present at least, very largely upon what seems to us a somewhat effusive reverence for his personality. He has become almost exclusively identified with a national temper, which enhances his fame beyond discrimination, and obscures a definite estimate of his intrinsic literary value; he has become the accepted commentary on a national life, a Bible of his people. The misfortune is that this exaltation should involve the oversight and unwarrantable neglect of others. So Dunbar has suffered. But, in any effort to win for him adequate recognition, it may be maintained for him, customarily regarded as the greatest Scottish poet after Burns, that in literary execution he is more than the equal of Burns, and not less in the scope of his fancy or the variety of his manner.

We have no valid argument, however, to bring against the position in which Burns has become enthroned in the hearts of his countrymen. The matter is purely for them. It is sufficient to say that he does not, as, notwithstanding his humanitarianism, he cannot appeal to others in the same manner or with the same force. But Dunbar can. This fact removes him both from Burns and from the rest of estimable poets who are to be regarded as distinctively Scottish. Indeed, we conform to the opinion which refuses to designate him Scottish in any strict sense, and places him, on most counts, purely and simply with the Chaucerians. This is to make him—and by no means against the character of his language—English, or, if we may use the modern term of courtesy, virtually inadequate in this connection, British.

The great value of Dunbar, apart from the general interest of his work, lies in the fact that he is the most effective literary link between the pre- and post-Chaucerian periods, far more effective than any writer in the direct English line. He has, morally and humanly speaking, the blemishes and the virtues of both; he has, too, the fine æsthetic sense, discovered in the passionate observation of nature, which marks all great verse from Chaucer's downwards. In uniting these periods Dunbar, as a literary artist, gives us the cream of alliterative verse and some of our finest examples of more definitely accented and rimed verse. Nor in this respect should he appeal to the specialist and student only, but also to the common lover of poetry in its great and distinctive expressions.

"Few have possessed a more masculine genius, and his work was as varied in its range as it was original," says Dr. Stopford Brooke, and to this extensive appreciation we add our own less significant word of praise. The work of Dunbar is vigorous in all its ranges: he excels at the extremes of the satire and the lyric—for as the latter, we think some of his shortest pieces may be regarded. The customary illustrations of his genius may be used: the delicately fanciful and allegorical The Thrissill and the Rois and The Goldin Terge, and the wilder, very adequately rugged, Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis. But these alone, although it may be reasonable to limit the space of an anthology to them, by no means fairly represent Dunbar. Such pieces as his Dirige to the King at Stirling, the more satirical verses, and homely poems like Best to be Blyth must be used. There are, indeed, very few of his hundred pieces of which the quality is not distinctive and to which the reader, if he have patience proper to his subject, may not turn for good refreshment and delight.

The edition which has occasioned these observations was needed, if only because of its handy form, and Dr. H. Bellyse Baildon has done his work thoroughly. Besides giving us a text based upon a close comparison of MSS. and standard editions, and not a few valuable corrections and emendations, he supplies extensive notes, a complete glossary, and an introductory essay on the life, language, grammar, and versification of Dunbar which should be of service to all readers. His specific object has been "to bring the works of the great Scottish poet within easy reach of all serious students and lovers of what is best in our literature." We believe he has been successful beyond this object: that he has produced an edition which will find for Dunbar the acquaintance of many who have entirely neglected him.

W. C. HALL.

WE notice a timely protest in the Daily News from Mr. Chiozza Money, M.P., against the philanthropic sweating of labour. The particular instance which has called out this protest is that of a factory at Hoxton, recently inaugurated by the Lord Mayor, for the employment of crippled girls "on a commercial basis," at from 3s. to 5s. a week. The factory appears to have the support of the Ragged School Union and other philanthropic bodies. Mr. Money calls attention to the grave danger of this successful form of exploitation of pauper labour, and its necessary effect in further reducing the wages of women. He goes on to quote an example of the same insidious evil in another field; where a joinery works is being successfully run by "a well-known religious institution" upon a similar basis, the wages amounting to about 11s. a week.

OBITUARY.

ALFRED DUGDALE.

MR. DUGDALE, who passed away on August 12, having reached the ripe age of 70 years, was one of the most active and whole-hearted of our Manchester friends. In religion and politics alike he took a keen interest, always inclining naturally to the progressive side. As a young man he attended the ministrations of the late Dr. J. R. Beard at Strangeways, and his last public appearance was at the unveiling of Dr. Beard's portrait at Summerville, when he recalled some of his old associations. Mr. Dugdale had travelled widely in Europe, and had also resided for some years in Egypt. To the last he retained an interest in Egyptian affairs and a mastery of the Arabic language. A man of a kindly, cheerful spirit, he lived his faith in the brotherhood of man, and the circle of his friends was a very large one. He will be much missed at the Upper Brook-street Free Church, where he was a most devoted worker, as also in many fields of social reform, but most of all in the domestic and social circles which his happy smile and open hospitality always adorned.

A large number of friends gathered at the Crematorium, including, in addition to members of the family, the Revs. C. Peach, J. A. Pearson, G. A. Payne, and Councillors H. Marsden, J.P., W. Drinkwater, and J. Mather.

MR. F. T. JONES.

THE congregation of Llwynrhadowen mourn the loss of Mr. F. Tyssul Jones, the second son of the late John Jones, Registrar of the Swansea County Court, and of Mrs. Jones, of Gellifahren, Llandyssul, who has passed away in his thirtieth year. Mr. Jones was educated at Llandovery College, and was intended for the law, but ill-health led him to a country life, and he was deeply interested in progressive agriculture. He was president of the Llandyssul Co-operative and Clettwr Vale Agricultural Societies, and represented his parish on the Rural District Council. With other members of his family, he was a devoted member of the Llwyn congregation, to which his great-grandfather the Rev. David Davis, of Castle Howel, ministered for so many years. The respect in which Mr. Jones was held was shown by the great gathering at the funeral service in the chapel on August 16, conducted by the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, the present minister.

THE Rev. John Hunter, D.D., who is to preach the sermon at the International Congress of Religious Liberals in Boston, sails from Liverpool on the second Tuesday in September. Dr. Hunter is to be back in Glasgow for the fourth Sunday in October. On four of the six Sundays while he is away the Rev. Stopford Brooke is to preach in Trinity Church.

SCARCELY need the child know that he has a soul: it is ours to take care that, when at length he finds it, it shall be a noble and august discovery.—Martineau.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HOLIDAY WITH GRANDFATHER.

IV.

FRED and Susie were awakened on the morning after their arrival by the cheerful bark of Cholly, who, as soon as he was let into the house from his sentry-box in the yard by Mrs. Simpson, at once ran upstairs to grandfather's room door to inform him, in dog language, that it was time to get up and set about the business of the day. For grandfather, though quite an old man, was a very busy one, finding plenty of employment either in the garden or in the house. He was just the sort of old man whom young folk like—a man of hobbies. And because of the joy and keen interest which these hobbies brought him, his spirit seemed always young. He was like a child in his delight with all beautiful things in nature. He loved the plants and flowers in his garden almost as if they were his children, and sometimes, when no one was near to laugh at him, he would talk to the flowers as if they could understand him. But he did not talk silliness to them. He asked them questions about themselves, and many a time they, though they had no voice or tongue with which to reply audibly, yet by some sign would give him the answer he looked for but did not listen for.

Perhaps you, being a very wise and superior-minded boy or girl, who read this, may be inclined to think it silly of the old man to ask plants questions in words, which, of course, not one of them could hear or understand; but I who write this can assure you that it is a help in nature study just to put what one is wondering about into words, and often it happens that no sooner is the question fairly asked than the answer suggests itself. But all this is rather dry!

No sooner did grandfather hear Cholly's bark than he rose and dressed, and then knocked at the doors of Fred's and Susie's rooms to tell them it was time to get up. But instead of the sleepy grunt and yawn which he expected, he found that each of them had been as quick as himself, so that instead of sitting down to breakfast at once, there was time for half an hour's stroll in the garden.

Such a wonderful garden it was! I wish I had time to tell you the history of grandfather's garden; how, many years ago, he had bought the cottage and the field in front of it, which sloped irregularly down to a tiny brooklet of clear water, and how, year by year, ever since, he had been busy, converting the rough sloping field into the bonniest garden in the whole countryside. In truth, it was a most wonderful garden, not laid out with formal beds and borders, but irregularly, a garden just packed full of delightful surprises, a sort of little world all to itself. Quite near to the house was a lawn of smooth grass, not big enough for lawn tennis. Only the middle of the lawn, however, was mown close, the rest, together with a mossy bank on one side, was allowed to grow as it liked, and was only cut down late in July or early in August, after the snowdrops, crocuses, tulips, narcissus bulbs, and fritillary plants which had kept up a succession of bright blooms pushing up through the grass from February to the end of June, had quite finished their glorious spring song of praise. But what grandfather loved even better than these showy, cultivated plants were the hosts of rare wild meadow plants that flourished in the uncut part of the lawn; for whenever in his travels he found a rare or beautiful or specially interesting wild plant, he took the greatest delight in securing a root or some of the seed of it, and this he most carefully planted in the wild part of his lawn. In this way he was continually reminded of the charming places he had visited by seeing, day by day, all through the spring and early summer, the sweet faces of the flowers of plants that had been brought from other parts of England, Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, or perhaps even from France, Germany, Switzerland, or Italy.

On the side of the lawn furthest from the house was a narrow path, on the other side of which there was a rather steep slope, and here grandfather had made a rockery as a home for all sorts of rock and mountain loving plants. Here there was a brave show of gentians, sedums, rock cistus, saxifrages, and edelweiss, along with a host of others of which I have no time to tell, and of many I do not even know the names.

A flight of steps, and a curving path sloped down through the rockery to a wide border full of all sorts of tall plants that came up every year—columbines, foxgloves, larkspurs, phloxes, gladioli, hollyhocks, and evening primrose, along with others, such as cactus dahlias and giant sunflowers, sweet peas, and poppies, planted in due season each spring. Many of these big flowering plants were in their summer glory at the time of the children's visit to grandfather, and as the blaze of bright colour, backed up by the dark green of a shrubbery of rhododendrons, came in sight Fred and Susie cried out with surprise and delight. Their ejaculations pleased the old man, who was never so gratified as when his beloved garden was heartily appreciated.

It was noted that Cholly also was becoming quite excited for so staid a dog as he had the reputation of being. He ran to and fro, and kept barking invitations to the children to follow him.

"He is telling you that he knows of something a hundred times better worth your attention than all the flowers in the garden," said grandfather; but exactly what it was that he wanted to show them I must defer to next week, for, greatly to Cholly's disappointment, they were recalled to the house by hearing Mrs. Simpson ringing the breakfast bell—a pleasant sound, which even Cholly himself found it impossible to resist. So they all trooped back, delighted with their morning stroll in grandfather's garden.

THOMAS ROBINSON.

DR. M. J. SAVAGE, we learn from the Christian Register, has returned home after his visit with Mrs. Savage and Mrs. Simons to this country, having landed in Boston again on Thursday, Aug. 1. Dr. Savage, we regret to say, has not found the relief for which he hoped, and on landing returned immediately to a sanatorium in care of a physician. His hope of ultimate recovery, in which his friends on both sides of the Atlantic will earnestly join, is still undaunted.

LONDON, AUGUST 24, 1907.

A WORK OF COMPASSION AND BENEFICENCE.

We are glad to publish this week Miss DENDY's renewed appeal for the Sandlebridge Colony for feeble-minded children. It is not only a piece of work most admirable in itself, but, like Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD's Vacation School at the PASSMORE EDWARDS Settlement in Tavistock-place, it is an object-lesson deserving of the serious attention of the whole country.

The eighth annual report of the "Incorporated Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-Minded," of which Miss DENDY is one of the honorary secretaries, was presented to the annual meeting last October, and brings the record up to that date. Miss DENDY's letter tells of further progress, for whereas the total number of boys and girls in the Colony was, in October, 1905, fifty-seven, and in October, 1906, eighty-six, there are now 120, and Miss DENDY describes the profitable and delightful use to which the grounds of Warford Hall are increasingly put.

The report tells of one of the forty-five boys having been discharged as having ceased to be feeble-minded, but that is quite exceptional, and what has to be expected is that the children, as they grow up, though made increasingly useful, and therefore happy, in the Colony, must find there a permanent home, and thus be saved from the evils to which they would inevitably fall victims if left uncared for out in the world. This fact emphasises the serious financial responsibility of the undertaking. While the children are in school, Government grants help towards their maintenance, but afterwards, it will be seen, as the report says, "that as our children grow up and we can no longer draw grants for them from any public source, it becomes increasingly necessary to ask the support of all those who are interested in our work. We are glad to say that the number of our subscribers does increase every year, but hardly, perhaps, in proportion to our increased responsibilities. The boys and girls have both done remunerative work during the year, but we cannot too earnestly impress upon the public that they can never become wholly self-supporting."

Over ninety authorities, the report states, have now applied to the society to admit children. "It is obvious that it is impossible for any one association to meet the need that is so pressing, and we welcome the formation of the North-Eastern Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-Minded.

"Your secretaries still have many applications from parents and guardians who wish to make provision for defective children. So many of the cases for which help is asked are idiots and imbeciles, that this is a very sad part of the work. There is no proper provision now for these cases other than in the workhouse, except where a Board of Guardians has an asylum of its own. No one can be compelled to take charge of them except the Poor Law Authorities, and it is much to be hoped that adequate provision may soon be made for those who cannot be admitted to schools for children who are merely feeble-minded. We shall not be satisfied until all England is able to obtain suitable accommodation for the weak in intellect. The Royal Commission has not yet reported; we hope that when it does increased facilities may be given for taking care of those most unfortunate and most harmful members of society. In the meantime, we urge all who are interested to spare no trouble to make their work on behalf of the feeble-minded efficient and permanent. We feel that our experiment is showing that it need not be excessively costly, and we are sure that everyone who considers the matter will agree that the money expended in looking after these poor folk and enabling them to live a satisfactory and wholesome life, is far better employed than if it had been spent in relieving them as paupers, or keeping them as criminals."

The account of the progress made by the children under the thoughtful care they receive is delightful reading. A few months in the school makes a marked difference. "Head-work," the report says, "is generally beyond them, though all are given a chance of developing their mental capacities. It is from the progress they make in learning to use their hands that most is to be hoped. Household work which can be done in school is utilised as a training for hand and eye, and the children's lessons are actually of practical use to themselves and other people. Singing is, as always with these children, a great delight, and all kinds of bodily exercise give them pleasure."

Of the boys who are out of the schoolroom it is further said that they are happy and settled. "They improve in every way, and, as they grow older, become increasingly useful. Five of them are now working on the farm and seven in the garden. It is, of course, necessary to study the individual character and tastes of each lad; it is not always that the right thing is hit upon just at first, but when we find the occupation that is congenial to a boy's fancy and suitable to his strength, he gives very little more trouble."

So it is also with the girls, and the report pays a high tribute to the unwearied patience and devoted care given by the teachers and other helpers in the Colony to the children under their care.

No one who reads this report and Miss DENDY's letter, or, better still, who should go to Sandlebridge and see what is going on there, is likely to have any doubt that her appeal is deserving of the amplest response.

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

THE INCORPORATED LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE SOCIETY FOR THE PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

SIR,—About once in every year you allow me to put before your kind readers the needs and hopes of our Colony at Sandlebridge for weak-minded children. Much substantial help has come to us through your columns. I am about once more to ask the assistance of those who have helped us in the past, for, so far as I can see, our requirements will increase as fast as our work, and that is very fast indeed. We seem to be perpetually in the condition of a child who has outgrown his clothes before his parents can afford to buy him new ones.

It may be remembered by those of your readers who have been interested in our work, that a year and a half ago we purchased an estate, known as the Warford Hall estate, close to our original houses. We are paying for this in annual sums, and it is a heavy tax upon our resources to meet these payments. But we could not have done without the estate. We are making use of every bit of the land attached to the Hall, and it is finding profitable employment for a large number of our big boys. This spring we sent nearly nine thousand pot-plants into Manchester for sale to children in the elementary schools, who will have exhibitions and prizes for the best-grown plants in the autumn. This is a scheme which has taken great hold in Manchester, and we could have readily sold twice the number of plants. We hope to supply eighteen thousand next spring. It is a pretty sight to see my boys at this work. Even one who could do nothing else could place the filled pots on the trays in readiness for packing on the luries. Some of them have become very expert at the work. Of course, there is much else for them to do in the gardens and the green-houses, and the head-gardener is always in want of more labour. We have a stall in the market of a neighbouring town, and the boys take a great deal of pride in our weekly sales. They fully purpose paying off the debt on the Hall by their own exertions! Others of the lads are employed on the farm, and are very proud and pleased to be busy with the horses and the cattle. Meantime, our big girls are engaged in house-work, and more especially in doing all the laundry work of the little colony. As we have now 120 boys and girls, and a resident staff of sixteen, this is no light matter, but, with the help of two women, the girls manage it.

It is for the girls that I would put in a special plea now. We ought to make arrangements for the older ones to be separated from the younger ones, and shall do it, just as soon as we can afford to have the drainage at the Hall attended to and to make some structural alterations which are necessary before we take it into occupation. The laundry has been made out of one of the buildings in the Hall grounds, and it would be a great gain in every way to have the girls at the Hall. They would be close to their work, and they could be dealt with more satisfactorily than they can whilst they are with the little ones. But we need six or seven hundred pounds for the express purpose of putting the Hall in order and furnishing it. We did need another five hundred, to extend the building in which the children have their lessons, but our treasurer has given us that.

We are in every way most economical; but the pressure put upon us to go on with our work is great; in fact, we must go on. No one who sees our children, big and little, and who realises what they would be if left to themselves in the world, has any doubt of that, and I now ask very earnestly, Will anybody help us again? Indeed the need for help for our growing up girls is very pressing. I know there are many amongst your readers who understand how pressing it must be, and how sad it would be for them were they not in our care.

I enclose to you a copy of the last report of H.M.I. that you may see that we are doing our work satisfactorily. I also send you a copy of our last annual report, just to put you in mind of the scope of our work.

MARY DENDY,
Hon. Sec.

13, Clarence-road, Withington,
Manchester, August 16, 1907.

The following is a copy of the report made by H.M.I. Dr. Eichholz, and Mr. E. T. Howard, after visit of April 25, 1907.

Great Warford Sandlebridge Home Special School, No. 2,9021.

"The completion of the new residential home has helped greatly to simplify and improve the domestic organisation. The new house is admirably planned, built, and equipped. With the continued growth of the Colony further opportunities arise, year by year, for completing the development of the children. The school training is most satisfactory, the children are well clothed and otherwise exceedingly well cared for and happy. In many cases pupils have been transferred to technical classes on the Colony estate and homes as the natural outcome of the school-course. It is to be hoped that this development will continue."

A RELIGIOUS FAITH FOR TO-DAY.

III.—THE ILLUSION AND LIBERATION OF THE SELF.

It is strange that man should have gone wrong if, in any real and effective sense, the Divine Spirit dwells within him. The human race, we think, ought not to have failed in virtue or in happiness, God being immanent and all-pervasive there. This objection has been urged often enough; and it must occur to every candid mind when, hearing this doctrine of philosophic idealism proclaimed, it contemplates the crimes and the cruelties and the miseries of mankind. We have perhaps somewhat hastily concluded that the human race is a failure, in respect of virtue or of happiness—that Man has gone wrong, on the great highways of progress. Men have gone wrong, and have accused themselves and one another of great transgressions; and whole nations have collapsed and perished under the weight of accumulated crimes and follies. But the race, it may be contended, still advances, and something is always being won from the sad experience and saved from the wreck of national or individual disaster. The ways of evolution are long, and the methods strange, but the victory is not to the demons yet, however they may boast and strut abroad, sometimes in human form.

Nevertheless, the problem of human sin, or, as we sometimes call it, human guilt, confronts us, and we may not lightly put it aside. It faced the thinkers and poets among men in very early times. The legend of a tree planted in Eden, the fruit whereof, when tasted, brought the knowledge of good and evil, is evidence that the problem had already emerged. That tree was not planted in jest, or as an arbitrary contrivance whereby to limit the free activities of the human creature. Observe, it was the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; and in that bold metaphor a profound ethical principle found expression in that remote age. The knowledge of good and of evil is one—is the fruit of the same tree. That is to say, in order to know the good, in a moral sense, man must know the evil too. And how otherwise could he know? It was only through consciousness of imperfection—the feeling of having done less than the highest right—that he could rise from simple animal innocency to something greater and nobler as an ideal. And this, surely, is the significance of that astonishing saying of Jesus: "There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety and nine just persons who need (or think they need) no repentance."

What then is sin? What is it that lies behind or within the sense of having done wrong? The act itself, let us say, was a deliberate personal choice of some baser form of conduct when a higher and nobler was open to us; it was a falling away from our own ideal. Now, if any one will think or feel his way back to the source or impulse of that lower choice, I believe he will always find it to be what, for want of a better phrase, I must call the illusion of the self. It is just a mistaken idea concerning that particular being called oneself. It may be also a mistaken idea about other selves—probably it is. But further back, at the bottom of it all, is the mistaken idea about oneself. And this illusion of the self is, in one sense, a very natural thing at a certain stage of growing life. It comes of the feeling that one exists somehow apart from others, having rights and claims of one's own that others do not share—that may be antagonistic to theirs; it is the idea that one is, ultimately, a distinct and separate creature, not a social, fellowly creature.

Let any one who has, e.g., spoken harsh and bitter words to another—words that cut and wound, and of which, afterwards, he is ashamed—let him ask why he spoke those words. He will find, I think, that it was because the self within him was offended by the self in another; it was because the self within him was, in some way, just then, alien to the self in the other. And that is an illusion—very real at the time, and very natural at a given stage of development, yet still an illusion. So with an act of theft; it may be that of a pickpocket or a burglar; it may be that of a workman who robs his employer by scamping work, or that of an employer who robs his workman by what is called "sweating." Why does a man steal from another? Because he thinks of himself as in opposition or antagonism to that other, as having interests which are alien to that other. He thinks he gains something for himself by that other's loss. "If," he says, "I can transfer a little of that man's property from his possession to mine, I shall be better off, and he will be worse off." That is an illusion—a very natural one, so natural and so common, that you may think it must be a reality. But it is a fiction or phantasm of the brain. And if the intending thief could perceive the deeper reality—the essential unity of all beings, by reason of their oneness with the whole—if he could escape from the delusion of a separate self into the world of social fellowship and love, he would not steal. He would know that an act of injustice wrongs the doer more than it wrongs the sufferer, that it flings him, for the moment, out of the social order, excommunicates him, in fact—cuts him off from the joy and the sweetness of real life.

It is so, I believe, with all "sin." It is so in relation to that wrong which we all sometimes commit against the great order of things—"sin against God," as the theologian would call it. When we rebel against the inevitable—when we are angry with the weather, impatient under suffering, or offended with death, we are setting the self against the Universe; we are pitting the individual self-will against the Eternal Purpose; we are denying the right of the Power which gave us being to deal with us as it seems good to that Power. This, too, comes of illusion. If we realised that we are a part of the Great Life of all, that the self in us is a vital element in the Infinite Self, then to say, "Not my will but thine be done," would be as natural as to breathe the air or to love the beauty of the morning.

But now, Why this illusion? If the Divine is in the human, as well as above and beyond it—if God is in every man—whence this mistaken idea about the self? Was it really a quite necessary stage in the unfolding purpose of things, not to be omitted without loss?

It is good sometimes to note the several stages of the great life-process as they pass before us here. Emerging from what, to us, seems the unconscious life of solid or gaseous matter, there is first the semi-conscious life of plants; then the more fully conscious life of animals; then the self-conscious life of men; then the unfolding of that into what we call the social consciousness, the sense of fellowship with the others which is the beginning of "civilisation," the feeling of brotherhood, the all-embracing charity which makes us "patriots of the world"; and then, finally, the cosmic consciousness—the sense of being one with the Eternal Spirit of all, the peace which passeth understanding, the joy or blessedness of harmony with God. And these stages of existence, nowhere sharply defined, everywhere merging into one another, we may discern as part of the great Life-purpose, though few perhaps have known, and they but in rare moments, the last and highest stage. And in this large unfolding process the selfish or egoistic period could not be omitted. And it is just there that most human beings seem to be, even now. The illusion of the self, as a separate and unsocial thing, darkens the mind and contracts the life of so many of us; and the evil state of society around us is the result of that illusion.

But, folded deep within the most selfish self, slumbers the divine child—the immortal and eternal self—and all the remorse and sorrow of wrong-doing, all the contrition and repentance of our restless and discontented hearts, all the longing and the struggle to rise into higher, freer life, are the signs of its awakening there. The moral miseries which so sorely afflict us are the pangs of that new birth by which we are escaping from the narrow prison-house of self; and as we come out into the larger world of love and fellowship we are filled with the wonder and joy of a great deliverance.

Thus, then, may we pass from the illusion to the liberation of the self. It is the old story of "dying to live," of "losing to find," expressed in the language of our own day. All that was vital and sacred in "personality" remains, but has become richer and vaster. We are ourselves still, but not our own exclusive selves; we belong to the great All which gave us life; yet also that great All belongs to us, and pours its life into ours to the utmost of our capacity for reception. There is profound significance in the paradox of Paul's impassioned words: "As sorrowful, yet alway rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing (to one-self alone), and yet possessing all things (in fellowship with the rest);" and in words attributed to Jesus, "All things that the Father hath are mine."

W. J. JUPP.

THE Rev. T. E. M. Edwards is leaving for America next week to attend the Boston Conference, and would be glad if churches wanting pulpit supplies would communicate with the Rev. F. Allen, 5, Holland-grove, Brixton, S.W.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

WE have come down a branch or two. Our last abode swung some 5,690 ft. above sea level, and we are now nidifying in this Fuldera Pfarrhaus at a mere 5,385 ft. of altitude—almost on the ground, you see. Still, if a parson may be said to inhabit the whole of his spiritual domain, a pervasive influence, my dwelling is more exalted; and in particular whenever I preach at Lü I rise to sublime heights, for that sunny and sheltered village claims an elevation of 6,295 ft.

I had been looking in another direction. Doctors must be disobeyed sometimes, for their souls' health. But a report concerning one of our nestlings came into the scale, and decided its dip. Behold me, therefore, on June 24, posting down to Schuls, to be examined in theological learning by the Rhætian Synod. We had had heavy snow the day before, and so the whole ride was free of dust. My tall friends waved pine branches in token of adieu; Piz Roseg threw me a radiant smile; the great Piz Bernina himself peeped over the shoulder of Piz Morteratsch to wish me good luck.

When I was at school, I seem to remember, examination time was not without its charm. It was a change, at least, from the dismal time-table, and pointed pleasantly ahead to Speech-day and holidays. And even when I went up for my scholarship, and nearly lost my eyesight through nervousness, the splendour of the attempt cast some joy on the ordeal; or is it that I read back into it the sensations of that unforgettable moment when I crept into the Aston Manor news-room, turned over The Times with a trembling hand, and read my own name? "University Intelligence," and me! Sic itur ad astra.

But when one has reached the age of—never mind. I own to discomfort. Such ceremonies were not ordained for those of riper years. They make you feel like a big booby, with sleeves much too short, put down into a lower class among bright little boys. They certainly mar the flavour of an Alpine journey. Here is Piz Kesch, magnificent as ever, but—I wonder what horrible theme they will give me for my Klausurarbeit! Before we come to Sis the Inn flows for a sheltered reach between beeches and elders. I had no idea that foliage was to be found so high in the valley. At Lavin lilacs are in blossom, and thenceforward the road is lined with wild laburnum and glorious wild flowers. But I wish I knew what those "subjects chosen at pleasure" will be in which I am to be orally tested. Hebrew, for instance? I don't really want to translate at sight, before an audience, from Hebrew into German. Or the Apologists? I feel that I know absolutely nothing about Tatian. The tower of Ardez rises enthroned above rocky gorges, with Piz Lischanna and Piz Pisoc and their whole superb chain as its palace wall. A few more windings, and Tarasp Castle asserts its insolent beauty. But I am enjoying an imaginary foretaste of what is to come: "Please tell me which Church Councils dealt with the problem of the Lapsed; mention their dates and decrees." "Sketch the course of the Reformation in the Netherlands." "How does Bradwardine refute Probabilism?" A divine who has passed his *n*th birthday ought to know such things as these.

Schuls itself, and my Celerina friend; who leads me to a very pleasant room in the Hotel Belvedere, where I dwell as the guest of the parish. (I trust I shall never be a guest of the parish in England.) Next day I study my trial sermon. They have given me a heartening text: "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Then comes the terrible Wednesday. At eight I am standing in the rain, with my two fellow-sufferers, a German and an Italian, before the closed door of the schoolhouse. The Aktuar appears, gives us our themes, and ushers us into separate rooms. A Klausurarbeit ought properly to be done under lock and key, but our kindly gaoler neglects his duty in this respect, and offers a superfluous apology for the omission. I am to pen a treatise on "The various religious-philosophical schools and tendencies in England to-day"; and as I do so I bless the name of a certain liberal Calvinist minister, whose recent prominence I have to thank for this congenial theme. When I hand in my MS. I am asked to present myself at five in the afternoon, in the Hotel Belvedere, for a Kolloquium, at which I shall be examined in Biblical disciplines and in dogmatic. Like Argyll, I spend the eve of my execution in slumber.

The preliminaries were conducted with all amenity, like those of a duel. We were mutually introduced by the Dean, and expressed our pleasure. Did they do that sort of thing at Toledo before the Inquisitors proceeded to business?

"And now, to brace thy flagging zeal,

The Saxon cause rests on thy steel."

A very unworthy representative of English scholarship, I am yet the only one present, so I must do my best.

I am asked to address the college on the Synoptic Problem. I do so, pointing out what I regard as established, and defining the problem that survives. I am next invited to discourse on the history of the same Problem, from Baur till to-day. This satisfies the Vulture, and I am passed on to the Husbandman (you remember the "Light Green"?). He bids me hold forth on the greatest of all dogmatic themes, and when I have ended puts some supplementary questions about Schleiermacher's views (on which I am vague) and Kant's (where my ground is firmer). Then I am bowed on to the third operator, who asks for light on the Pauline doctrine of justification. I hold forth at large. Finally I am confronted with a passage of Galatians, and besought to Germanise its Greek. Here again all is plain sailing until I come upon συνιστάνω, for which I can find on the instant no German equivalent. So I ask my vis-à-vis how he would turn it, and he offers me a version which, upon reflection, I do not accept, for it seems to me to rest on a false view of Paul's argument. At this stage, however, the president intervenes, and declares honour satisfied. The game has lasted about an hour.

On Thursday and Friday I spent some time in the beautiful, ancient, and historic church, which stands high on a rock, whose foot is washed by the headlong Inn—some time in church, listening to trial sermons and the public examination of candidates; some time in the woods, pondering my text. On one of these days, too, we knockers at the door of the Synod had to read out our curricula vitæ. I listened to some deeply interesting spiritual autobiographies. That of the Italian, who came from the Roman fold, was full of matter, and his language was understood by many of the Latin-speaking Schulzers better than German. For my part I could not bring myself to give more than the bare statistic—my course of study, ordination, and secession, and the places and dates of my ministry—and the assembled public, who were much interested in that strange creature, an Englishman who wanted to be Pfarrer in a Romanish valley, were disappointed. On Friday afternoon I gave the public reading of my Klausurarbeit. At eight on Saturday morning I preached, using German in the pulpit for the fourth time. At one there was a festal lunch in the Waldhaus at Vulpera. At five o'clock my German and Italian comrades, with two candidates and a Swiss from Basel, began to hang about outside the closed church. Our fate was being decided in private session. It was in this churchyard in October, 1622, that the Engadiners planted their culverins, and held the Austrians at bay for two whole days. A hundred and fifty people—men, women, and children—fell under the fire of the invaders. But we were not thinking of them. At six we were called in, and addressed by the Dean: all were accepted. The private session went on, and we took part in it. We were all entertained that evening at the Kurhaus Tarasp. The Dean and I came away early, but the speechifying continued into the small hours.

Some reaction, and a wretched night. Next morning I was barely able to outlast the solemn service, with the ordination of those not yet ordained, and the reception of the rest of us into the Synod. I took the vow, which pledged me to preach the word of God, conformably to the Holy Scriptures, especially those of the New Covenant, according to the principles of the Evangelical Reformed Church, and according to my best knowledge and conscience, and to observe the Cantonal ordinances about Divine Service and the laws of the Synod—this vow I took by uttering the one syllable "Ja."

For the rest of the day I kept my room and a horizontal posture. I missed the High Service and the afternoon service on behalf of the Diaspora, and a great banquet in the evening, whereby I escaped the necessity of making a speech. Next day I was well enough to attend, a fully fledged Synodal, and voté in the election of our officers for the year. In the afternoon I walked, with a pleasant companion, through the lovely Clemgia ravine, and on through forests of Alpenrosen to Scarl; and next day, through torrential rain, over the pass to Cierfs. Corva and the young birds arrived a few hours later by coach, and were received by a beneficed clergyman of the Swiss Protestant Established Church, in his own parish.

THE VOICE OF THE SEA.

A HOLIDAY SERMON

BY THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

WHEN the prophet Ezekiel saw the vision of Jehovah coming to take possession of his desecrated Temple and to dwell henceforth among his people, ransomed from idolatry and captivity, it took for him the form of a light such as mortal eye had never seen, which first broke as a new and brighter dawn in the east and then advanced over the earth, which shone back with the brilliance of a mirror which reflects the sun, then stayed over Jerusalem and rested upon the Temple, so that it seemed full of glory. And the prophet tells us that he fell upon his face before it. For though no other than the common light of every day was around him, yet was the vision real to his mind's eye, and the excess of its splendour overwhelmed him.

But the sun, which suggested it to him, rises day by day in utter silence, and its light traverses the lands noiselessly, treading over mountain and plain with march as still as it is irresistible, so that the acutest ear can perceive no slightest vibration to indicate its advance.

Not so, it seemed to the prophet, does God come to earth. Every sense must surely be conscious of His Presence and thrill with the impression of His near Majesty. Jehovah he knew indeed to be beyond the understanding, and therefore much more beyond the perception of man. Eye could not see him nor hand touch him nor ear discern his voice though he were close by in all his glory; yet, if it were allowable to conceive of him under the image of light, formless, all pervading, all beautifying, it were right to liken his Presence to something the ear might imagine though it were never heard on earth. God was glory to the eye. What should correspond to this in the region of sound?

He found a simile as grand and true as may be conceived: "His voice was as the sound of many waters." And three times the author of that weird book which ends the New Testament borrows of him the metaphor. Once when he describes the Son of Man "holding the seven stars in his right hand and his countenance like the sun shining in its strength." Again when he beholds the great choir of the redeemed, twelve times twelve thousand, who stand before the throne of God and sing the new song of unending triumph. And yet again when Babylon, the enemy of God's people, has fallen, and there was joy in heaven for that the omnipotence of God was vindicated: "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

But why, one may ask, did not Ezekiel prefer rather the thunder to the sea as an image of the impression produced by awe of the nearness of the Almighty? Certainly of all sounds heard in our world it is the loudest and most terrible, and the writer of Revelation twice adds it to the simpler imagery of the Prophet.

I think the reason is clear why his genius selected this sound above all others, even though it be that he himself could not have justified the preference. For the thunder is by its very nature intermittent and temporary. Peal follows peal, but each is distinct, and after a while the storm, however long and loud, passes, and there is silence in heaven.

Not such the voice of the waters. It is unceasing, like the courses of the stars. Day-long, night-long, through the changing seasons, through the passing centuries, it never fails. Ever since, hundreds of millions of years ago, the cooling globe suffered the clouds of steam which had hitherto clothed it round to fall in water and make the seas, it has gone on. Before man was, before the beasts or trees or herbs of the field, the tides of ocean swayed to and fro in mighty volume and perpetual rhythm, the heart-beat of the world. And ever as they rose and fell they made the grand sound of multitudinous waters—always lasting, yet always changing, like an unending sonata which should contain and express every motion of the human soul, from the most gentle to the most passionate, from the sublime to the commonplace and dull. For now the sea is tame as a fondling and speaks in a scarce audible lap of waters on the beach. Now, as with a shout, a roar, it advances, and retreats as with the rage of defiance of a beaten foe; war is its being, wave with wave, sea with land, waters with winds, and the might of confusion is audible as a continuous thunder. And then its beat is as if it were moved by some great engine steadily at work below and forcing the waves forward and withdrawing them with quiet, steady, irresistible stroke of a piston. There is no sound like it, so constant, so mighty, so variable. Often is the wind so still that you cannot hear its pulse. The pulse of the waves is never unheard. Against frowning precipices, along soft palm-lined sands, among the icebergs of the North and the coral reefs of tropical seas, the sea beats and breaks the round world over. As before ever man had learnt articulate speech, so now to-day it speaks. Its voice has lasted while the tongues of men have been formed and perfected and ceased and been forgotten. It will yet sound on when earth has ceased to be habitable, and tides will rise and fall amid half frozen seas with the same wild music as they make to-day.

Is it voice or noise only, this sound of many waters which pervades our globe? Has it meaning or none at all? Poets have lent it speech and interpreted its varying sounds to suit their fancy. The Psalmist hears in it an alleluia, and when from Carmel on a stormy day he has watched the waves meet and leap up together and clash into foam, it seemed to him that the floods clapped their hands before God as a crowd excited by the words of a great orator who lifts up their souls in uncontrollable enthusiasm for himself and his message.

And to descend to our own day and the lower region of sentiment, how well known is that incident in Dickens' novel where the invalid child slept by the sea-side and "awaking suddenly, he listened, started up, and sat listening. 'I want to know what it says, the sea, what is it that it keeps saying?' She told him (his sister) that it was only the noise of the rolling waves. 'Yes, yes,' he said, 'but I know that they are always saying something, PALGRAVE'S "Golden Treasury," with no fewer than one hundred additional poems (to the end of the nineteenth century), is being published in the Oxford edition of Standard Authors. The whole of Fitzgerald's version of "Omar Khayyam" is given.

always the same thing.' It isn't an ailing boy's waking dream. It is the great novelist himself who speaks. Charles Dickens, successful man of business, who made a fortune, who created Pickwick, who won a name among the great writers of the nineteenth century and has already outlived the puny critics who sought to disparage him. He heard the voice of the sea, the sound of many waters, and he knew that it had a meaning and always the same.

"Only the noise of the rolling waves," and of sand and pebbles dragged down, and rolled forward again. Yes, and just so every sound which human lips utter, prayer and praise, song and sigh and groan, and appeal and curse, are they not merely varied vibrations of the vocal chords, answering to the air driven through them just as a harp does when its strings are stirred by the wind? This alone gives them meaning, that they are subject to the spirit within, that they are not casual, without purpose, that there is a soul behind them. Just as is the difference between the noise of a piano which a little child beats with its fists and the sound of the same instrument under the hand of a musician, so is that between the human voice, answering to the law which regulates the production of thought in speech, and the mere cries or shouts of wanton boyhood:

And the sound of the great sea is a like expression of law. Mighty and masterful as it is, wayward and lawless as it seems, soulless and unintelligent, it is yet possessed, from deepest still abysses to the highest foam-flake wind-flung from its surface, throughout all its wide extent from Pole to Pole, by all containing, all controlling law.

It is written that of old, while yet "the earth was without form and void," the Spirit of God "moved upon the face of the waters." It is true always, above and beneath, the same Spirit inhabits the waters to-day. No wave bends into crystal cave, breaks into white cloud, leaps forward as if to devour the land and retires again with crush of shingle and running of thousand streams, but its momentary curve, its quickly fading glow, each tiniest particle of foam tossed aloft is in its brief existence obedient to the inner law. The myriad smile of the summer calm, the surge smitten and driven by the wind till air and water confound their barriers, the gulfs of perpetual calm far below and the surface that is never still, all alike are under the dominion which is their being's cause and end.

What are the wild waves saying, for ever, nights and days without end? Listen! "The sea is his, and he made it!" "Mighty is the voice of many waters, yea, mighty is the raging of the sea." But the might is his Law, and all things serve and all obey him.

Another sound I hear, weak and small and as of yesterday compared with that of the sea, but like it unceasing day and night, nobler though feeble, diviner far because intelligent. It is the voice of Humanity which knows that which it speaks! Voice of the Almighty who dwells in man otherwise than in the waters.

Oh, should it not rise to heaven as the very music of this planet. Mighty chorus of millions, each one contributing his own part, and all together as a perfect orchestra making one grand melody?

So the Psalmist conceived of it.

"Kings of the earth and all people, princes and all rulers of the world, young men and maidens, old men and children, let them praise the name of the Lord, for his name alone is excellent, his glory is above the earth and heaven."

Alas, not so! No harmony at all it seems, no hymn of praise nor even of submission. Jangle, rather, of myriad discordant notes, confusion of prayer and curse, of laugh and cry, of lie and slander and gossip and truth and reason, of all manner of good and evil which man's heart conceives. Such is the voice of our race, such is the sound which Heaven, listening for the music of prayer and praise, hears from earth!

We call the sea angry when its waves race up, arching their necks as white horses galloping wild across the plain; we denounce its treachery when with seeming promise of calm it woos the fisherman to put forth, and then rises and overwhelms him in its unprovoked wrath; we abhor the cruelty of it when all day long and through the dreary night it batters the ship it has wrecked, and tears one by one the drenched and shivering survivors from their last hold.

But our blame is foolish and our reproaches have no meaning. The sea has no faults and no passions. Ever without fail it obeys the law laid upon it in the beginning: "Thus far shalt thou come, and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed; for he gave to the sea his decree that it should not pass his commandment." Ours, and ours alone on earth, are the lawless passions we attribute to inanimate nature. Ours only the guilt of cruelty and treachery and anger and every sin.

For to us too is given a decree, "Thou shalt," "Thou shalt not." Upon us all is laid the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy God, thy neighbour." And we know it and we transgress. Man is the only transgressor on earth; alone he contends against his own well-being, against his God. How hateful were the sea if, conscious and capable of self-control, it wilfully destroyed the works of man, and wrecked the ships and drowned those who trusted themselves to it! Yet even such are we. And every day man works more evil to his own kind than the sea does in its wildest moods.

Oh, how do wind and wave condemn our inharmonious and rebellious lives. How does their constancy of obedience, unintelligent and unconscious though it be, pour scorn on our lawless passions, our fitful goodness, our caprice and inconsistency. Let us hear the voice of many waters, and while we are entranced with their mighty chorus of praise take shame to ourselves for lives so out of tune with Nature.

It is the voice of Law, omnipotent and omnipresent, speaking in the splash of waters and in the sighing of winds, in thunder and earthquake, in the song of birds and in the rustling of leaves.

It is the voice of Obedience, the obedience perfect, absolute, unquestioning, in which all things find their bliss. For with all except man to be is to obey. In obedience they come into being, in obedience they continue, in obedience they cease to be.

It is the voice of Praise. For praise consists not in telling God how good and wise and mighty He is, but in the unceasing service which, conscious as a good life or unconscious as the sway of the tides, is, as Wordsworth wrote of the Duddon's torrent,

"Proclamation high,
And glad acknowledgment of lawful sway."

MY LITTLE CHURCH.

By THE REV. S. R. CALTHROP, LITT.D.

[We referred recently to the Rev. S. R. Calthrop as an Englishman who settled long ago in the States, and is now a veteran in the ministry among our American brethren. The following article appeared in the Christian Register of January 8, 1903.]

Saint Paul sends his loving greetings to Prisca and Aquila, his fellow-workers in Christ Jesus, and to the church in their house. A church in a house! But that house is a very poor one which is not, in some sense, a church, a place where the great sanctities of Truth and Right and Love are known, honoured and worshipped. My own little church, when it began, was smaller yet. It contained only one person, myself. After a prolonged struggle with the blackness of darkness embodied in a creed of hate and despair: when I had finally refused utterly to worship a God who was not good, the great idea of the eternal goodness, of a love of God which includes every son and daughter of his in all the world, entered my soul, took possession of it, and made it a church. No one around me could sympathise with me. They were actually afraid of me, or rather of the great Idea which was in me. But all churches which are not missionary churches are doomed to slow decay and final death. The message was in my heart, and had to make its way to utterance. One night I went to hear a Mr. Cosgrove, a converted soldier, who was to speak in the Methodist chapel at Sandown, Isle of Wight, I found him interesting, strong, and earnest, but quite in the dark as to the Eternal Mercy to all. He said that he was going next day to walk to Newport. Well, the Spirit told me to walk on that road and wait till Cosgrove came. I saw him very soon striding strongly toward me; and, when he joined me, I preached to him the gospel of the Eternal Hope. The man's strong, simple, genuine nature was ready for the new revelation. The light shone on him and he went on his way rejoicing. So my little church had now two members. I went to bid my relatives good-bye, as I was to go to America to preach the new gospel. I travelled for some hours alone with a gentleman. I poured forth my message to him; and he received it, saying that just that was what he had been waiting for. So now my church had three members. My dear brother and cousin met me at the station, and we walked to the house; but they attacked me at once. They were sure that they could convince me of my errors, and save my going into exile away from all I knew and loved. My dear cousin was preparing to enter the church. After dinner we talked and talked till midnight, then, my cousin and I occupying the same bedroom, talked on till two in the morning. Then he finally said, "Dear Sam, I want you to hear me promise this. Never in my life will I preach anything except the eternal love of God to all His children." So my little church had now four members. Another dear cousin soon made it five.

I soon set sail in the good ship, Southampton, bound for America. Among the passengers was a tall thin, melancholy, elderly gentleman, who talked freely to me, and at last confided to me that he felt he had committed the unpardonable sin. Then I preached to him the gospel; and it fell upon his poor worn, and desolate heart like the dew. So my little church had now six members.

"I wish you would speak to my wife," said he. "She is the daughter of a Baptist minister, and is quite a learned theologian herself. Indeed, she has written a catechism for the use of her daughter, aged fifteen."

Well, I went down to her cabin, and there she assailed me with the well-known texts upon which the doctrine of the eternal hate is founded. When she had done, I said, "You believe that Jesus was good, tender, helpful, loving, do you not?" "Oh, yes!" "And that his supreme desire was to help the poor, the ignorant, the unhappy—aye, even the vicious and the criminal—do you not?" "Oh, yes!" "And that in this he embodied the compassion of God himself?" "Oh, yes!" "And does he keep the same kind nature in heaven?" "Oh yes." "Then he will try to help every one that needs his help. And, therefore, God, his Father and ours, has for ever and ever the unchanging desire to help all His children who need that help, however sinful they may be?" "Yes!" "Well, then, lay first hold of that, for that is life; and let all smaller things go." The result was dramatic. She took her catechism at once on deck, and deliberately pitched it into the sea—the bitter water not so bitter as it. So now my little church had seven members. Soon after I had reached the United States, these two dear people travelled one hundred miles, and then back again the same day, just to thank and bless me and bid me good-bye for ever in this lower earth-life. But they are still, though doubtless in heaven, beloved members of my little church.

Two dear sisters came over from England to keep my house, in which I had the rare joy of teaching twenty young American boys, and so learning from them how to bring the ever new gospel to bear on young hearts. When they had been with me a year, the younger sister said to me; "I have something to tell you. Before I came over, our dear mother went over with me every text in the Bible which proved how wrong you were. I expected that you would begin at once, and I was perfectly sure that I could prove that you were wrong. But you never said a word! But I heard your talks to the boys on Sunday afternoons, and your conversations with friends, and after six months your ideas had got into my head, and insisted that they were my own." And so my little church had now eight members.

I have to confess that it sent a chill to my heart to meet many people here who professed to share my faith in the Eternal Goodness, but who seemed to hold it in so limp a fashion that it created no ever-springing well of joy in their hearts. They seemed to feel, at best, a certain complacency in holding views so eminently correct and so much better than other people's views. Of missionary zeal, of a great, overmastering longing to impart the grace which they had received to poor, wounded, despairing hearts that refused to be comforted for lack of this, I could see in them no trace. The great Idea was not a Presence in their souls—an august Presence always acknowledged, always revered, always held up as the main-spring of all right action. Some, indeed, provoked me to say to myself: "I wish to Heaven you did not believe as you say you do. You pretend to hold it: perhaps you really think you do. But you are not only merely an average person, with very, very commonplace ideals, but you do your best to prove to all who know you that the gospel you profess to believe has no vital message to give, no great and glorious uplifting to impart. You act as a wet blanket to the warmth of all high enthusiasms."

Please think of it a little. Here is a man who says he believes in the infinite love of God to all souls, together with his own, that the whole human race is included in one all-embracing plan of salvation, ending in the admission of every soul into a heaven of infinite joy, bliss, and love, which is to go on increasing for ever and ever, and yet who has no joy in his belief, no longing desire to impart to others who sit in darkness the glorious gospel news, whose life is not in the least influenced by his belief, who is no truer, no gentler, no whit more helpful, more loving, who is just as hard and unmerciful in his dealings with his fellow-men as the very heathen who knows not God, whom no widow blesses, no orphan rejoices to see, who lifts no burdens off any shoulders, who befriends no good causes, who fights no wrongs! Well, the truth is that he does not believe what he says. He believes that he believes, but the great faith is not present with him. That glorious Presence justifies itself in all its children. It shines in their hearts, making them tender and true and loyal. It makes their hands helpful and their sympathies quick. It makes them like itself. It is they, and such as they, who by loyal work and loyal life will, when banded together, bring the divine dream to pass, and make it a yet diviner fact.

Such as these are the men and women whom it has been a joy and a privilege to know and love. What a glorious brotherhood of joy and hope and faithful work is already beginning to form itself here and now!

Syracuse, N. Y.

THE Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with Mrs. and Miss Bowie, has arrived in New York after a very pleasant voyage, and proceeded to Providence, Rhode Island, on a visit to his brother, before going on to Boston, en route for his missionary visit to Canada. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant sailed on Tuesday for Boston.

LETTERS FROM THE WEST.—I.

R.M.S. Empress of Ireland.

PASSENGERS had been notified to reach the ship on Friday, July 26, not later than 4 p.m., as the time for sailing was fixed for 4.30. At that hour, however, there was a continuous string of porters arriving with luggage, and even at 4.45 the line seemed interminable. Soon after there was a break, and all at once the end of the chain had come. Not many minutes after a saucy little tug was passing between our good ship and England, and we began to realise that we were departing.

Up to this time there had been much hilarity between those standing on the dock and their friends aboard. As the distance between the ship and the dock widened one began to have a clearer conception of the words, "He had compassion on the multitude." There was the same great crowd of individuals who had been waving handkerchiefs and hats to their loved ones, who could recognise the signallers and be recognised by them; but on both sides the individuals were lost in the multitude. Personal salutes were no longer possible, but amid all the tears and sobs everyone was waving frantically. It was the last chance of a visual greeting for very many, and they felt it.

Many were already homeless. They were out of the old and had not seen the new. We soon steamed away, and those who had time for thought had plenty to reflect on. The majority, however, had other pressing matters to attend to, and for two days, while the good Empress was behaving in a very undignified manner they had neither time nor inclination for serious talk. Then it was that a young man took possession of the piano in the library, and hour after hour ground out "For those in peril on the sea," and "Leave the poor old stranded wreck and pull for the shore." He strummed the "Glory Song" and other melodies by "Charlie" Alexander until we could stand it no longer, and he was requested to quit. His lack of humour was amazing. He has endeavoured to cheer and enliven us two or three times since, but his efforts were wasted on us. On Sunday evening the pianist was invited to attend the service in the dining-saloon. He declined. "If they won't have 'Charlie' Alexander's hymns I won't go. Anyway, I don't take no stock in regular church services."

Among the second-class passengers were three Roman Catholic priests, two episcopal clergymen, and one dissenting minister. Among the first-class people were two clergymen—a sweet looking old gentleman and a man of more tender years who had shipped as chaplain, or, in other words, was working his way across. This younger man held a service for the first-class in the morning, for the third class in the afternoon, and for the second class in the evening; but he declined to have any communication with any of his cloth on board, and would not accept any assistance at the services.

Our good staunch ship has made a record passage in spite of headwind. Every day was cold and foggy, but we lost very little time. Once we slowed down because of the fog, and at the quarantine station we were delayed in putting two children with the measles ashore and having the hospital fumigated.

Unfortunately we arrived in Quebec after darkness had set in, and so we missed seeing the lovely falls of Montmorency just below Quebec, the broad Saguenay, and the lovely St. Charles, all of which, together with the commanding position of Quebec, makes the city overpowering for the incomer. Venice by sea. Of course that is the way to approach Venice, and it is certainly the way to see Quebec.

Our fellow passengers are now scattering, most of them going to the North-West to settle. We wish them all success, for they must suffer some privations, and, if they are ever to succeed, they must face a great deal of hard work.

THE VAN MISSION.

LAST week's figures showed 26 meetings with a gross attendance of 11,250, and an average of 430. Owing to the wretched state of the weather during the last week ending August 18, five meetings were entirely abandoned, and others were seriously interfered with. Twenty-two meetings were held, attended by 10,275 people, the average reaching the record number of 467. Sixteen meetings had over 300 present, eleven over 500, while only one meeting on an isolated racecourse at Whittington has had less than 100. The London Van has held meetings every night at Walthamstow, and its total stands at 4,050, some 580 each time. No. 4 Van at Hanley, with 3,050 for five meetings, averages 610. Mr. Barker laments the loss of his last night there as "a great pity, because, had it been fine, we should have had the largest meeting yet by far."

No. 1 Van reports attendances of 750, 300, and 500 at Chesterfield, where two meetings were lost through rain and cold, and 75 and 250 at Whittington. Rev. Simon Jones, of Swansea, opened the Chesterfield meetings, and later in the week his place was taken by Mr. W. F. Kennedy, of Manchester College, Oxford, who was assisted on two evenings by Rev. W. Birks, of Diss. The Chesterfield friends gave very welcome assistance, and Rev. H. S. Tayler presided over the meetings and took part also at Whittington. In this place the pitch was unfortunately remote from the village, and under these circumstances the meetings must be regarded as extremely satisfactory. This week and next the Van is in Sheffield, where a good beginning was made at Abbeydale-road. The Van was to move to Pool-square in the heart of the city, and within a minute's walk of Channing Hall for this week-end; on Wednesday next to Eccles-hall-road; and on the 31st to Attercliffe. The Sheffield ministers, and Revs. T. A. Gorton, E. S. L. Buckland, and Mr. Kennedy, missionaries, have had much local assistance. On leaving Sheffield the Van will make for Masbro and Swinton;

No. 2 Van reports from the 11th to 16th inst. five meetings at Ardrossan with attendances of 200, 150, 200, 400, 350. The meetings were disturbed by children, and drunkenness made itself obtrusive, but Rev. E. T. Russell's meetings have been distinctly successful. One night a meeting was held on the beach without the Van, and a long discussion arose out of the question of a local missionary: "If there was no resurrection, what became of the body of Jesus?" On another evening Mr. Russell had an unusual experience. He spoke practically for three hours, and then, apparently, gave up before the audience had wearied! During the whole meeting the attendance of between 300 and 400 was maintained. The subject of this remarkable address was, "Things we need to be saved from!" The speaker began at 7.20, and at 8.20 asked for questions. None, however, were put, but the cry arose "Go on." Mr. Russell therefore continued for another 30 minutes and then again asked for questions. In response to a demand he went on speaking for 40 minutes more, and then came a question from a minister. It was answered, and then once more came that imperative "Go on." Mr. Russell persevered till 10.15, and then paused. Still there were cries of "Go on," but the speaker would consent no more. Perhaps he began to realise a new significance in the title of his address; but at any rate he had given his hearers a taste of his quality—and found out theirs. A day or two later the Van left on the long coast journey to Largs, where it is now stationed. A couple of nights were spent on the way at Seamill, near Fairlie, but no meetings were possible. Mr. John Kirkhope, of Edinburgh, has succeeded Mr. L. Russell as lay missionary, and during last week Mr. H. Green gave very valuable assistance at the meetings. The Van is moving more slowly than was at first intended, and it will visit Gourrock and Greenock at the end of the month.

No. 3 Van reports seven splendid meetings at Walthamstow, with attendances respectively of 400, 700, 450, 650, 500, 550 and 800. The missionaries have been Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, of the Provincial Assembly, and E. S. Hicks, of Islington. The Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow, has presided and assistance has been rendered by Revs. H. Rawlings, Frederick Summers, and Messrs. G. Ward and J. S. Cooper. Friends have been present from some of the congregations, notably Stratford and Highgate; and the musical arrangements have been strengthened by an occasional solo, and the assistance of Miss Amy Withall with the violin. The reports indicate a very successful mission, and bear out the impression of those who believed that London would do better than was anticipated. Sympathy seems to have been very markedly on the side of the mission, though noisy and inebriated interrupters have been present. The work suffers to some extent because the Van has to be removed to shelter each night; so that its day value is lost. Of sites in the ordinary sense there are few, and the meetings have to be held at street corners and the like. During this week the Van has been at Leyton and Ilford; Rev. J. T. Davis, of Chatham was due at Barking on the 22nd, and the site is secured for Hackney from Monday to Wednesday, where Rev. H. Rawlings will conduct the meetings. On the 29th Stepney will be visited, Mr. E. Capleton being the missionary. For exact information as to the whereabouts of the Van at any date during the next fortnight application should be made to Essex Hall.

No. 4 Van has had five meetings at Hanley and Tunstall, with the following attendances:—1,000, 850, 150 (rain), 550, 500. It is now at Crewe, where large meetings are being conducted by Rev. W. A. Weatherall, of Crumlin. Winsford, Northwich, and Knutsford are to be visited, with Revs. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, and J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley, as missionaries during the fortnight. The following extracts from the Report of Rev. W. L. Schroeder, of Sale, will be read with interest and helpfulness. Remarking upon the suggestions as to the devotional parts of the service, he doubts whether these are appreciated or required by a miscellaneous audience. "A devotional service demands a united congregation; the Van Mission requires a diversified congregation." (This "impression," it will be noted, is very different from that of other friends, who consider that more attention should be given to the musical arrangements. On the other hand, in Scotland it has been found advisable to hold "a meeting" on the week nights without any music.) In reference to the subject-matter presented in the address, Mr. Schroeder says: "Non-Unitarians wish to know wherein we differ from others. Our affirmative position is rarely questioned. The audience demand a consideration of the implied denials. This indicates the imperative need of our men being acquainted with the orthodox position, and the arguments substantiating it. We may ourselves be superior to texts, but the attitude is fatal with an audience that believes in them. It is our distinctive differences the people want to know. The merely moral or spiritual appeal does not help them to understand the why and wherefore of our separation from the religious world. Granted the adequate setting out of a distinctive faith, all depends upon the temper in which it is presented; then it is that the devotional or the God-saturated personality tells. The people will listen to men with a message, and the more I know of the Van work, the more I feel that it needs a special order of preacher."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Flagg.—The Rev. W. Birks was the preacher at the anniversary services last Sunday. There were good congregations, including many old friends, who were pleased to welcome a son of a former minister at Flagg.

Great Hucklow.—Anniversary services were held here on Sunday last, when the little chapel was crowded to its utmost extremity. The Rev. R. S. Redfern was the preacher.

London: Kentish Town.—The morning services at the Free Christian Church, which have been discontinued during this month, will be resumed in September. The minister (the Rev. F. Hankinson) will conduct the services on the first Sunday, but during his visit to America for the Boston Conference the services will be conducted by Mr. W. G. Chancellor, Mr. Armytage Bakewell, Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, and Dr. Lawson Dodd.

THE Liverpool Congregationalists are about to enter on a forward movement. It is proposed to raise a fund of £10,000 for the improvement of the churches and missions already in existence, and the purchase of new sites. In appealing for this large sum of money the Liverpool Congregational Magazine says: "What we need is that grand old motive power known as enthusiasm. There is hope that as our people muse over the facts the fire will kindle. Let them think of the expanding city, of the growing population, of the responsibility of ministering to the people's religious needs, of the sacrifices of our fathers for us, and of our duty to those about us, and to those who will follow us. It is a joyous privilege to be in at foundation work, to be at anything which means human uplifting. This is Christ's work. Christ's people, we believe, will rally to the standard, and a great heartening shall be known throughout the churches of this district."

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE special attention of all friends of the Van Mission is called to the letter from the Rev. T. P. Spedding in another column.

THE Rev. R. W. Boynton, of St. Paul, Minnesota, who, since attending our anniversary meetings in Whit-week, has been for some time on the Continent, is to preach at Lewisham to-morrow (Sunday), and sails for home next Saturday by the Leyland s.s. Bohemian. Dr. G. C. Cressey arrived in London this week, and is to preach at Effra-road, Brixton, during September and October.

PARLIAMENT was prorogued on Wednesday after a session which, in spite of disappointments, has been unusually productive of useful legislation. In the eleventh hour a grievance of long standing, as was said in the King's Speech, has been removed by the passing of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, and while the Bishops, of course, have a perfect right to their own view of canon law, it is certain that many earnest and wholesome-minded Churchmen will not thank them for their persistent clinging to ecclesiastical tradition. The Small Holdings and Allotments Bill was also allowed to pass, and the Qualification of Women Bills, both for England and Scotland, by which the disability as to sitting on Borough and County Councils is removed, and a borough, if it will, may now have a woman as Mayor. The Patents, the Criminal Appeal, the Factory and Workshops, and the Companies Bills, which have all received the Royal Assent, are also noted as of special importance. The King's Speech dwelt with satisfaction on the granting of full self-government to the people of the Orange River Colony, and expressed the hope that The Hague Conference might result in agreements which would tend to mitigate the evils of war and secure the peace of the world.

STATISTICS, if carefully compiled, are the surest foundation on which to work in social reform, and an investigation recently undertaken as to the physical condition of children attending the primary and higher grade schools of Glasgow discloses facts about the influence of overcrowding on the physique of children which must not be ignored. Returns were made by the teachers of the height and weight of 72,857 children attending these schools, and of their housing and the environment of their homes. The poorer the district, the smaller and lighter were the children. Where the family resided in one room the average height of boys was found to be 46.6 inches; of girls, 46.3 inches, and the weight 52.6 lbs. and 51.5 lbs. respectively. Height and weight were greater of those from two-roomed dwellings, greater still from three rooms, and from four rooms the average for boys was 51.3 inches in height and 64.3 lbs. weight, for girls 51.6 inches and 65.5 lbs. Children of all ages from 5 to 18 years were included. The difference, therefore, between those who had more adequate, though not perfectly satisfactory, housing and those in the most crowded houses was 11.7 lbs. and 4.7 inches in boys, and even more in girls, who weighed 14 lbs. heavier and were 5.3 inches taller on the average. The figures show gradual improvement with improved accommodation. This one would naturally expect, though the extent of the difference might not have been anticipated; but it is well to have so clear and reliable evidence from so extensive an investigation. Clearly the problem of good housing and the creation of healthy surroundings for town dwellers is of the very first importance for the maintenance and improvement of the national physique.

THE International Socialist and Labour Congress recently held in the great Festhalle of Stuttgart was attended by nearly 1,000 delegates. It opened with the singing of Luther's great hymn, "Ein feste Burg," and though its proceedings have not been without certain scenes, whose importance has been largely exaggerated by the press, it was altogether an inspiring occasion for those who attended it. A new organisation has been set on foot which will tend to keep the international aspect of the social movement before the Labour parties of the different countries. This will consist of the several national secretaries who will meet annually, and will also, we understand, issue a sort of quarterly report on progress made and work done throughout Europe.

THE Swiss constitutional instruments of initiative and referendum appear to be gaining favour in America. It may well be that, in distrust of political bodies and persons, the people feel a desire to grapple with their own problems in a more direct manner. Texas, Nevada, and Utah appear to have the referendum; Oregon and Montana the initiative also. New Jersey has just established both in its cities, boroughs, villages, and towns. Other States are in process of adopting popular direct legislative powers.

THE Co-operative News of last week has collected some useful railway statistics. It calculates that the profits of the twelve principal English companies amounted to 14 millions for the six months ending at Midsummer. Nine millions of this sum was divided among the preference shareholders, leaving five for ordinary dividends. This should be remembered when the companies are declaring their total inability to improve the conditions of their underpaid servants who are employed for long hours.

REMARKABLE figures were quoted at the opening of the Co-operative Productive Exhibition in the Crystal Palace last week, to indicate the progress of co-operative industry. The value of the goods produced last year by the productive societies amounted to 8½ millions sterling, with a capital of 9 millions. Some idea of the growth of distributive co-operation in England may be gathered from the following figures. On December 31, 1904, the number of members was 2,320,116; share capital, £29,337,392; and loan capital, £14,255,546. The sales for the year were £96,263,328, with a net profit of £9,791,746. In 1862 the amount of sales was only £2,333,523.

SOME of the lectures given at the Penmaenmaur Summer School are being repeated at Letchworth, where Rev. J. Bruce Wallace is presiding over a gathering of the Alpha Union. The meetings are held in "the Cloisters," a building specially designed for a healthy, open-air, communal life and dedicated to the principle of unity. Although still incomplete, the Cloisters is already, as Miss Lawrence intends it should always remain, a place of large suggestions, fruitful for a better order of living and thinking, and many of the addresses delivered among its columns during the last few days have contributed to that end. Among the most suggestive of these has been a course on "Religious Meditation," tracing its origins and history through the ages, by Mr. W. Loftus Hare.

ANOTHER Garden City institution which offers its suggestion to other places is the unique adult school held in the Howard Hall every Sunday morning at nine. We say unique because its members are nearly all thoughtful educated men and women, who meet together to confer upon those religious and ethical problems which seem most vital to them. The attendance is large, the atmosphere wholesome and stimulating, the utterances frank and sincere. Members are warned against the habits of the debating society, and are urged to contribute only that which they feel to be of real value. In such a meeting, while large responsibility rests on every member, much must of course depend upon the chairman; and Letchworth is fortunate in this respect. The meetings open with a reading from some sacred book, ancient or modern, of inspired scripture. We understand that Monsieur Paul Sabatier has recently inaugurated a similar intellectual co-operative society at Assisi, in spite of clerical opposition.

THE Spectator in a memorial article on Joachim spoke last week with true appreciation of his greatness, and of the debt we in this country owed to him:—"Many musicians have been admired and idolised, but none have been so revered as Joseph Joachim. Honours were heaped upon him, but they never exceeded his deserts, and there was that in the man himself which happily kept vulgar flattery aloof. He was never called upon to wade through roses to the platform, or mobbed by fashionable maenads in St. James's Hall. His native dignity and simplicity rendered such adulation impossible.

"The debt that the British public alone owe to Joachim as an educator of musical taste, as an elevating influence in art, is incalculable. The fame of the mere executant is, as a rule, short-lived; but the greatest music of the king of instruments will always remain inseparably associated in the minds of those who heard him with the tones of Joachim's violin and the sight of his noble presence—the very incarnation of strength, dignity, and simplicity. As a teacher no less than a player his influence was world-wide. He did not found a school, but he carried on and developed the best traditions of the great Franco-Italian school which originated with Corelli. The long list of his famous pupils is in itself a singular testimony to his greatness, while his modesty, his disinclination to thrust himself forward or claim a predominant position, could not be better illustrated than by the fact that, alone amongst violinists of the first rank, he devoted himself in the plenitude of his powers to quartet-playing, and as years passed on spent more and more time in this less remunerative and more self-effacing branch of his high calling. Few men of his eminence in art have inspired deeper affection than Joachim." Miss Edith Sichel's article in the Nation also has some happy touches, spoilt, however, in places by an unwelcome exaggeration, as when she pictures Joachim about to play: "The mighty bow is upraised, the Olympian fiddle poised, &c." But the rest is better.

"OLD Home Week" was duly celebrated in Boston, Mass., in the first week in August. Dr. Edward Everett Hale presided at a great meeting in Symphony Hall, and on Sunday, August 4, preached, as he himself records in the article reprinted in another column, at the re-opening service of the Old South Meeting-house in Washington-street. To the celebration of Old Home Week Mrs. Julia Ward Howe contributed a poem, of which these are four of the verses.

"Rome, on her hills of vantage throned,
Gave to the world her strenuous rule,
Isles of the sea her empire owned,
The nations studied at her school.

* * * *

"Our city is as nobly set,
Stately her hills, albeit but three,
Glorious above her parapet
Floats the dear Flag of Liberty.

* * * *

"Now, welcome young and welcome old!
Salute with joy each sacred bound!
The cradle of your race behold!
Let the ancestral anthems sound!

"And let our Boston, from her heights,
Match with her hills the virtues three,
And crown them, as with beacons bright,
With Faith and Hope and Charity."

THE Rev. C. W. Wendte has sent to Essex Hall a fresh list of boarding and lodging houses in the neighbourhood of the Unitarian Buildings, Boston. He adds, however, that he will have a still larger and better list at headquarters, which friends might consult on their arrival in Boston.

MR. R. NEWELL, of Framlingham, the Suffolk Village Missionary at Bedford, writes to suggest that our London Domestic Missions might do a good work for destitute and orphan children by committing them to the care of village homes, where they could have the advantage of the Sunday School and the ministers' oversight, as at Bedford, or similarly to cottage homes in other country places, where minister and congregation would gladly welcome such an extension of their work, and such a fruitful method of co-operating with the Domestic Mission work in our great cities. It is a method not only more economical than that of the great orphanage, but also more natural, and therefore better for the children.

A CAPITAL photograph of "The Unitarian Van on Tour," issued by the Wholesale News Co., of Glasgow, in their Record Photographic Series of post-cards is advertised in another column. It is the Scottish Van here represented, with the Rev. E. T. Russell and his helpers on the platform, and the bill displayed below: "To-night: Unitarian Christianity Explained." This post-card should have a large sale among friends of the Van Mission.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE VAN MISSION.

SIR,—It would greatly facilitate the work of the Mission if friends who are willing to subscribe to the fund would kindly communicate with me during the next few days. I shall be away for some time after September 10, and it is desirable that our work should be advanced as far as possible by that date.

It is generally understood, of course, that the cost of the vans has been very generously provided, and that splendid contributions to the working cost of some of them have been made. But this does not apply all round, and there are heavy charges to meet in addition to the general work of organisation. A great extension of the work has been made possible by the action of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in undertaking the responsibility for the Mission; but it would be a thousand pities if that extension should involve any tax upon the general funds of the Association. It seems to me, however, to be very likely that the guarantee of the Association, coupled with the generous gifts referred to, may have created the impression that no further funds were required, and may account for the fact that while congratulations have poured in upon us they have been accompanied by scarcely any donations. This must surely be the result of some misapprehension, and I trust this note may help to remove it. The multitudes of our sympathisers will surely desire and determine that the Mission shall pay its own way. It is new work, and ought not, therefore, to touch old funds.

There is another matter deserving of notice. The public largely regard vans simply as so many means of making money. "Oh, there'll be a collection soon," or words to that effect, are not uncommon; and I believe it has conduced to the respect for our Mission and the success of our work when people have realised that we were not "on the make." You haven't much chance for your message if people regard it merely as preparatory to the collection. There are occasions when some friend passes the box round for us, and times when attention is drawn to its position on the van, but this is never done without some word of explanation as to how the Mission has been made possible, &c. There are some missionaries, however, who make no reference to the fact that offerings are acceptable.

The result is satisfactory from one point of view, but it renders the need of assistance all the greater from our own friends who desire that the Mission shall be a missionary rather than a money-making agency.

The Mission, so far, has been far more successful than its friends anticipated. Over 80,000 persons have been present at the meetings, and in many places the local congregations have felt the benefit of the work.

THE LIFE OF GOD IN THE SOUL OF MAN.*

BY THE REV. WILLIAM C. GANNETT.

EVERY day we live we face a world of need and tragedy. Think what is going on this moment in those Eastern Seas! Every day our sympathies should lead us towards that world to serve it; no day escapes without its hand-lift to some little one; no hour without its heart-lift to some brother lacking cheer. In this earth-home, where some of us have so much and some have less than little, these are but human rules. It is not because we forget, but rather because it is impossible to forget, these things, and because we fain would fit ourselves to do a helper's part in such a world, that it is well now and then to turn aside from all that faces us without, and watch the Life of God as it goes on within the Soul. We meet in times of strain and tumult near at hand, man standing angrily against his brother-man; let us claim one hour apart from tumult for thoughts of that in which alone the causes of men's anger will eventually die out. We meet to open a Congress of Religion; let us turn inward to the renewing source of all religiousness. We meet to dedicate a church, a church beautiful in its simplicities of structure and its adaptations to the purpose that has called it into being, a church pledged by its very name and by the hopes and aims of its founders to throb with great activities of helpfulness: the more need—none feel this so deeply as the builders—the more need to keep clear access to the secret places of the Most High in our souls, from whom all such activities proceed and prosper. For this hour, then, we will try to realise together the life of the Unseen God within the Unseen Soul of Man.

A thought about the Life of God in the Body of Man may lead as through a gateway to the inner sanctuary. What is the main fact about this Body of ours? This, that each least thing it does, Nature is doing with it, and that her part is the greater part of the deed. I raise my hand; sun-force that generates the food that generates my muscle-force does vastly more than "I" in that hand-raising. I speak a word: Nature supplies the air, vibrations, throat, and has vastly more than "I" to do with that sound-making. We take a step: sun-force again, and gravitation contribute more than "we" to our push forward into space. Every act that, as I say, is done by "me" is really done by the Company, the Infinite and the Finite together; and the Silent Partner, the great Power-not-ourselves, is the one whose grand co-operation enables man, the noisy mite of a partner, to effect the deed he calls his own. Now as with the deeds of the body, so is it with the deeds of the Soul. In the case of Body, we are apt to call the Silent Partner "Nature"; thinking of Soul are more apt to call it "God." But the two are very One.

We need no careful definition of the Soul, or God, to realise them. To-day at least let us assume the Two-in-One: the Soul, a living, finite unit—thinking, loving, willing, choosing, responsible in part, endowed with power to grow—but conditioned always, environed everywhere, permeated through and through by God, the Universal Life from which it is inseparable. For illustrations of this Life of God within the Soul, we will not watch great personalities, nor even great crises of our own experience. The force that makes the beauty of the summer reveals itself, indeed, in terrors of the cyclone and in the majestic loveliness of June, but best and most reveals itself in the slow, tender transfiguration which quietly greens the grassblades in a thousand valleys and lures to bud and blossom all the forests. Even so we best see and feel the Life of God within the Soul in common happenings, every-day experiences. And I will name three of these common happenings.

(1) The first one shall be Love. A very common happening, if we count all forms of love—the love of child to mother and of mother to the child; the love of brother and sister; the love of the two whose very name is "lovers"; and of the older twos for whom that name of lovers wins ever deepening meaning as the years of blending life go on; and then the love that spreads itself in widening circles of the neighbour, and in deepening currents of sympathy and service, until those in the world who most need love get love from us. Love, in all its varieties, a mystic joy. Love, the most expansive, most transfiguring, force in Soul-growth. Love that, in its every form, is the unselfing force, and therefore—mark the miracle—the most self-making force. Love, that individualises the Soul by universalising it. I repeat, for there is no time to open far this wondrous thought—Love, the most unselfing, and therefore the most self-making force. In that we feel the universal Heart-Throb, the Life of God in which our Soul-life lives and moves and has its being.

(2) The second common illustration of that Life shall be the Human Conscience—and, first, the transparently acting Conscience of a little child. Can anything seem nearer to a moral trifle more like a spiritual snow-flake, as it were, than that? Think of the downy-headed cub that is laid in the mother's thankful bosom at its birth, inchoate, irresponsible—meaning what? Meaning "Soul"? Can Soul-life be hidden there? If so, how is it made manifest? And if signified indeed to mother-sense, whence and when did the atom-soul arrive to be inmate of this helpless nine-pound body? Three swift years pass, five years, and lo! that child has become a miracle of manifested meaning; a being visibly compact of budding instincts; all tendrils, all response! And what is that red spot on its cheek? It is something other than the glow of health, for it was not there a moment since. That flushing spot is sign that the Father-God is about his sparrow-work. "Not a sparrow falleth from its nest without the Father," you know; and that little soul has fallen from its nest in the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Our little boy has done wrong—been "naughty" as we tell him, and that red spot shows he knows it, too. Quite possibly it already comes more quickly on the child's cheek than on the parent's. Now we have certainly taught our child something about right things and wrong—but did we teach it the power to blush at its wrongs? We say to it, "You ought": but who taught it to understand that word? The Living God! The Living God has been before us—yea, before its birth was spending time to weave within the fibres of its structure the meaning of the august "Ought"! And if your child, besides being sensitive, is also happy in its parentage, your home is going to know for a few years the most beautiful spectacle on earth—a soul not merely lived in, but transparently lived in by the Power that makes Christs ready for their cross! Your child, as truly as Mary's child in Nazareth. Your little Transcendentalist may presently be teaching you more about right and wrong than you feel able to teach him. The real saint in the house, the holy one—that is, the one most responsive to the Ought so far as yet revealed to it—is often the little maid, or even the little boy, from five to twelve years old. Professor Stanley Hall is right, I doubt not, with his register of the successive stages of child-development, and the new moralities that dawn with adolescence, and so on; but Jesus, too, was right, and many an awed and grateful parent feels that he understands just what Jesus meant, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," we parents echo to each other.

Now for our adult enlargement and elaboration of the red-spot experience. It is Sin, as we grown-up children have learned to know it well. Sin—the full six-act drama of it. A drama so common that everyone is Shakespeare for it. In every act of that inward drama I mark the presence of the Other Actor on the stage: the Other Actor, for there are never more than two upon the stage of Sin—one's Self and God. The person whom we wrong, by our deed, and the world that sees the wrong, are only lookers-on at the real inward tragedy. A six-act drama. The first Act, the prelude of the drama, is the silent entrance of Ideals, God-sent, and our recognition of them as "Ideals." The second Act—this is a home or street or business scene—is the sudden challenge of the Ideal to us, the sudden hearing of the Inward Voice, God's "Ought"—followed by refusal on our part to obey it. That refusal is our fall—the "Fall of Man"; it is the conscious, free-will choice of a lower instead of a higher course, the two courses being recognised by us as lower and as higher. That is what "Sin" means—the conscious, free-will choice of a lower in place of a higher course, both being possible, and the two being recognised by us as higher and lower. But is God's Life in that fall, as well as in the voice of Ought? we ask. Yes, because that power to choose, that power to fall instead of rise, either being possible, is the very power that makes man Man and child of God. We call it Moral Freedom, or the Power to Will. Without that power to sin we are but brute, or, lower yet, machine. What next? Act third, the ache of Shame, the inward pain of Shame, worse than the swineries of outward consequence: Shame, which is the brand of God upon us, marking us as his—that is what a brand is for, you know—marking us as his, although we make our bed in Hell. Shame is God grasping us, God holding on to us, when we have chosen fall. Shame is the Christ of God descending into our personal Hell to save us and uplift. To feel lessening Shame in wrong marks greatening danger. And then comes what? The fourth and slowest, longest Act of all—the hard, disciplining journey of Repentance, the journey which is wrestle all the way, the conscious journey back to God. Next what? Then, Act the fifth, the peace of the completed self-surrender; the peace of the full resolve, “Thy will be done—by me.” We call that strange peace, the sense of God’s “forgiveness”; whatever called, it is the eternal Law of Welcome for every penitent arriving at the homestead gate. And then what? Then the final Act, most wonderful of all, the result we dare not think result until years have tested it as real, and then can only name with bated breath and humblest gratitude—then, an actual cubit added to the stature of our Soul through that experience of conquered sin! It is more than “redemption.” We recognise what Browning’s potent half-line means—“Sins that saint, when shriven!” When shriven, mind you; never until then. Nor then, indeed, to a man’s own humbled consciousness; to him the word is “saved.” Yet even he at last knows well that he has grown, is nearer to the angel than he was before his fall. For comfort’s sake and cheer’s, to Browning’s word join Tennyson’s, the close of “Launcelot and Guinevere”:

“Then groaned Sir Launcelot in remorseful pain,

Not knowing he should die a holy man.”

Sin, then, the full six-act drama of it—the Ideal, the Fall, the Shame, Return, Forgiveness, the Cubit Added—is it not, throughout, an experience full to the brim of the Life of God in ours? The story of Jesus’ victory over temptation is a page from our spirit’s diary, too; but Jesus’ story of the Prodigal, his fall, the coming to himself, return, confession, welcome—the story of a conquered sin—as certainly your experience and mine are the real that there is parabled.

(3) And this very power in the Soul to grow, to add cubits to its statue, shall be our third illustration of the Great Life that worketh in us, making the man-child glorious. The power belongs to all of us in virtue of the power to lose the cubit, if we will by sin. Ability to fall implies ability to rise. Temptation’s other name is always “Invitation to go higher.” “Lead us into temptation!” we might rather pray, if it were not so sure to come without the prayer. Two ways to grow, then; one slow—the method of Sin conquered, the way of Redemption, just described; the other swift—the method of temptation utilised, the way of the Realised Ideal. Swiftly, or slowly, shall I grow? By Jesus’ way of growth or by the Prodigal’s? The answer lies with me. Ever a new ideal rises in the Soul, as an old ideal is organised into character, and still further into instinct. Ever something in us sings, “I am what I am, but I am not what I will be!” Endless, tireless the climb of aspiration, because the Ideal, the Ought, God’s Perfect, is unexhausted, inexhaustible; like space, horizoned always, but horizoned only, by unseen reaches of itself. Mystic this Ideal in origin and nature; but the way to realise it—and that is all we really need to know—is very simple, though sometimes very hard. The one way to realise the Ideal is loyalty to the seen Right of the moment. “Just to be good, that is enough” to enlarge, and constantly enlarge, the scope of personality. Self-abandonment to seen Ideals, with self-expenditure for others (this last the “Love” already spoken of), forges “self.” Self-abandonment to the Ideal and self-expenditure for others forge the “me.” Unselfish selves, unmaking makes. That is the great paradox of Life. Jesus knew the secret; Buddha, too; “He that loseth his life saveth it.” And whose word more than theirs reveals the secret of the Life of God in man?

Those who habitually live this paradox are our “Saints.” Saints are but sinners grown; many sinners are but saints half-grown. “All Souls” should be “All Saints!” In saintship the experience of the disciplined soul often reports on the face the chiseling, refining processes that have gone on within. Saintship is not innocence; it is conquest. It is the experience of men and women who have met many temptations, sometimes falling before them, but growingly their conqueror, until their days become organised victory. A great multitude of sainted souls walks this earth of ours, some of them in every city, town and village; yet, as just hinted, not one of them who knows that he, or she is of the band. They think they are God’s “little ones”; and so they are—He dwelling with them, as the ancient prophet said, “who dwelleth” in the high and holy place, but with them also who are of a “humble and a contrite spirit.” They have their struggles still, as new ideals from God dawn on them. They have learned much through disappointment and failure. Sorrow has lighted their way. Death has opened the secrets of deathlessness to them. The burdens borne for other people, as additions to their own, have strengthened them. Daily they keep outward trysts of service with men. With few words of spoken prayer, they are never far from the inward tryst with God in the cloisters of a quiet heart. These are our household saints, the men and women in our midst whose birthdays we celebrate, like little Christmases, with festivals of love and reverence.

Here, of course, would be the place to speak of those the world calls “Saviours,” the great Emmanuels of History, whose lives and names have christened saintship. Yet these uncommon happenings only reveal better than the household saints the possibilities of personality that lie latent in us all. And more is true of all these saints, the greater and the less—they kindle personality in others. “I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly,” said the Jesus of John’s Gospel. So feel, humbly, all the master-souls in their degree. “I am come that those around me may have more abundant life.” They radiate the power of soul-growth. It is their function so to do—the Life of God works through them to that end.

“Through such souls alone God, stooping, shows sufficient of His light For us i’ the dark to rise by. And we rise.”

Three experiences, then—Love, Sin and its conquest, Soul-Growth—have been our illustrations of the Life of God in the Soul of Man; all three selected because common happenings, every-day experiences, shared by all. Another illustration might be found in Prayer; but the Prayer of close communion between Soul finite and Soul infinite is less universal. Lowell says:

“I, that still pray at morning and at eve,
Thrice in my life, perhaps, have truly prayed—

Thrice, stirred below my conscious self, have felt

That perfect disenthralment which is God.”

Another illustration is that sense of participation in things everlasting, Truth, Right, Love, Beauty, and so the sense of deathlessness for self, which true living tends to wake in us; but, again, hardly can this be called an experience shared by all, like Love and Sin and Soul-Growth. With time to spare, how surely one would be drawn on wider illustrations, to speak of History and of Evolution as expressions of that Life of God in Man; History, that is but individual experience writ large; and Evolution, that, in turn, is History itself writ large.

(4) Now is all this “mystic”? Certainly it is. Poor is any fact, nay, impossible is any fact within this Universe of ours, that is not bedded in, enfibred through and through with, mystery. Most poor of all, the facts of Soul-life that should try to report themselves as destitute of it. These common things, these constant happenings within us, pass our logic, pass our understanding, pass, of course, description. What they do not pass is, consciousness. They fill our consciousness. They make up consciousness. As sometimes on his pillow in the night one hears his heart-beat in his head, so through the reasonings of our mind the ceaseless pulse of feeling throbs, registering the action of the Soul-life deep within us. Mystic, certainly it is: “In Him we live and move and have our being”; in us He lives and moves and has His being.

“Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line

Severing rightly his from thine,
Which is human, which divine.”

(5) Therefore, being mystic, we need symbols when we try to speak of these things. What symbols have we of this mystic Life of God within the Soul? Oh, many symbols. Jesus’ symbol for it was the Wind—“the wind bloweth where it listeth”; and in many languages, you know, the search for finest tissue brings us to the Breath or “Spirit,” to describe it. The poets sometimes compare it to the Sea—the swelling, freshening Ocean-tide that visits every little cove of being, lifting each sea-weed there, and feeding every lowly hunger on the beach. Modern science supplies another symbol when it chants the wondrous psalm of the Sun-force tiding everywhere, and everywhere correlating itself into new forms of motion, heat, light, electricity—nothing overlooked, nothing unvisited, by it. You know a "doctrine," as we call it, is but a symbol trying to become a definition. So in Emerson this of which we speak is his doctrine of "the Over-Soul." It is Spencer's doctrine of the "Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed, the Power manifesting itself in the universe we call material, and also"—the same Power—"welling in ourselves as consciousness." It is the Christian's doctrine of the "Holy Spirit," as yet so little sounded. It is the ancient doctrine of the "Incarnation," made more true by recognising Incarnation as universal fact, and, when thus made true, a doctrine in which we all are comrades in belief, delight and awe. It is the doctrine of "Evolution," which is but another term for progressive Incarnation. It is the doctrine that we to-day are calling the "Immanence of God." Says the new Jesus-word, discovered lately on papyrus in some mummy cave of the Egyptian desert—

"Lift the stone, and thou shalt find me; Cleave the wood, and there I am!"

If wood and stone be God's dwelling-place, how much more the human thought, will, purpose? And to use one more long word, it is the doctrine of the substantiality of Man and God—man's reason, conscience, love-power being the nature that he shares with God as child with Father—these elements constituting our "heredity in God," and making simple prose the statement of Emerson, "If a man is at heart just, then in so far is he God: the safety of God, the immortality of God, the majesty of God, do enter into that man with justice."

(6) In this light it grows apparent that Theology is but our Psychology read into the heavens; from our will, God's Will inferred; from our conscience, God's Right divined; from our love, which is the Brotherhood, God's Love, which is the Fatherhood, affirmed. What we call "God" is not the close of an argument; it is no demonstration. "God" is an interpretation—the interpretation of the Universe as Soul by Soul. The Soul within us, known by consciousness, sees and pronounces Soul without Soul Universal. To realise God, then, realise your Soul. We do that by experience, an experience that grows; we live our way to that; and the deeper the experience, the clearer the interpretation of the Universe compelled by it. Jesus' beatitude is more than prophecy, it is present fact and very law; "the pure in heart," not merely shall see, but they do "see God." The name of God is, of course, a variable—and all names say "Anonymous." The conception of God is a variable—so many minds, so many thoughts. The pronoun for God is a variable—"He," if "He" covers all that "It" implies; "It," if "It" covers all that "He" can mean. But the interpretation itself—the interpretation of the Universe by Spirit in terms of Spirit—is a psychologic necessity. Realise "Soul" and we realise "God." Only life sees Life—but it sees it! Only love knows Love—but it knows it!

And Religion—what is "Religion"? Religion is but the unifying word for what I have been hinting thus by separate illustrations. Religion is the consciousness of the life of God in one's own soul—the consciousness of this Larger Life within our own in all we do, in all we are. There are innumerable degrees and grades of such consciousness, and Soul-Growth is from the less conscious to the more, and ever more, conscious experience. Religion at its best is a high, but still increasing consciousness of God's life in one's own. "I and the Father are one" is the humblest word a man can utter, when it is but another version of the prayer, "Not my will, but thine!" When that Gethsemane prayer is prayed and meant and lived, the other word, "I and the Father are but one," becomes the simple fact.

DOES MARTINEAU'S PHILOSOPHY "OUST GOD FROM THE MORAL WORLD"?

IN the current number of the Hibbert Journal two remarkable statements are made respecting Dr. Martineau's theological and philosophical position. In one, that by Mr. James Collier, Dr. Martineau is declared to have been a worshipper of Christ. This error has been effectually refuted in these columns. The other is by Professor Henry Jones, who asserts that Dr. Martineau's philosophy, in common with that of Professor James Ward and other eminent living thinkers, "ousts God from the moral world." As the article in which this statement is made is spoken of with unqualified eulogy by THE INQUIRER's reviewer, and as Mr. Jupp's captivating paper on "Immanence and Personality" appears to be in essential agreement with Professor Jones' article, it will, I think, be worth while that one who still believes that Martineau's libertarian view of the will is both true and of the highest importance should attempt some reply to a charge which Martineau, if he were still with us, would certainly regard as utterly baseless.

The matter stands thus: Dr. Martineau agrees with Kant that when, in the course of biological evolution, the immanent God reveals Himself in the human consciousness under the form of the Moral Ideal and the Moral Imperative, man is so constituted as to be able, in seasons of temptation, to take either of two possible courses; he can either side with the moral ideal and thus obey the will of God and elevate his own character, or he can follow sensual or selfish personal desires and thus resist the will of God and degrade his own personality. Martineau held that God is ever present in the soul as its creator and sustainer, as the inspirer of the moral ideal, and as the giver of moral freedom by allowing to man a limited range of free initiation and moral self-determination. But God's omnipresence in the soul did not, in his view, in any way interfere with man's God-given freedom to act in moral crises with or against the will of God as revealed in the conscience.

Where, then, does Martineau's moral philosophy "oust God from the moral world"? In Professor Jones' view it ousts God because it holds that God, in order that man may be a moral and spiritual being capable of standing in personal relations with Him, does not Himself will man's moral self-determinations, but permits man, in such cases, to freely determine himself. Martineau maintains that the will of man, though constantly dependent for its existence on the will of God, is not metaphysically identical with the Divine Will, and that, therefore, in all conscious sinning there is an element which is not the outcome of God's own direct volition, but which has its source in that independent will which the indwelling God confers on man, and which man may use, and in sinning does use, in felt resistance to the revealed will of God. Professor Jones holds, it would seem, that it is absurd and inconceivable that man should be supposed to be able to determine himself in a way that is not in accord with the will of God. If I understand him rightly, he maintains that even at the moment when the sinner is reproaching himself with disobeying God's revealed will, he is quite aware (or would be, if he were fully initiated into the tenets of absolute idealism) that he has never really deviated a hair's breadth from God's will through the whole of the process. "Of his very will," says Professor Jones, "the essence of his active being, man does not say, 'It is my will and not God's,' or 'It is God's will and not mine.' Somehow or other, the integrity of his personality and the freedom of his will remain intact, and yet he can say, 'It is God which worketh in me both to will and to do of His good pleasure.'"

Now, I ask, does this accord with our actual moral consciousness? If a repentant wrong-doer were condemning himself for a mean or selfish act, and someone said to him, "God did it," would he not say, "I did it; and I did it in felt opposition to the will of God"? It seems to me that God is really represented by Professor Jones as virtually saying, "See, I set before you good and evil; I give you also the power of freely choosing between them, and in your conscience I testify to my approval or disapproval of you according to the use which you make of this momentous power." So far, we have the prevalent teaching of the Old and New Testaments; but, according to the absolute idealist, Jehovah should have added, "But, whichever side you take, whether you obey or disobey my self-revelation within you, remember that I, Jehovah, will the particular self-determination which you form, and that, noble or ignoble, it is in perfect harmony with my will and with my good pleasure." Surely, if Jehovah had thus addressed Himself to the Hebrew prophets or to Jesus of Nazareth, they would have been sorely perplexed how to harmonise the first and the second half of this announcement by the Father within them. Professor Jones is quite sure that it is possible to reconcile them, though he admits "it may be difficult." As, however, neither in this article nor in any other of his writings, so far as I am aware, does he give the slightest hint in what direction this reconciliation is to be sought, I can only conclude that Professor Jones' moral philosophy is no self-consistent system, but rests finally on two principles, one of which is derived from the speculation called monistic idealism, and the other—the assertion of human free will—from his own lofty and pure ethical consciousness. These principles seem to me to be essentially incompatible with one another, but Professor Jones most confidently assures his hearers and readers that "somehow or other" they must be reconciled. Unhappily, however, as I have said, he appears to be quite unable to give any idea as to how this alleged reconciliation may one day be intelligently realised.

In like manner Mr. Jupp tells us in one sentence that "this universe is governed by law, and therefore everything that happens in it is determined by the whole force of the cosmic process." How has Mr. Jupp come to know this as a certainty? So far from its being self-evident, I believe that the great majority of mankind, in looking into their moral consciousness, would admit that law does not cover the whole of their inner life, and would declare that our moral decisions are anything rather than resultants "of the whole force of the cosmic process." If, however, Mr. Jupp insists on this, and at the same time tells us, as he does in the next sentence, that we have "a convincing consciousness of our individual freedom," I must ask him what he means by the words "our individual freedom." Does he mean by "freedom" what the Hegelians mean—namely, that freedom is only another name for the power of self-determination, and that acts of self-determination do not involve any power of choice between alternative possibilities, seeing that each of them is, in the Hegelian view, necessarily determined by the state of the agent's character at the moment of decision? If he means no more than this, the reply is that this is no real moral freedom at all. If, on the other hand, he means freedom in the libertarian sense, as I presume he does, then he has to explain how a belief that each moral self-determination of ours is the necessary resultant "of the whole force of the cosmic process" can possibly co-exist with the belief that in moments of temptation it is possible for us to determine ourselves in either of two possible directions. These beliefs are, I submit, wholly incompatible with each other. Mr. Jupp admits that the reconciliation of them is beyond our power, but, so far as I can see, if reason in God is essentially of the same nature as the reason which He has implanted in us, the harmonising of such manifestly contradictory beliefs is beyond the reach of even God's intelligence. I need hardly say that Dr. Martineau was very far from holding that our moral choices "are determined by the whole force of the cosmic process," and therefore his moral philosophy forms a self-consistent whole, and does not rest on propositions which appear to be contradictory, and which our intelligence, at all events, is not able in the smallest degree to reconcile with one another.

The writers whose views I have ventured here to criticise are charming personalities and all their utterances are tinged and beautified with the warm glow of their rich spiritual natures. With very much that they say I am in heartiest accord, though I am often unable to see how it can be harmonised with the fundamental philosophy which they have adopted. I entirely agree with Kant, with Dr. Martineau and with Professor James Ward, of Cambridge, that this philosophy, if consistently worked out, may not, perhaps, oust God from the moral world, but that it most certainly does oust from human nature all reasonable ground for a belief in the existence of any real individual responsibility in the formation of personal character. Professor Jones and Mr. Jupp appear to me to have virtually set before themselves a heroic task—namely, to unify the basal principles of Spinozism and Hegelianism with the basal principles of Martineau's Free-will Theism. That they have succeeded in their enterprise I think few competent thinkers will admit, but the effort is certainly well worth making, and the claims which they each put forward of having reconciled monistic idealism with the deliverances of our moral and religious experience form fascinating reading.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

CHILDREN OF THE STATE.

UNTIL recent years the care of the State for children who had no other protection was anything but paternal. The book before us reminds us that in England before 1837 the rights of children were not legally recognised. Pauper children—those whose parents did not provide for them and take care of them—were in a sad plight. They were treated as slaves, sent in gangs to work in factories, mines, brickfields, and on the land. "They were untaught in a country where vast educational endowments were appropriated for the children of the well-to-do. Child criminals were transported, and even hanged. A boy ten years of age was hanged for stealing a silk handkerchief. The old poor law authorised guardians to supply children for factory work as apprentices at the age of six or seven." "One London parish contracted with a Lancashire mill to take all its children, and one idiot to every twenty sound apprentices. It was a wonderfully cheap way of providing for the orphan, deserted, and deficient children thrown on the public charity. Long hours (the first legislative limit was twelve hours) and alternate night work, for the machinery ran night and day. The death rate was enormous, and those who survived the age of twenty-one were stunted and enfeebled."

What wonder is it that subsequent generations have a hard problem to face in the physically, mentally, and morally unfit—the unemployable? But the problem is being hopefully dealt with at the source. If we cannot often cure the unfit, we can do much to reduce the supply. In respectable households the rights of children are not usually underestimated in our generation, and in many ways the State intervenes to save them from cruelty or neglect, while the class of children so frightfully wronged and maltreated in the early part of last century are receiving an amount of care and attention which promises well; though methods are, as Miss Spence's book *shows, capable of great improvement, and England may learn a good deal from some of her Colonies.

* "State Children in Australia: a History of Boarding-out and its Developments." By Catherine Helen Spence. (Adelaide: Printed by Vardon & Sons, Ltd., Gresham-street, 1907.)

In Australia there is a Government Department which is responsible for everything connected with the destitute, neglected, uncontrollable, and delinquent children that are dependent on public charity. The expense is borne by the general revenue, not the local rates as in England. South Australia first adopted the system of boarding out in family homes the children committed to its care, and other Australian States have recognised the great advantage of the plan and have imitated it. Its initiation was due to Miss C. E. Clarke, to whom the book before us is a fitting memorial. The principle on which she acted, and which is now accepted by the State, is that the children shall not be brought up in institutions but in homes:—

"That the child whose parent is the State shall have as good schooling as the child who has parents and guardians, that every child shall have, not the discipline of routine and red tape, but the free and cheerful environment of ordinary life, generally in the country, going to school with other young fellow-citizens, going to church with the family in which he or she is placed, having the ordinary duties, the ordinary difficulties, the ordinary pleasures of common life, but guarded from injustice, neglect, and cruelty by effective and kindly supervision."

In a chapter contributed by Miss C. E. Clarke we are told how the idea of boarding out children instead of bringing them up in pauper nurseries came from Scotland, and how it came about that whereas in 1872 the difficulty was to find homes for the children, in 1906 the difficulty was to find children for the homes that were ready to receive them. She believes boarding-out is better than adoption because, if the child does not suit the home or the home does not suit the child it can be removed to some other home more easily. In South Australia children of ten or eleven years of age are not allowed to be adopted unless they have been for many years with the family and real affection has been proved, because early experience taught that they were sought for adoption on account of the prospect of service without payment. A tribute of praise is given to the paid foster-mothers for the admirable way in which they have done their work to the satisfaction of the inspectors and the Council. Usually the child is regarded with real affection and becomes one of the family. Every child in a family home under the various conditions of adoption, subsidy, or service, must be visited and reported on thoroughly and regularly.

Such supervision Miss Clarke secured by the aid of volunteers, mostly ladies associated with the Boarding Out Society from 1872 to 1887 previous to the creation of the State Children's Council to deal with the children, and it is manifest that much of the success of the experiment is due to the character and sympathy of these voluntary inspectors. We read:—

"If the inspection had been from the first merely official public opinion would have been suspicious and sceptical, but when ladies saw the children in these homes and watched how the dull faces brightened and the languid limbs grew alert after a few weeks of ordinary life; when they saw the cheeks grow rosy and the eyes with new light in them; when they saw that the foster-parents took pride in their progress at school and made them handy about the house as they could never be in an institution, where everything was done to the sound of a bell or the stroke of a clock, they testified to what they knew, and the public believed in them."

The training of a large institution, however well regulated, is not a suitable preparation for the future duties of children, especially of girls, whether in small homes of their own or in domestic service; there can be very little of the personal affection and individual care so essential to a child; and the establishment of family relations which continue after the child has grown up and taken its own place in the world appears to be one of the happy results of the system adopted generally in Australia.

There is a mass of information given in the book which might have been arranged more conveniently for purposes of reference, but which is interesting and encouraging reading. At the end extracts are given from the Regulations of the State Children's Department, showing, among other things that the remuneration to the foster-parents for a boarded-out child does not exceed 5s. a week except in special cases, and the prescribed outfit for a child is given.

A chapter on "Children's Courts of Justice" is worthy of attention, both for its record of what has been done in this direction and its emphasis on the pressing need of keeping young offenders, and indeed all first offenders, from the contamination of the police-court and gaol.

In the chapter on "Boarding-out in the United Kingdom" acknowledgment is made of the influence of Miss Cobbe's "Philosophy of the Poor Laws," and Miss Florence Davenport Hill's "The Children of the State," as well as the personal influence of the latter in solving the problem of the destitute children in Australia. This chapter, and indeed the whole book, suggests the desirability of developing the boarding-out system in England with State organisation, and supervision by men and women specially competent through their knowledge and sympathy. In this way valuable voluntary service can be used to far better effect than in most private charitable institutions.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

"THE way in which what is good in Socialism is working itself into the institutions of society," said the Christian Register recently, "is happily illustrated in the career of Sir Francis Allston Channing, recently knighted by King Edward. He is the son of Rev. Wm. Henry Channing, the nephew of Dr. Channing, who was, something over fifty years ago, the secretary of the Socialist Association of which Mr. George Ripley was the president, with headquarters in New York, and in active relations with the experiment at Brook Farm, which came to an end soon after Fourierism was adopted under the leadership of Mr. Channing. Sir Francis Channing is now actively engaged in the discussion of old age pensions for all deserving persons in Great Britain. The son of the American Socialist becomes a member of the British Parliament and an advocate of practical social reforms."

A HOLIDAY WITH GRANDFATHER.

V.

IMMEDIATELY after breakfast grandfather went into his study to write letters, leaving Fred and Susie to do as they pleased—either to go for a ramble, or to wander about the garden, exploring its wonderful nooks and corners, with their fascinating surprises.

At once they chose to remain in the garden and wait until the old man had finished his letter-writing, so that he might then go with them on their ramble. So while he wrote, they went, with Cholly as their guide, to discover what it was that, according to grandfather, the old dog liked so much better than the flowers.

When they had passed through the shrubbery of the rhododendrons they came to a wilder portion of the garden; indeed, it hardly seemed to be a garden at all; it rather resembled the tangled undergrowth of the wood through which they had walked in the gloaming of the previous evening. It was separated from the rest of the garden by an iron fence with wire netting, and the gate through which they had to pass had wire netting fixed to it also.

As they opened the gate Cholly eagerly pushed through and scampered about, hidden by the tall bracken, snuffing and snorting as if he expected to find something, and presently he gave a short, sharp bark, and as he did so a chubby young rabbit bobbed into sight and then out of sight into a hole in a bank at the foot of a silver birch. Bunny was only just in time, for Cholly was close on his heels. Susie clapped her hands with delight, both at seeing the rabbit and also because he had dodged Cholly so cleverly, and Fred could not help laughing at the terrier's mingled excitement and mortification.

"Poor old Cholly!" he said. "Did Br'er Rabbit give you the slip?"

As for Cholly himself, he uttered a petulant whimper, and fell to work wildly scratching and digging at the entrance to the rabbit's burrow; but all his labour was in vain, and the commotion he had made had frightened all Bunny's brothers and sisters, so that it was useless to expect to see anything more of them for awhile.

And, indeed, there was so much else to see and to admire that Fred and Susie's attention was quite taken up with other things, for a few paces more brought them to the brink of a lovely pool of clear, still water bordered with irises, sedges, and a host of other water-loving plants. In the middle of the pool large dark water-lily leaves floated, and among them were the glorious white water-lily blossoms, with their yellow centres, too beautiful to be described in words. There were hosts of other water-plants flourishing in the pond, for grandfather had taken great delight in stocking it with all sorts of rare and beautiful or curious forms of aquatic plant-life. He had built a little dam across the course of the tiny brook which ran at the bottom of his field, and in this way the pond was made; and here, cared for and protected, the water-plants thrived, making the place glorious.

But if the children were charmed with the abundant loveliness of the water-plants, they were yet more captivated by the dragon-flies of various kinds, and the hosts of other water-loving insects which sported and fluttered and buzzed and swooped here, there, and everywhere. There were large, strong-winged dragons, hawking about for their prey, whose bodies and wings gleamed and flashed in the morning sun like burnished brass and copper. There were delicate "Demoiselle" dragon-flies, whose delicate blue and green bodies and gauzy wings seemed as if they might have been formed of turquoises, emeralds, and opals; others, again, had bodies of ultramarine and smoky brown wings. They all loved the pool, for in its waters they had all passed their lives, as eggs, larvæ, and pupæ, only emerging as glorious-winged insects after a long childhood spent in the mud at the bottom of the pond. If you called the duckling, which turned out to be a swan, "ugly," I'm quite sure you would call a baby dragon-fly "horrid" or "hideous." And yet, with all his ugliness, he is a most interesting juvenile, and I've known some horrid boys (and girls!) greedy and selfish like boy dragon-fly is, who, when they grow up and learn to be less selfish, turn into nice lovable people. It is a pity that it takes Master Dragon-Fly (or Demoiselle D.-F.) so long to grow real nice, don't you think?

Fred and Susie were almost bewildered by the multitude of curious and beautiful objects surrounding them—flowers, insects, and, in the pond, golden carp and other fishes. So interested were they that they forgot the flight of time as their attention was claimed by first one and then another wonderful object, and they did not notice grandfather, who had been for some time standing a short distance off, half hidden behind a great clump of meadowsweet, pleased to note their abounding delight in his nature-lover's paradise.

When at length they caught sight of him, he came up to them and asked them if they were ready to join him in a walk to the nearest post office, two miles away across the common. To this proposal they agreed, not without a little regret at leaving the fascinating pond, with its teeming life and its wild surroundings. So Fred armed himself with the butterfly net which Susie had helped to make, and with some of the corked specimen tubes lent by his good friend, the science master, while Susie took charge of a plant-collecting tin provided by grandfather; and all three, together with Cholly as bodyguard and scout, set out for a forenoon walk across the common, with its furze bushes and heather, its bracken and harebells, and I know not how many more objects very charming to dwellers in a big town, and no less interesting to those who, living near them, have learned to love them, and to welcome each one as it appears "in due season" all the year round.

As they walked along grandfather had something of interest to call attention to at every few paces; indeed, the old nature student appeared to be a walking dictionary of information, which he imparted in a quiet, free and easy way, very captivating to the young nature students.

In this way their holiday with grandfather began, and so continued, happy, and full of interest, to the end.

OUR LIFE WITH GOD.

THE series of the Rev. W. J. JUPP's articles on "A Religious Faith for To-day" is concluded this week, and we are printing at the same time the sermon on "The Life of God in the Soul of Man," preached two years ago by the Rev. W. C. GANNETT at the dedication of the "ABRAHAM LINCOLN Centre," the new building of the Rev. JENKIN LLOYD JONES's church in Chicago. Mr. GANNETT is, perhaps, most widely known in this country as the author of "Blessed be Drudgery" and that other charming little book, "On Making One-self Beautiful," but also as poet and hymn-writer (witness the two volumes of "The Thought of God, in Hymns and Poems," which he and Mr. Hosmer published together), and from an earlier date, as the biographer of his father, Dr. EZRA STILES GANNETT, CHANNING's colleague and successor in Boston. Mr. GANNETT's sermon we are very glad to be able to republish now as a welcome companion to Mr. JUPP's articles, a declaration of faith by a kindred spirit, beautiful and searching, and very salutary, as it appears to us, at the present moment, in its emphasis on the foundation truths of personal religion.

Professor UPTON, who also writes this week, questioning Mr. JUPP and Professor HENRY JONES on the soundness of their exposition of the facts of moral experience, will, we feel sure, warmly welcome Mr. GANNETT's sermon, with its strong emphasis on the reality of the "Ought." We are absolutely at one with him, and with Dr. MARTINEAU, in the conviction that the essential truth of human freedom and the power of self-direction in the moral life must be maintained, as indeed the very foundation upon which religion rests. We shall not intervene here in his argument with our other friends. The metaphysical conflict is age long. But in these our friends, who are all pleading together for the higher spiritual life in man, there is unmistakably the same reality of moral ardour, and however they may adjust the controversy of their philosophy, their religion, as making for the true life with God, is, we are well assured, the same.

What Mr. JUPP has done in these articles is to declare his own faith, as "containing the elements of a living creed, for our own day here." He urges that in our religion, if it is to stand secure and have unclouded joy, we must not rest upon the authority even of the noblest ideals and beliefs of former times, but face the reality of our own immediate experience. In this, he finds the fundamental assurance that "the inner reality, the one essential fact of life and the world, is spirit," and that "to apprehend this—to have conscious and vital relation with the Spiritual Unity of the whole, is to have experience of the innermost truth of religion." He tells of how he and a friend long ago, in a time of inner stress, amid the breaking up of old beliefs, found their peace in the conviction "that the reality of experience was a communion of soul with the great Life of all," and after all these years of added experience still found it so. "To live and think and act in fellowship with the Infinite All," that they felt and feel to be the very heart of religion. Then Mr. JUPP goes on to say how, while "intellectually, we may apprehend this strange and complex world as a unity of all life, in which we and all the others must live and move and have our being—emotionally, we may feel the presence and the power of the Eternal Spirit which makes, and is, this unity, and, feeling that, may know the rest and the comfort and the inspiration of God." That is the really satisfying thought, and it appears to us that not only emotionally, but intellectually also, we must come to that conviction, for the perfecting of our religious faith. It is not "the Infinite All" in which we can really rest and rejoice, but the One Eternal Source of all. It is not by the way of pantheistic absorption in the All that we come to vital religion, but through the conviction that for us who are living souls there is Another, the Giver of our life, who is in all and over all—God, our Father. We do not search for Him in the distant heavens, though for us they are aglow with mystery and the glory of His presence. We simply learn to be still, and know that He is God. The Spirit within bears witness with our spirit. That is the ultimate fact. We rejoice to know that we are in His hands, and receive all as His gift, and see all that He does in this infinite universe round about us. All the teaching of science now makes for the conviction of unity, and of a unity not material but spiritual; but there is that in us which is more than all science. We laboriously gather in from generation to generation the fruits of a growing experience in ordered knowledge, but we who know are not simply a part of the phenomenal universe we study, we are kindred of the Source of all that which we study, we are now and always with God, learning more and more of what He does and purposes, learning ever more perfectly in our own place of service to do our Father's will.

And here comes in the inestimable worth of all that past, which we may not indeed accept as the authoritative basis of our faith, but which is an essential part of our present—part of our immediate knowledge, and of the teaching of the present Spirit of all life and truth. We are with God, here and now; but it is God who "gives to love to keep its own eternally," which means not only the abiding communion of the heaven which is to be, but of all souls, that have lived and suffered and rejoiced, They still live for us, and teach and help. Therefore we are Christians, therefore JESUS still interprets for us, as no other, the will of our FATHER. God gives to us that "great Friend to all the sons of men," and ours would be a poor present indeed were we shut out from the fellowship of his disciples and from the still wider fellowship of all that is pure and beautiful in the past as in the present of our common humanity.

The essential basis of religion, which is our life with God, is that which Mr. JUPP has declared, it is simply fellowship of spirit, here and now. It is a fellowship which abides, but abides in a growing life, from glory to glory, while ever calm and glad in the central peace.

A RELIGIOUS FAITH FOR TO-DAY.

IV.—THE INSPIRATION OF LIFE.

IN one of Mr. Kipling's books the animals are talking together about being afraid. It is observed that great differences obtain among them as to the things whereof they are afraid. When, for example, the men who like killing the creatures come into the forest and their bullets begin to fly, the elephant always bolts at full speed, while the bullocks go on grazing as if nothing happened. The bullocks express their surprise at this; but the elephant offers a reason for it: "You can see out of your heads only; I can see into mine."

Whether an elephant knows more of his own mind than an ox may be doubted, but these things are a parable; and it will not be doubted that man has an extraordinary gift for looking into his head as well as out of it. And this may account for many of his fears and for most of his illusions; it accounts also, in large degree, for his visions, his ideals, his religion. For the power to look within means also the power to look beyond. The knowledge of one's own mind, however imperfect, makes it possible to have some knowledge of the mind of the universe. Inwardness—the power to see things from within—by a light that shines within, is probably the secret of all the deeper and finer experiences of life. For, in this world of ever-changing appearances, the reality is that of which the outward appearance is the image or formal expression. The real is spiritual; and only the spirit within us can discern that.

That which, more than anything else, gives distinction to the nature of man is just this gift of insight—the power of seeing inwardly. Other creatures love, and sometimes sacrifice their lives for the objects of their love. But this power of seeing the invisible, of discerning the mystic life which the visible form enshrines, would seem to be man's alone. "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding." "Thou hast made him a little lower than the gods," said the Hebrew poet. The tragic splendour of human life is more than hinted in such words. When Shakespeare wants to reveal the depth of Hamlet's melancholy he shows us first the keenness of his insight. Musing on "What a piece of work is man!" Hamlet says: "In action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! . . . And yet, to me, what is this quintessence of dust? Man delights not me; no, nor woman neither." The heights and the depths—the towering heights, the yawning depths of man's nature are exposed to us in that brief soliloquy.

"In apprehension how like a god!" It were difficult to express it with greater force and vividness than that. For here indeed is a wonderful thing: that, amid the endless variety of objects presented to the sense and the ceaseless flow of ideas and images through the mind, we should apprehend the unity of things—should think or feel or dream that all these forms and images are the expression of one Infinite Life! There are those who will doubt the validity of such apprehension; but the fact that man has risen to that—has conceived his universe in that way, is a very surprising and significant fact. And there are times when this conception comes upon the mind with such power that we are filled with an exceeding awe and amazement. We almost tremble at thought of the possibilities and duties which may pertain to a nature capable of such experience. For if you consider it, only the Mind or Spirit of the whole could apprehend this manifold world in its unity and harmony thus. And the fact that we can and do thus apprehend it, however imperfectly, must witness to the presence of that Mind or Spirit within us, actively intelligent there. We may say, therefore, trying to find words to express the mystery of it, that the Infinite Life of the whole concentrates in the individual human life—that the light of Universal Intelligence is focussed in the mind of man, and by that light he looks in upon himself as well as out upon the world, and discerns something of the wonder and glory of it all. And when we escape from the self-illusion and behold the universe of things and creatures in ordered relation, life is no longer a thing of broken disconnected threads and patches, but a unity of purpose, a progressive unfolding of thought and love and will. Nothing is alien and no one is really exiled from the spirit of the whole or from the sympathy of the individual mind.

And this, as I conceive it, is the meaning of Inspiration. When the intellect perceives or the heart feels the great fellowship of life, we are inspired. We may describe it as the upwelling of thought or emotion from the depths of our subconscious being, or the descending upon us of an impulse from above: these are only metaphors, after all. The reality of experience is a consciousness of something infinitely greater than the self and yet vitally at one with the self—greater because it transcends and uplifts us, at one, because the insight and the feeling are our own and not another's. The mystery of this is great and passeth all understanding, so that a healthy agnosticism will always temper and restrain our religious belief and knowledge; but the fact of experience is unquestionable and cannot be put aside. We see things more clearly, we feel them more profoundly by reason of an influence that is mightier than any deliverance of the intellect or any impulse of the will. And our vision and our emotion, in those deep moments, are charged with a Life that is the pervading spirit of the whole.

The inspiration of the poet, of the artist, of the reformer, of the philosopher is, doubtless, of the same nature. In their great moments, when lifted above the ordinary self, it is the unity of life which they perceive, the inner harmonies of the world which they hear and strive to express. The inspiration of the prophet or religious seer differs from theirs, if at all, in a more conscious realisation of fellowship with the Power that moves and masters him. The essence of religion is inspiration; it is an impassioned consciousness of being at one with the Eternal Spirit of the Universe; and it is "inspired" because we know that we do not create that consciousness—because it is quickened within us by that vaster Life which concentrates there and begets the experience which humbles and yet exalts our whole being. We may call it "supernatural" if we please; but it is in the truest sense natural—is, in fact, a revelation of the very soul of Nature by which all things live and without which nothing really is at all.

Perhaps the most vital part of our religious creed is this faith in inspiration. To believe that all men may be inspired, that all men, at their best, are inspired, and to aim at living up to that belief—this is to have a religion for everyday life which should never fail us. In one sense, of course, we are all of us always the instruments of a power that is more than ourselves; we are always being used in certain ways, impelled or led in certain directions. The "Divinity that shapes our ends" is so great that our individual reason and will seem to play but a relatively small part in the destiny of life and death. Yet in the greater moments of inspiration this does not concern or trouble us; we are made one with the Divinity that shapes all ends; we are glad and gay to be used for its high purpose, because we will to make that purpose ours. It is when Truth shines for us with the glow of illumination, when duty becomes commanding and awful in its authority, when Love is a holy passion of the soul, when the Beauty of the world entrances and exalts our whole being—it is then that we are inspired, and "feel that we are greater than we know."

It may still be urged or objected that if religion, in its highest significance, is thus a matter of inspiration, we ourselves are but the passive and irresponsible recipients of its grace or gifts. "The wind bloweth where it listeth." The ways of the spirit are beyond our knowledge and above our control, and rarely, perhaps, directly responsive to our prayer; and therefore it must be our wisdom to wait rather than to work, to be passive as clay in the potter's hands, not eager and aggressive, either for self-reform or social progress or larger knowledge of the good and true. Nay, our individual efforts might even hinder or obscure the Divine purpose. Who are we to obtrude our feeble will and dim perceptions on the vast scheme of things that transcends our vision and baffles our highest thought?

We shall not argue quite thus if we remember that inspiration, rightly conceived, is but the other side of what, in ourselves, we may call aspiration. Insight and noble desire, vision and moral enthusiasm are correlatives—the one cannot live without the other. The practical, personal import of religious faith is a persistent uplifting of the soul. What makes the difference between an inspired life and a depressed or ignoble one is not our sins and failures and mistakes; these are inevitable to the finite being; what makes the difference is the caring or not caring about things of real interest and abiding worth. The deadly wrong we daily commit against ourselves is indifference to the highest right. "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life" was the sad reproach of the great prophet of the soul, and his voice sounds to me like an echo of the Divine Spirit's pleading in every age. O my brothers, the real meaning, the superb gladness, of life is to daily care for the illumination of truth, the nobility of goodness and an open eye and heart for the living beauty of the world. No matter how poor in knowledge or lame in virtue we are to-day, if we awake each morning to care supremely for these things, and to make them the desire and ambition of its succeeding hours, then we put ourselves in line with the higher impulse of life; we are in the mood to be inspired; we become receptive of the Spirit's power. The human will is surely free to choose thus, every day, the good and fair and true; and in that choice we surrender to the Eternal Will, and make our aim and our aspiration one with the purpose and the inspiration of God.

Such, then, is the faith which I suggest as containing the elements of a living creed for our own day here. Faith in that Unity of the whole which in no sense annihilates the personality of the individual, but rather concentrates and focusses there: Faith in that Enlargement and Liberation of the self by which the illusion of a separate or exclusive self is transcended and overcome: and faith in the Inspiration of the Eternal Spirit of the world who both kindles and responds to the aspiration of the human heart. In these things the sublime sanctions and consolations, the sure upholdings and swift, impellings of religion may be found; and to have the vision which apprehends them all is to be strong and calm and fearless and free.

W. J. JUPP.

God's part is done when having made us free, He shows to us our best; ours now remains to pass on from illumination of the conscience to surrender of the will.—Martineau.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

As I write, the joybells are ringing in Fuldera church tower, and bonfires blaze upon our mountains, to celebrate the joining of inseparable hands by those grand little kernels of freedom, Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden, on August 1, 1691. There is a proud star at the Austrian frontier, on a shoulder of Piz Chavalatsch; his fellow gleams responsive from the opposite valley wall; and I know that all over Switzerland the air is vibrant, and every tiniest village has kindled its altar of thanksgiving. Two years ago, at this hour, I was at Amiens, on my way to Seewis, and before I reached Basel another day had dawned on heaps of charcoal. Last year I saw the fiery ring round the Davoserthal, and piloted two ladies, a Swede and a Russian, through the crowd on Davos Platz, where a band and choir took turns with patriotic music. Just as we reached our pension again, the electric light went out all over the settlement, breaking down, I suppose, under the extra strain of the illuminations. And now from my parsonage in the Münstertal, I gaze at the great glow-worms on Piz Turettas and Piz Umbrail, and the line along Piz Costainas towards the border of Italy, and many another. How many of us who see them this year will have passed away before the bells sway and the torches are set to the timber for another anniversary? But Switzerland will still be here, the land of peace and freedom. Thank God for Switzerland! And at the Hague the bigger nations as well as the smaller are beginning to tread—ah, so slowly and reluctantly, with so much unfaith and suspicion—the way which may yet lead, in the far end, to a world-wide Switzerland, and eternal Eidgenossenschaft like that of the three Lake Cantons.

The next time a child asks me "What are mountains for?" I shall have a more sensible answer than the Elementary Physiography gives. I shall say, "They are to light bonfires on, to show how glad you are that people who talk different languages can be just as fond of one another as if they all talked English. And the reason why the mountains are so clustered together in Switzerland is that people do that better here than anywhere else."

What makes this view so encouraging is that there are other mountains in the world, waiting, no doubt, to discharge the same pleasant office. "Pelion and Ossa flourish side by side"; one has heard of the lordly Andes, which gaze a-dream over the auspicious Pacific Sea, and of untamed Himalayan heights, and "Teneriffe and Atlas unremoved," not to mention such pimples as Cader Idris and Skiddaw. How many human generations must they wait, I wonder, before the night of the first of August twinkles its way round the globe, and the constellations of earth together with those of heaven, "make up full concert to the angelic symphony," hymning a consummate gospel, peace upon earth indeed?

I misdoubt they must bide a wee. "A few more years shall roll." And when it actually comes to pass, men will not be hysterically glad about it. Rather they will look back in dismal amazement on the doings of their ancestry. "Can we really be sprung from such insensate rogues, such bad fools as those twentieth century bipeds, who spent millions on murder-ships, and fifties on secondary education? creatures whose first idea about submarines and air-ships was that they were fine tools to fight with—"grappling in the central blue"? beings who forged masterpieces of ordnance in hideous and filthy cities? lords of a far-flung battle-line, whose allowance of close air for school children was a few cubic inches a piece? Dear, dear! Let us forget it!"

(Quite parenthetically, the air-ship really seems to be coming at last. When it does come there will be two questions to ask: (1) What shall we do with our railways? (2) What shall we do with our railway shares? Perhaps asphalt and local motor-services will give the answer to both.)

* * * *

On the night of August 2, Five-year-old called out from his bed, "There is a bonfire on that mountain," to wit, Piz Umbrail, whose ridge divides us from Italy. I looked up from my desk, saw the blaze, and wondered what its belated gleam might mean. "No," cried the young voice again, "it is a star"; but when I had finished my sentence, and looked up once more, neither star nor bonfire was to be seen. This was odd, but not so odd as what followed. As I gazed, the fire suddenly shot up again, and almost immediately rose like a fire-balloon from the rocky crest, and sailed slowly westwards. It was a glorious planet. Now it is unusual to see the same planet rise twice in one evening. Not till I climbed next day to Alp Fuldera, where I found some white Alpenrosen, (a great rarity) and, to my woe, a wasps' nest, and, in the Sennhütte, a telescope, could I descry the tiny needle which had occulted our bonfire planet, in its low, almost horizontal orbit. Incidentally I also learned how to make cheese, and what "Zieger" is, and why pigs are kept on the alp, and renewed my acquaintance with the taste of cow's milk; for in the parsonage we must make goat's milk serve our turn.

It is pleasant to live on a frontier, especially at a meeting-place of frontiers. Behind the arête of Piz Umbrail lies Italy, behind that which stretches from Piz Chavalatsch to the Stilfser Joch lies Austria. When Rinaldo and Martina were with us we made several little excursions. Rinaldo and I walked down over the Tyrol border to Taufers, the most picturesque of all villages, about whose three clinging castles Baedeker is annoyingly curt. When you look them up, to learn their history, you are merely told they are there! Taufers was full of recruits, undergoing their first drill, and was also festally decorated in honour of a young priest, a son of the village, who was to say his first mass on the morrow. Over part of our route we were treading a holy way. The Reformation of our valley began in Cierfs, and worked downwards. Until some sixty or seventy years ago Santa Maria was paritätisch—that is, the church could be used by both confessions; but the Catholics had built a chapel at Valcava, and the lower parish was, in fact, altogether Protestant. Still, the Catholic church furniture, and especially the image of the Virgin, could not be removed so long as one person of the Catholic faith remained a burgher of Santa Maria. About 1840 the last Catholic with parish rights there, an old maiden lady, died abroad. Then it was decided to move the image to Münster.

In the year 807 Charlemagne and Emma lost their way on Piz Chavalatsch, and vowed that if they were spared to reach human abodes they would each plant and endow a religious foundation. The fruits of their piety were the monastic house at Münster, and the church of the Virgin at Santa Maria. Now, after a thousand years, the Virgin was to bid farewell to her house. From all over the Vintschgau true believers came in their thousands to escort her, and there are old persons still living in Münster who will tell you how, when she reached the bend of the road, the wooden Virgin turned her head for a last look, and wept.

A pendant to this case of a joint parish becoming Protestant is that of Samnaun, the last side valley of the Unterengadin, which became Catholic. It was evangelised from Remus, and an enthusiastic Reformer founded a fund to enable the Pfarrer of Remus to come over periodically, through a pass which is still called the Pass del Predichant, to hold a Protestant service. Now there is no Protestant resident in the valley; but one or two burghers of the Reformed faith exist in other parts of the world. Until these are extinct the fund, which has grown into something worth coveting, cannot be applied to any purpose but that of bringing over the Pfarrer of Remus to preach in an empty church. In all probability it will ultimately go into the coffers of a purely Catholic parish.

On another day, Rinaldo took me for a drive through the Umbrail Pass into Italy, and thence to Ferdinandshöhe in the Tyrol. As we drew near to the Stelvio—soon after passing a colony of marmots—we saw a building of some sort perched impossibly on a height to the left. "What sort of a hut is that?" one of us asked. "That," replied a fellow passenger, "is my house." It was the hotel at Dreisprachenspitze (Three-speech-point), where Ladin, German and Italian meet at the triple frontier. We paid it a visit, and found the mountain panorama very fine; in one direction, towards the Ortler, it commands a most imposing view of glaciers, glacial gorges, and severe Alpine form. On the way back the driver of the pack-wagon drank too much Veltliner, and was at last jerked into the roadway. Two Germans, whose wives were in the coach, had taken seats upon his baggage. They swung themselves off in safety behind the wagon, as the horses dashed madly down the pass. The ladies went into hysterics. Strangely enough, the frightened horses took every corner without mishap, and pulled up of their own accord before the post-office at Santa Maria, with no harm done.

PROFESSOR OORT'S RETIREMENT.

We noticed last week the completion of the popular edition, with abridged introductions and notes, of the Leiden Translation of the Old Testament, revised by Professor H. Oort, the only survivor of the four distinguished Dutch scholars, who originally undertook that great work. Professor Oort, having now reached the inexorable limit of seventy years was obliged this summer to relinquish his professorship at Leiden, and we have received a copy of his Farewell Lecture, delivered on June 7. With simple dignity and thankfulness for the great happiness of his life as a teacher, Professor Oort looks back upon the thirty-four years since first he became a University professor, and notes the remarkable progress during that period of Old Testament studies.

It was in March, 1873, that he became a University teacher. He had been minister of the Dutch Reformed Church at Harlingen, and there, in conjunction with Kuenen and Hooykaas, had brought out (in 1872) "De Bijbel voor Jongelieden" (known in Wicksteed's English translation as "The Bible for Young People"). His first academic appointment was at Amsterdam, but in 1875 he was called to Leiden as Professor of Hebrew and the Antiquities of Israel. At first he lectured also on Old Testament Exegesis, until the law of 1876 placed that subject in the hands of Kuenen. Professor Oort took from the first the keenest interest in the study of the text of the Old Testament, and with his friend de Goeje paid special attention to the Septuagint translation. They had Walton's Polyglot, but little else at first to help them in their studies. Referring to what has since been achieved, Professor Oort speaks with special appreciation of the "Polychrome" and of R. Kittel's critical edition of the Old Testament. His own studies in Hebrew Antiquities were first devoted to the period of the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era. On the completion of the "Bijbel voor Jongelieden" he had undertaken to prepare a supplementary volume, covering that period, with the books of the Apocrypha, and this appeared under the title "De Laatste Eeuwen van Israëls Volksbestaan," 1877-8. But meanwhile Professor Oort did not neglect the earlier centuries, and he records the great advance in knowledge, witnessed by the successive editions of Schrader's "Die Keilinschriften und das A. T.," in 1872, 1883, and 1902, the last edited by Zimmern and Winckler, and the works of Tiele and Morris Jastrow on the Religion of Babylonia and Assyria.

He does not regret the sixteen years devoted to the text of the Old Testament and the completion of the "Leiden Translation," but records the gladness with which in 1902 he returned to the period of New Testament times. In that connection he expresses his indebtedness to Schürer, Kautzsch and Charles and other recent scholars, and in concluding his lecture, speaks of the wider religious interests with which he has always kept in touch.

Professor Oort, it will be remembered, was President of the second meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, held at Amsterdam in 1903. He has been for many years the devoted friend of religious work in Leiden very nearly akin to the work of our Domestic Missions, and his services to the Protestantbond have also been very great. Not least among these has been the issue of three little books in a series of popular handbooks of religion, on "Our Life in God" (of which three editions have already been called for), "The Sermon on the Mount," and "What the Jews believed in the Time of Jesus."

Professor Oort's enforced retirement from academic service sets him free for a still larger measure of religious work no less than for further works of higher scholarship, and we rejoice to think that for years to come we may look for fresh gifts at his hands, and the continued happiness of his active fellowship in the communion of liberal religious thinkers and workers.

THE OLD MEETING-HOUSE.

In the column of "Good News" which Dr. Edward Everett Hale contributes regularly to the Christian Register, he wrote as follows, on August 8, of the oldest meeting-house in Boston, which had been re-opened on the previous Sunday for religious services after an interval of thirty years:—

The Old South Meeting-house in Boston was opened on Sunday last for religious service, under the direction of the executive committee of the corporation which holds the building. I was honoured by an invitation to preach, and the various services of the occasion were taken by representatives of the different Protestant communions of the city.

My own hope is that the meeting-house may be used regularly for public religious service for everybody, under such directions as assure every man, woman, and child in Boston of a welcome there. If any plan can be arranged for what I call the mechanical or physical necessities of such services, I am sure that the need of the town and "the practice of the presence of God," will indicate the methods which shall be most devout, most friendly, and so most satisfactory.

Roughly speaking, there are five or six denominations of Christian people in the city. I detest the word. And, when I hear men and women roll it over on their tongues as they might a marshmallow lozenge, I am always tempted to leave the room. But there are people who like it, and who choose to maintain "Denominational" agencies. I should trust that each of these agencies might say to the wholly un-denominational commission which controls the use of the Old South Meeting-house, "We will prepare for the services in the meeting-house ten times a year," or "nine times," or "eight times," or "one time." I should think the three hundred churches of the town might be glad in some such way to maintain the one central place where "The Church" might show its true and real catholicity.

We shall see what we shall see of such possibilities.

Well, what will the different denominations bring forward on such occasions? They will bring forward what they choose. The fathers came here for freedom to worship God. And, if the proprietors of the meeting-house give this or that club the permission to use the meeting-house on Sunday, it will use it as it pleases. But I said at the Unitarian Club five years ago what I would do if I had the charge of such a service. I said: "There is no fear that your hall will not be full, if that is the gospel you proclaim; and that must be the gospel you proclaim. There must be no milk and water about this. It must be a frank statement of the religion of the twentieth century. It must be a statement of the religion of the Lord's Prayer. God is, and he is here, that is the whole of it. Man is the child of God, and therefore every man is man's brother and every woman is woman's sister; and we are all in one family, living in this common life. If we believe this ourselves, if the living God lives in our lives, leads us with each other by the hand, speaks when we speak, watches over us when we sleep, breathes in us when we breathe,—if thus we enter into the divine life, we shall not be counting the cents and the dollars in this message of ours to all sorts and conditions of men. The Armenian who landed on the wharf yesterday, the negro flying from what is still to him slavery there in the South, the poor boy coming to the town from the country, who has not yet spoken to any one but the people in the shop since he came—all these are the classes which our efforts are to reach; and, if we make the effort to reach them, we shall certainly succeed."

But of course, in the freedom of the Christian Church, whoever spoke or sang or prayed in the Meeting-house would sing or pray or preach as he thought the good God required.

I think we should all say that there are half a dozen people in Boston any one of whom would take the Meeting-house every Sunday, and, as the ungodly say, "Play it alone." Certainly I would if the Old South Meeting-house Corporation gave me their meeting-house on Sunday. Certainly Bishop O'Connell would. Certainly Dr. Samuel A. Eliot would. Certainly the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches would. Certainly the Channing Club would. Certainly the Seventeenth Secession from the Fourteenth Sub-division of Covenanters would.

But just now the question is much graver because it relates to the Eternities. Have we in Boston a real desire to bring in the kingdom of God and to proclaim the religion of the Lord's Prayer to all sorts and conditions of men? The reader of these lines and I know perfectly well that it would be much easier to persuade the leaders of any one of the sects to assume the duties of the Old South Meeting-house than it would be to make six or seven "organizations" work together.

As I have said already, we shall see what we shall see.

One thing is fortunate, we have a name for our central temple. Whenever I have, by any foolish accident, spoken of such common worship as the cathedral worship of the older world, I have been met instantly by some fool who was proud of his etymology and who said: "Oh, cathedral worship? Who is to be the bishop of your cathedral?" In this case we need not even meet such a fool according to his folly. The venerable house our fathers built to God at the head of Milk-street was called a meeting-house for all the earlier generations. It was a meeting-house, it is a meeting-house. That word expresses what it is for. And the committee of the corporation which has to open it for public services are fortunate that they can ask the emigrant who lands on Sunday morning or the traveller who arrives at Parker's on Saturday night to unite in prayer in the oldest meeting-house in Boston.

EDWARD E. HALE.

LETTERS FROM THE WEST.—II.

QUEBEC TO WINNIPEG.

FROM 1535, when Jacques Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence, to the year 1907, when thousands of British emigrants are following the same route, hopes have been running high, and sometimes keen disappointment has been felt about this "Great Lone Land." The disappointment in recent years has largely been the result of the inflated talk of interested agents on this side of the water as well as in London, and the over-drawn pictures of prosperity which originated in the minds of the travellers who have rushed through the Dominion. However this disappointment may have been caused, it is decidedly wrong to the country as well as to the newcomer to paint such lurid pictures of the possibility of becoming rich immediately.

Montreal remains the largest city in Canada, but one day it will lose this coveted position. Toronto and Winnipeg are forging ahead. Toronto has a very lovely situation on Lake Ontario, rising gradually from the water's edge to a charming park-like country, studded with handsome residences, none of which, however, is more beautiful than the old colonial house which for years has been the home of Professor Goldwin Smith. The old gentleman still takes interest in the "Queen City" of his adoption, and is frequently seen driving in the streets.

The writer spent Sunday, August 4, in Toronto, and is most anxious not to spend another Sunday there until all the members of the Lord's Day Association are asleep with their fathers, or have been displaced by men of saner and more wholesome ideas. Happily, no part of our tight little island is in the clutches of men like Ruef and Schmidt of San Francisco, or of the Lord's Day Association of Toronto. Toronto is wickedly dull on Sundays. The Street Railway Company run their splendid service of cars on that day, but only after a stern fight with a small majority of bigoted Sabbatarians, and steamers ply to the Island across Toronto Bay. With these exceptions no amusements of any kind whatever are permitted. After this behaviour by those who wish to go to Church themselves, but who do not always attend, or the churches would have larger congregations, who can wonder that men stay away? The writer talked with a great many persons in Toronto, and found the overbearing methods of the Lord's Day Association to be the cause of much wicked dullness, and even profanity and blasphemy by those who are let and hindered by others whose minds and deeds are of no higher order than their own from Monday morning to Saturday night. The City Fathers who, in the main, owe their positions to the Lord's Day Association, in their great anxiety for the safety of everybody's soul on Sunday, are not over-careful of the morality of the city so far as sanitary arrangements go. After diligent inquiry among the police and others, I could find only two public lavatories in the city, and those two for men only. In this matter, beautiful Toronto with no saloons, and its hotel bars closed from 7 p.m. on Saturday till 7 a.m. on Monday, and its large number of drunken men, is a standing disgrace.

I was anxious to attend the morning service at Jarvis-street on Sunday, and, that I might not be late, I went there on Saturday evening to make quite sure of the time. On Sunday morning I was on the spot early, and waited till 11.30. The painted board outside said the service would be at 11 a.m., but no one came, and there was no notice of the closing of the church. All the other churches were open.

Our August Bank-holiday was Civic holiday in Toronto, so I joined the crowd at 7 a.m. on the s.s. Cayuga, which went to Niagara Falls. It was a very delightful trip. Having crossed Lake Ontario we steamed up Niagara River, and there ahead of us on Queenstown Heights stood the monument to Sir Isaac Brock, who repelled the invaders from the United States in 1812. We landed on the American side, and ran up to Niagara by "The Great Gorge Route, the Most Magnificent Scenic Route in the World." It was truly a great undertaking. Down in the deep gorge, at the level of the water, a double car-track has been made so that passengers may be close to the raging rapids and whirlpool, and on nearing Niagara the track rises to the level of the street. Father Hennepin was not far out when, in 1678, he described the Falls as "a vast and prodigious Cadence of Water, which falls down after a surprising and astonishing manner, insomuch that the Universe does not afford its Parallel."

On Tuesday, August 5, I went to Owen Sound and embarked for Fort William at the head of Lake Superior. I got aboard about 6 p.m. and reached the "Soo" (Sault Ste Marie) at 4 p.m. next day. We were soon in the immense lock, and our ship was raised bodily to the level of Lake Superior, where a stiff breeze was blowing. We steamed away at once and woke next morning to find the lake as still as a pond. Port Arthur and Fort William have magnificent sites, and have made much headway in the last twelve years. At 8 p.m. on Thursday we were all aboard the train bound for Winnipeg, which we reached at 12 p.m. exactly on Friday.

Winnipeg is certainly phenomenal. I know no other place whose growth has been so remarkable. W. W. C. P.

Winnipeg, August 10, 1907.

WHEN we go forward, believing that what was true once is true for ever, willing to try whether unselfishness does really brace the soul, whether love to God does really make the heart tender and strong, whether prayer meets an answering Spirit and faith finds a door of hope, only then do we bring into our life the power which God meant it should have.—Henry Wilder Foote.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

QUESTIONS FOR MISSIONERS.

"THE method of the late Rev. Robert Spears in controversy was to ask his audience to put to him the strongest texts on their side. If he could deal with these satisfactorily, they might be assured that he could make light of the lesser difficulties. The advantage of the method was that it simplified the work of the lecturer, concentrated attention on main issues, kept the discussion to the point, and avoided desultory and irrelevant questioning. It is, moreover, reasonable that a speaker should impose his own limits. A meeting called for a specific purpose—an address, say, upon the Bible—need not become an occasion for debating the universe. The missionary who, in his generosity, allows everything achieves nothing—save confusion and disappointment. It seems churlish to insist that questions must be questions and not speeches, but it's the only way to keep your meeting in your own hands. An audience is not apt to dispute for mastery, but it hugely enjoys the dismay of the speaker who is more generous to the other side than just to himself. The best meetings are those where the conditions are laid down and adhered to. The average audience, however keen when it scents fun, cares first for fair play.

"The missionary does well to remember that the meeting has this definite object when he realises that opposition is sometimes carefully organised and does not intend to spare him. It is ready with a score of questions, and every question bearing on a different subject, and if the missionary, in his generosity, is betrayed into the attempt to deal with them all, his own address is forgotten, and he finds that the meeting is a failure. It is as necessary to be decisive in method as to be definite in conviction and statement."

This was the reply to a query as to how questions should be dealt with. The prospective missionary is naturally somewhat exercised in his mind as to the possibilities of opposition, and it has been suggested that he should be furnished with a list of likely questions. The following notes may serve to that end; they may emphasise the importance of the firm handling of meetings, and they will show also the nature of the work that has to be done at question-time. The points mentioned here have been raised during the present summer, and are contained in the daily reports which are sent in by the lay missionaries as "specimen questions." They show that at the bulk of the meetings the main interest lies in Christ and Salvation, and secondly the miracle of the Bible. Apparently, indeed, for many folk religion is summed up in a consideration of the merits of Christ. The reports state that every now and then the opposition try to break up the meetings by singing, and almost invariably the most popular of the Wesleyan hymns is used:

"What can wash away my sin?

Nothing but the blood of Jesus.

What can make me whole again?

Nothing but the blood of Jesus.

The precious blood doth flow,

It washes white as snow;

No other fount I know,

Nothing but the blood of Jesus."

There are four verses, and the line, "Nothing but, &c." (so it is curiously printed in the succeeding verses) is repeated twelve times.

Practically no account is taken of Jesus as a Teacher—nothing remains if the miraculous is taken away! Do you not believe in the miraculous conception, nor the divine birth? Did he not claim equality with God—"I and my Father are one"? If Jesus was not the true Messiah, who was? Is it not the fact that Joseph was called the father of Jesus out of respect for Mary? If you believe in creation, the greater thing, why don't you believe in incarnation, the lesser thing? How, if Jesus was not God, do you define the difference between him and other men? Is there any difference between Jesus and Shakespeare? if so, what is it? Can you preach Christ and him crucified? Does not present-day conversion show that Jesus was God? Do not the miracles prove the same? and prophecy? Isaiah viii. and liii.—do they not refer to him? Did not God require to be propitiated? Are we not bought with a price? How can you explain the passage that without shedding of blood there can be no remission of sins? Can a man save himself? Is there any approach to God except by blood? Did not Jesus say, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me"? Is not your gospel one of salvation by works? If so, why did Jesus die? Dare we trust the "larger hope"? Is not salvation possible only in the name of Jesus? Did he not say, "What you ask in my name, that will I do"? How would you deal with a man self-convicted of sin? What would you say if called to the bedside of a conscience-stricken and dying sinner? If salvation is by character, what about the man who has no character? Will those who are mean and selfish be eternally lost? If all are to go to heaven, what is the good of doing right? Will a good life save a man who has not been converted? Did not God so love the world that He gave His only-begotten son for us? Who made evil? Do you not believe with Paul that there is no good in human nature? In regard to the Resurrection, was it bodily or spiritual? Is it not true that only one man rose from the dead? Do you not accept Christ's prophecy of his reappearance, in the gospels?

Beliefs in eternal torments and in the personality of the devil have been met with, and definitions of heaven and hell have been asked for. Will future punishment be remedial? Who tempted Christ? If there be no devil, who tempts us? Why do you deny the existence of the devil when Jesus believed in him? If the devil is no more, when did he die?

Scarcely a night passes without questions referring to the Bible, and many missionaries make it a practice of referring briefly and frequently to their attitude to the Bible. Do you believe in the Scriptures? Why do you pick and choose? Which is the gold, and which the dross? How do you sort them? How are you to detect truth from error, and distinguish between God's word and man's word? Are you not adding to and taking from revelation? Are not all things possible with God, including revelation and infallibility? Can you define infallibility? Is not divine inspiration always from without? What is a final authority—God, conscience, or the Bible? Is not conscience fallible? Supposing reason and conscience agree, are you obliged to follow them? If both Trinitarians and Unitarians have Scripture support for their doctrines, was not Jesus, then, a misleader?

Questions as to the existence of God as distinct from Jesus have been few. The text, "Let us make man in our image" has been quoted many times, but always, of course, on the behalf of the second person in the Trinity. A series of questions relative to the share of God in the cosmic process appeared in the Report two or three weeks ago; and it has been asked as to how we know that God is Love, whether we believe in immanence or transcendence, and whether God is not really unknowable.

It was expected that the New Theology would lead to many interesting passages, but questions regarding it have been singularly few. "How far is the New Theology identical with Unitarianism?" has, indeed, been asked, and on one occasion it led to an interesting discussion. But it has been made fairly evident that the men to whom it seemed likely this presentation of ideas would have appealed have found matter for consideration elsewhere. And it is among men who ask questions like the following that the Mission has an opportunity of great importance. These are representative of the class:—Do Unitarians believe in Evolution? Is there any analogy between Unitarianism and Determinism? What is the bearing of environment on the formation of character? Do you consider the greatest amount of sin is caused by environment or deliberately? Do economic conditions affect religious beliefs? Do you not think that if the Churches took more interest in social questions, and leaned more to the masses, the Church attendances would be better? What is the general attitude of Unitarians to the Social movement?

Among miscellaneous questions the following may be cited:—What is the difference between the soul and the spirit? Has the Buddha as many followers as Jesus? Is love natural or divine? What do you make of the Babylonian records of the Flood? Do you believe in the second birth? How do you define the meaning of Alpha and Omega as applied to Jesus Christ? Do you believe in the efficacy of baptism? Why do you put reason above faith in regard to Christ's death? Is the Bible a fit and proper book to put into the hands of a child? Is smoking a sin?

It will be gathered from these few examples that there is a class of inquirers who are asking the questions which we believe can be properly discussed and helpfully answered. There are some of us who believe that among the churches none is better qualified to answer than our own. The men who are interested in these questions are mainly outside the churches, and it is a good and useful thing to carry to them a message by spoken word and printed page. There are others who quite as plainly are under the old beliefs that some of our friends imagine have disappeared from the faith of reason. If it is well for the world that these notions should continue, then there is one justification the less for our Mission. But, believing that Unitarians once reckoned it their high privilege to proclaim a nobler faith than that which too often only misrepresented the teaching and spirit of the Master, we claim that the fact that these cruder beliefs still remain more vigorous than we thought, constitutes one justification the more for the Mission, and commends it to the sympathy of every Unitarian who has an outlook as well as a tradition.

THE WEEK'S REPORT.

THE week has produced no exciting incidents, but a fine series of meetings has been held. For the third week in succession, and the fourth in the season, the attendance passes 10,000. It has been the best week of all in respect of a steady average. For the first time no single meeting has had less than 200 present, and, on the other hand, 750 has been the largest attendance.

This is better than having extremes of 1,000 and upwards on one hand, and 100 or less on the other. Even under the better conditions which have prevailed several meetings have been interfered with by rain, and three have had to be brought to a hasty conclusion. The total attendance of 10,050 divided among 26 meetings gives an average of 386.

No. 1 Van has spent the week at various pitches in Sheffield, and Revs. C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, J. Ruddle, T. A. Gorton, T. P. Spedding and Mr. W. F. Kennedy have conducted the meetings. Plenty of assistance has been forthcoming from the local churches, and on several evenings solos have been sung. On Sunday afternoon a service for young folk was held. On Thursday Rev. E. S. L. Buckland, of Derby, joined the van at Attercliffe, and on September 3 a move will be made to Masbro' and Swinton, Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Leigh, being the missionary.

No. 2 Van has continued its work at Largs, where Rev. E. T. Russell has had splendid meetings. This week the van is at Greenock, where Mr. Russell brings his month's mission to a close. On September 2 Rev. Ottwell Binns, of Scarborough, as missionary, will begin at Port Glasgow; and Mr. R. J. Hall, of Manchester College, Oxford, will succeed Mr. Kirkhope as lay missionary.

No. 3 Van, at Leyton, had Revs. E. S. Hicks and H. Rawlings; and at Ilford, Rev. J. T. Davis, of Chatham. At the latter place the missionaries were told by local pressmen that the numbers were large for Ilford. At Leyton, one evening, a Mr. Stanley, a resident for over 30 years, spoke by permission from the van, and testified to the liberality of Unitarians. Another man, an avowed atheist, commended the Mission on the same ground. Some interesting questions have been asked, e.g., "Why did God give us such an unreasonable book as the Bible for a guide?" "Is the biblical story of the creation myth or a fact?" "Was not the supposed Fall of Man the awakening of conscience?" "Do you believe in re-incarnation?" "In view of your saying that the soul is a spark of the divine, will you kindly state your view of Pantheism?" "Has Rev. R. J. Campbell anything to do with your van?" "Where do you believe Christ is now?" "Do you think that your religion, with all its fine phrases, is capable of winning bad people over to goodness like the Salvation Army?" "How can you reconcile the goodness of God with the existence of cancer?" "What is the wise man's prayer?" Questions were also put by a Socialist upon the feeding of children. This week the van has visited Hackney, Rev. H. Rawlings conducting the meetings, and is at Stepney Green over the week-end with Mr. Capleton and the Rev. T. P. Spedding as missionaries. Inquiries as to the movements of the van should be made at Essex Hall. The route for the remainder of the tour is being modified, and it is probable that Deptford, Greenwich, Blackheath, Lee, Eltham, Chislehurst, Bromley, Lewisham, Beckenham, and Penge will be visited.

No. 4 Van has been at Crewe for a week, and large and encouraging meetings have been held each night. Rev. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, succeeded Rev. W. A. Weatherall, and has had Rev. H. F. Short as chairman. Mr. Horace Short, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, has also taken part. It was freely rumoured in the town that the Bishop of Chester had instructed his clergy that the Mission was not to be opposed, an action which, if the rumour is correct, is in accordance with the characteristic tolerance of Dr. Jayne. One evening, it is said, a gentleman wished to ask a question from the midst of the crowd. He had, however, to be called to order, as the question began to run into a speech. Presumably in a spirit of penitence he visited the van later, when the missionaries were amused and delighted to find that they had unconsciously rebuked the editor of one of the Unitarian weeklies—the——! Unfortunately, the report does not say whether the question was pro or anti-Mission. This week the van is at Northwich and Knutsford, with Rev. J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley, and next week revisits Ashton-in-Makerfield, where Rev. H. F. Short, of Crewe, hopes to renew his happy experience of last year.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Chelmsford.—Miss Emily Sharpe, who has been staying a week in Chelmsford, has been paying calls of encouragement on the members of the congregation. On Sunday evening she took the service, and spoke of "The Figurative Language of the Bible."

Halstead.—Mr. F. Maddison, M.P., we are told, is to preach at the church's jubilee next month. If that is so, it must be on September 1 or 8, for on the 10th he is to sail for Boston, to attend the International Congress.

Hastings (Farewell).—The Rev. Gardner Preston has not only been the active and successful minister of the Free Christian Church for the last thirteen years, but has also taken a prominent part in the public life of the town, and general regret has been expressed that he is leaving. In appreciation of his work as chairman of the Ore Village Schools, a silver cigarette case was presented to him by several of his friends at a meeting held on August 14. On Thursday, the 22nd, at the weekly meeting of the Hastings Board of Guardians, the Chairman, Alderman Tuppenny, while expressing his regret at losing such a useful member of the Board, wished him a happy and prosperous career in his new sphere of work at Hamburg. In replying, Mr. Preston spoke of the kindly way in which he had been treated by those who were utterly opposed to him alike in politics and theology. Last Sunday Mr. Preston preached farewell sermons, and on Tuesday a farewell meeting was held; Mr. J. Harrison presided. There were a good number present of members and friends, and a feeling of deep regret at losing Mr. Preston and kindly appreciation of his work were manifested by all. Letters were read from Mr. T. W. Kenward, the oldest member of the church, from the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and a special message from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, all expressing their sense of the value of Mr. Preston's work. Mr. G. Proctor (treasurer) spoke of how sad they all felt in parting from so dear a friend. They were all proud of Mr. Preston for his great abilities as a preacher and for his manly and straightforward character, and they had found the help of the friendship and kindness that he has shown to all. They wished him a loving farewell. The Chairman spoke as a friend of Mr. Preston's, and quoted from the letter of Mr. Kenward's, in which he said that the future of the church is more promising than he had ever known it. He spoke warmly of Mr. Preston's work in connection with the Provincial Assembly. The Rev. S. Burrows said that he could feel with the church in their loss of so able a preacher, of so kindly a man and one whom he had ever found a true and faithful friend. He appealed to them to rally round the church and help carry on the excellent work that had been done. He had been asked to take charge of the church till the end of the year, and he felt the responsibility laid upon him at such a crisis, but he trusted for their loyal support. The Rev. Priestley Prime (of Brighton), having spoken on behalf of the congregations of the district, and Councillor Read for those who had benefited by Mr. Preston's public work in the town, the Chairman, on behalf of the members and friends of the congregation, presented Mr. Preston with a purse of gold, and an album containing the names of the subscribers. The Rev. Gardner Preston spoke very feelingly of leaving so many friends, and expressed his thanks, not only for this last kindness of theirs, but for the many kindnesses extended to him during the last thirteen years. They had often had to fight against prejudices, but had kept a united and harmonious church. He was sure that they would not allow the work to fail, but be loyal to what they knew to be true. He thanked them from his heart for their fidelity and esteem. A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the meeting to the closing hymn and the Benediction, pronounced by Mr. Preston.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant, having recovered from his recent critical operation, will resume his ministry on Sunday next, after an absence from duty of six months.

London: Essex Church (Appointment).—The Rev. Robert Nicol Cross, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, and Glasgow University, has been appointed assistant minister to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, at Essex Church, and will begin his duties on Sunday next.

London: Lewisham.—To-morrow (Sunday) the services in the High-street Church are to be conducted by the Rev. R. W. Boynton, of St. Paul, Minnesota.

Rawtenstall.—On Tuesday evening the Rev. D. Rhoslyn Davies was welcomed to the Unitarian Church. A large number sat down to tea in the schoolroom, after which the meeting, presided over by Mr. W. Holden, was held. The following ministers assisted in the welcome:—The Revs. John Evans (of Colne), J. E. Jenkins (of Padham), and Shaw Brown (Newchurch), and also Mr. Wilson (of the Haslingden U.M.F.C., Rawtenstall). The proceedings were greatly enjoyed, and Mr. Davies has made an encouraging beginning of his work.

Scarborough.—The anniversary of the building of the Westborough Church was celebrated on Sunday Aug. 25, when the services were conducted by the Rev. Gertrude von Petzold, of Leicester. Despite the somewhat inclement weather crowded congregations assembled. Many members of orthodox congregations were present, and must have been impressed with the reality of the message which Miss von Petzold delivered in two earnest, thoughtful sermons on "The Life Superlative," and "Jesus in the 20th Century." The morning address was largely on the problem of suffering, with a reverent solution, and in the evening Miss von Petzold dealt in a concise, lucid manner with the results of Biblical criticism, which was essential if the life and work of Jesus were to be intelligently understood.

Sunderland (Welcome Meeting).—A tea and public meeting were held on Wednesday, August 21, at the Unitarian Free Church, to welcome the Rev. Wm. Lindsay, late of Christ Church, Nottingham, who has been appointed to the joint ministry of Sunderland and South Shields. There was a numerous attendance, and Mr. Hy. Sutcliffe, president of the Sunderland congregation, who occupied the chair, extended to Mr. Lindsay a hearty welcome. Addresses of welcome were also delivered by the Rev. G. A. Ferguson (Gateshead), on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, Mrs. Blues (South Shields), and Mr. E. Errington (Gateshead), on behalf of the Lay Preachers' Union, and Mr. H. French, representing the Sunday School Committee. In responding, Mr. Lindsay said he was not one of those who divorced social and religious questions, and he thought one of the strongest points of the Unitarian Church was that social and religious questions were to it the same. They believed they should work for such reforms as were necessary in the interests of the great bulk of the people. He had come there to help them in their work, and it was only as they gave him their loyal support that they would succeed in doing good work. He did not want them to look upon him as their leader, but as a brother of the same rank. He thanked them heartily for their warm reception, and he hoped he might in the same measure prove himself worthy of it. Musical items added to the pleasure of a successful evening, which was brought to a close by a hearty vote of thanks to all who had in any way contributed to that success, proposed by Mr. J. G. Kay, and seconded by the Rev. W. Lindsay.

No man is the mere resultant of his past misdeeds, but each has in himself a fountain of incalculable spontaneity, and lies all open to the inundation of the moral forces of humanity and the benignant spirit of the world.—J. W. Chadwick.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "PUBLIC OPINION" is to provide a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress.

It seeks to provide the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity, and to focus within readable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

This object has been achieved with considerable success ever since "PUBLIC OPINION" was started in 1860. In the forty-seven years since then it has consistently carried out its policy.

The need for a paper like "PUBLIC OPINION" increases with the years, for life becomes more complex, and the busy man, though anxious to keep in touch with new developments of thought and activity, has not the time to read the many papers which would give him the needed facts. "PUBLIC OPINION" seeks to do this for him, and to present just that précis of life and thought which will enable him to quickly understand what is going on in the world.

"PUBLIC OPINION" (published every Friday, price Twopence, 32 pages) can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION," 30 & 31, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"I know of two Prime Ministers who have read regularly 'PUBLIC OPINION,'" said the "Daily News," May 15, 1907.

"We know of at least one who has misread it," added "Punch," May 29, 1907.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Robert Collyer, who has come once more to the old country to open the Free Library given by Mr. Carnegie to Ilkley, where his early years of apprenticeship and labour as a blacksmith were spent, preached at Chester last Sunday, as will be seen from our words of welcome and the report on another page. Mr. Collyer is announced to preach in London, at Essex Church, Kensington, on Sunday morning, Sept. 22, and also at Highgate on the same day. Announcement will no doubt be made before that date, to prevent any mistake as to these two engagements.

THE services at Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, are to be conducted to-morrow (Sunday) by the Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, minister of Arlington-street Church, Boston.

DR. MANCHOT, of Hamburg, the founder and first editor of the Protestantenblatt in Bremen, where he ministered for fifteen years, until 1882, has just celebrated the completion of his twenty-five years' activity in Hamburg. Dr. Manchot is one of the honoured foreign correspondents of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and his friends in this country will join in heartiest congratulations and good wishes.

"WHAT is Progress?" was the title of the "Phi Beta Kappa" address given by Mr. James Bryce at Harvard on June 27, and published in the August Atlantic Monthly. The question of the title Mr. Bryce confessed himself unable to answer, and feeling that the law of progress was too difficult to define, he ended in a somewhat melancholy and despairing note. Of man and the bark that carries him on the ocean of variable winds and unknown currents, his last word is: "He can do little to direct its course, and the mists that shroud the horizon hang as thick and low as they did when the voyage began."

In the previous examination of progress Mr. Bryce asked whether we can really say that there has been moral progress? "Who will even assert that the love of truth and the courage to deliver the truth, a virtue which lies at the root of many other virtues, has grown stronger and more common? Socrates and some of his contemporaries were conspicuous examples of it. So were Darwin and Pasteur, and your own Emerson. But among the contemporaries of Socrates there were Sophists, and the class is fully represented in our time also." And yet surely we may say that progress has been made. Socrates himself marked an immense step of progress, for think of what the ages before his time had been. And if there are still many Sophists in the world, are there not immeasurably more people who now care for truth, and understand what it means? And is there not a perfected ideal of human brotherhood, instinct with the self-forgetting Christian spirit, steadily making for the progress of mankind?

EMERSON'S "Phi Beta Kappa" address on "The American Scholar," given seventy years ago (the year before Mr. Bryce was born), was in better heart. "Patience," said Emerson, at the close of his address, "patience—with the shades of all the good and great for company; and for solace, the perspective of your own infinite life; and for work, the study and the communication of principles, the making those instincts prevalent; the conversion of the world. Is it not the chief disgrace in the world, not to be an unit—not to be reckoned one character—not to yield that peculiar fruit which each man was created to bear, but to be reckoned in the gross, in the hundred, or the thousand of the party, the section, to which we belong; and our opinion predicted geographically as the north, or the south? Not so, brothers and friends—please God, ours shall not be so. We will walk on our own feet; we will work with our own hands; we will speak our own minds. The study of letters shall be no longer a name for pity, for doubt, or for sensual indulgence. The dread of man, and the love of man shall be a wall of defence and a wreath of joy around all. A nation of men will for the first time exist, because each believes himself inspired by the Divine Soul which also inspires all men."

THE Trade Union Congress meeting at Bath this week represents 1,700,000 members. Among the delegates are 34 M.P.'s and many members of local governing bodies. The question of Old-Age Pensions is likely largely to occupy the attention of the Congress, which will also consider the custom of Government workshops and factories, Industrial Arbitration, Unemployment, Sweated Home-work, and Education. The Parliamentary Report of the Congress contains the following remarkable sentences:—"Men and women who toil with their hands are tired of society as at present organised—a life which too often metes out to them starvation in their old age. . . . Some may say that the condition of the working classes has improved greatly, but no man will say, who knows anything of the facts, that the state of the people as a whole has advanced in proportion to the increase in the national wealth."

THE report declares the provision of old age pensions to be "the most urgent of all social problems," and appeals for a vigorous campaign on the subject throughout the country in the coming autumn, noting with satisfaction that many of the trades are already taking up the matter very heartily. It expresses satisfaction at the proof of the political power in the hands of labour given by the Parliamentary record of the past eighteen months. The members are urged to take up with energy the following reforms:—Miners' legal eight-hour day and a reduction of hours in all trades, old age pensions, the unemployed, compulsory state insurance, land nationalisation amendment of the Poor Laws, and legal restriction of systematic overtime. Approval is expressed of the Merchant Shipping Act, the Trade Disputes Act, the Compensation for Accidents Act, and acts relating to the provision of meals and the census of production.

AN interesting discussion on militarism in education is going on in the columns of The Labour Leader. It is evident that Socialists are much divided upon the issue. But in many quarters there is a persistent conviction that the current enthusiasm for a "Citizen Army" is based upon feelings which are at variance with the international character of social movement.

A NEW ZEALAND resident, now on a visit to his native England, writes to the Spectator giving interesting particulars of old age pensions in the colony where he has long resided. The pension granted was 7s., and an amending Act raised it to 12s. At the last election, he affirms, when the question of increasing the pension was made one of the issues to be voted in, the majority in favour was far greater than when the Government carried its first Bill. His fellow colonists consider, he says, that if a man has reached the age of sixty-five and been a resident in the colony twenty-five years and during that period faithfully paid his rates and taxes, so far fulfilling as a good citizen his civic and State responsibilities, as well, perhaps, as rearing a family, and then at the age stated finds himself unable further to work and support himself he is entitled to recognition from the State, and therefore receives the 10s. a week. In the present session of Parliament at Wellington the Government has proposed to set aside 1,000,000 acres of land as an endowment for these pensions.

MUNICIPAL enterprise in England, though we know it to be behind that of Germany, is far ahead of America. So we are told by Mrs. Leonora Austin Hamlin, director of the Municipal Museum, of Chicago, who is on a visit of inspection to Europe. She considers our tramways splendid, and says that there is not a city in America which owns its own tramways. But what our cities are beginning to do in the direction of town-planning, and hope to gain legal powers to do more efficiently in the future, has been effected to a large extent in some American cities by private enterprise. Notably in Chicago voluntary societies have been instrumental in surrounding the city with a belt of parks and broad avenues. There are already 34 parks and a large number of well-provided playgrounds. The Playgrounds Association, a group of private persons, has established eleven recreation grounds in a little over a year; and now the Commercial Club, whose members include most of the richest business men in the city, has raised $50,000 among its members to engage experts to draw up a plan for the improvement of the city. The scheme has been drawn up, and an Act passed authorising the issue of bonds for $10,000,000 to carry it out. The people of Chicago will be called on to vote on the various parts of the scheme, which includes the laying out of another great belt of parks outside the present city limits. Mrs. Hamlin, in an interview with a representative of the Tribune, in which she gave these and other interesting details, said that St. Paul, Cleveland, San Francisco, Washington and Harrisburg each had a similar improvement society.

LAST week's Citizen, now published weekly at Letchworth, has an extended report of the Summer School already referred to in these notes. In the last of his addresses on "Meditation," Mr. Hare spoke of Faith, Prayer, and Miracle as a series of inseparable concepts, and read a passage from Feuerbach on the essential character of Prayer as based on belief in the omnipotence of human feeling, and as itself the act through which subjective desire becomes translated into objective phenomena. He urged the importance of meditation upon "things in themselves," and the need for the realisation in consciousness of our subjective ideals, reading in illustration of his thesis many notable passages from the scriptures of all times, and one especially from the writings of Dr. Martineau.

MR. J. W. GRAHAM, of Dalton Hall, gave a fine answer to the question "What is Christianity?" in last week's Nation, commenting on an article in the previous number by Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson on "Christianity and Civilisation." "It is happily not difficult historically," Mr. Graham says, "to discover the secret of Jesus. No doubt the records have been edited and 'revised'—treated according to current theories of miracle and tinted here and there with the dye of a dawning clericalism; but the main effect of the preaching of the Gospel of the Kingdom is writ large in the experience of the first believers. They tell us that they had become new men and women, that old things had passed away and all things become new; that they counted learning and wealth less than nothing in comparison with the glory that had been revealed to them; an effect so glorious that they were sure the angels had in vain sought for a similar experience. They found that in actual practice the spirit could rule the flesh; they could do all things through Christ who strengthened them. They had a testimony within them, a consciousness which those who merely kill the body could by no means take from them, that they were in God and God in them. They knew that they were children of a Father from whose character and will everything local or cruel or sensual in earlier divinities was absent. They had ceased to be their own; they had been crucified with Christ, and they felt that with their Master they were thereby become children of the Resurrection. They had, for this world, a consolation which bore up their hearts under quite unusual ills, and for the next a measureless hope." It was a spiritual victory, Mr. Graham adds, inspired by a personal love. To this Paul witnesses. It was with this experience that Christianity began, and by it continues to live.

A WELCOME sign that no section of the Christian Church is uninfluenced by the happier spirit of recent religious thought and endeavour, appears in a report of a sermon by the Rev. Hugh Rodger, of Bournemouth, a minister of the Presbyterian Church of England, in the course of which he says: "All new and newest theology is doing something, with all its defects, to bring the time when men shall live, move, and have their being in the spirit of religion—a spirit in which life's best things shall be infinitely better, and its worst things unable to live; a spirit in which all lawful pleasures shall be ennobled and intensified, all troubles reduced and made more bearable, and all life's trifles dignified as playing their part in forming immortal character."

THE new Principal of Brecon Congregational College is the Rev. Thos. Lewis, M.A., B.D. Mr. Lewis, who was born at Conwill-Elvet, Carmarthenshire, in 1869, has had a distinguished academic career. He is an alumnus of the Lancashire Independent College. When he was twenty-one he took his London M.A. degree, and subsequently the B.D. of St. Andrews. After studying Hebrew, theology, and New Testament literature at the University of Marburg, he returned to England to take up a tutorship in his old College, and in 1898, in the same capacity, went to Brecon, where he now becomes Principal. Mr. Lewis has a great enthusiasm for music, and is well known as an Eistedfodd conductor at Welsh musical festivals.

THE outline scheme drawn up by a committee of Free Church M.P.'s and suggested for next year's Education Bill, is as follows:—

(1) That no school shall be recognised as a public elementary school receiving support from rates and taxes unless it be a school provided by the local education authorities.

(2) That a school so provided shall be within reasonable reach of every child.

(3) That the local education authority shall be at liberty to arrange that in all schools under their control the proceedings during the school hours of each day shall be opened and closed by the singing of a hymn, the reading of a passage from the Bible, and the repetition of the Lord's Prayer, and shall further be at liberty to arrange for such Bible teaching during school hours as does not contravene Section 14 of the Education Act, 1870.

(4) That in any public elementary school as defined in Resolution 1, where a reasonable number of the parents of the children attending the school or the parochial electors apply in writing to the local education authority for the use of the school-house in order to give religious instruction of a special character outside school hours, such application shall be granted.

(5) That the parent of a child attending a public elementary school not be under any obligation to cause the child to attend at the school-house during the time allotted to religious instruction or religious observance.

(6) That all teachers in a public elementary school shall be appointed by the local education authority, and such appointment shall be made without any reference whatsoever to the religious faith of the teacher. The teacher shall not be required, as part of his duties as teacher, to give any religious instruction, and shall not be permitted to give any religious instruction of a special character in the school building in which he holds an appointment, or to the children attending his school.

(7) That if the trustees or owners of any non-provided school desire to carry on the school exempt from the conditions which apply to a school provided by the local education authority, they shall only be allowed to do so if:

(a) Three-fourths of the parents of the children attending the school desire that the school shall be so exempt.

(b) There is a school provided by the local education authority within easy access of the children residing in the area where the said non-provided school is situated.

(c) They will guarantee the whole cost of maintaining the school, save for a Parliamentary grant the same in amount per child as that paid to the schools provided by the local education authority; and

(d) An inspector of the Board of Education is able to report annually that the school-house and the secular instruction given therein are of the same standard of efficiency as that required by the Board of Education to qualify a similar provided school to receive the Parliamentary grant.

ONE more tribute to the memory of Joseph Joachim we must refer to here, and that is in last week's Spectator, by Sir Charles Stanford, of Cambridge University, and the Royal College of Music, who writes with intimate knowledge and true appreciation of the greatness of Joachim's personality. Its pure and noble quality he describes in contrast to that of Paganini, quoting the opinion of two competent judges who had known both men. "I gathered from them," says Sir Charles, "that they would have characterised the Italian's attraction as the more diabolically brilliant, and the Hungarian's as the more divinely intimate. They summed them up in the words 'Paganini for once, but Joachim for always.'" The conclusion of this tribute is as follows:—"It is difficult to realise that this great figure—the one man in Germany who solidly and consistently, through evil and good report, by example and by precept, upheld the traditions of the best and greatest, and accepted nothing which he thought of baser metal for the sake of a passing popularity—will be seen no more." If the generation to come must needs grow up in ignorance of how the C sharp minor Quartet of Beethoven can be made 'understood of the people,' it must not be allowed to forget how the Chaconne of Bach came out of the dusty back volumes of an unplayable mathematical Bach to become the first ambitious effort of every rising violinist, or how the Violin Concerto of Beethoven, deemed impossible for nearly twenty years after its composer's death, took its place as the greatest work of its class in existence. This, and much more also than this short paper can tell, did Joseph Joachim accomplish; and let it be added that great as was his genius, sincere as was his modesty, and loyal as was his friendship, he had one gift more rare than all—a large, true heart. Two sentences from letters written by men, neither of them musicians, and one of them personally unknown to him, seem a fitting close to these inadequate lines:—"It is good to have known such a man, to have felt the touch of his hand, seen the smile on his face, and heard the sound of his voice, all apart from his violin." And: "He has left the world the poorer, save for his example."

A PIONEER OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

IT falls to the lot of few ministers to maintain so full and active a rôle, and pass through such a varied and stormy career as that described in the present autobiography.* It is the story of three or four lives in one, making one marvel at the resolute energy, the fierce passion for work, the intrepid missionary zeal, the enthusiasm for public service which were poured together into one vessel, and at length caused a serious fracture. It is pleasant reading for the religious reformer to trace the path of an ardent youth, who, upon his return from Holland where the student had speedily performed his pilgrimage from the old faith to the new, ventured in a country, where the forces of orthodoxy are paramount, to initiate the forlorn cause of liberal religion, and withstood alone and unaided the serried ranks marshalled to destroy it, and maintained against tremendous odds a splendid and triumphant warfare.

For nearly thirty years Mr. Fauré served the cause he had brought into life in Cape Town, ministering to the congregation, publishing his lectures, defending the principles of liberal theology in the press and on the platform, an Athanasius contra mundum of South Africa. But this work did not exhaust his energies. He has been a political agitator, inspiring the community to demand improved legislation in many necessary reforms. He served the Supreme Court for many years as interpreter until a public protest against an act of monstrous legal injustice brought upon him the frown of the Government, to whom criticism is disloyalty; he came over with President Kruger and his delegates to act as interpreter to Lord Derby during the delicate negotiations following Majuba; he has been, and is still, an examiner for the South African College; as a Freemason he was appointed to the honoured position of Deputy Grand Master for South Africa; he has made a serious investigation into Spiritualism; he has been for years editor of a Liberal newspaper; has beaten a professional champion at chess, and takes interest in every subject that affects the welfare of man. To those who have known him personally, and in lesser measure to those who will read his reminiscences, the impression is conveyed of a keen intellect and large-hearted personality, a frank, sensitive, courageous nature, in which humour and pathos, critical acumen and poetic sentiment, compassion for the oppressed and indignation against wrong blend harmoniously together. As I read his interesting pages, written in an easy, fluent, conversational style, I seemed to be sitting with him once more on the rocks outside his beautiful home at Camp's Bay looking out on the ocean, which he describes as symbolising eternal change, behind us the mountains typifying eternal rest, and hearing his voice again; now breaking into laughter as he recalled some tilt of his fighting days, now saddened in the memory of the great crime involved in the Anglo-Boer war. The chapter on the war is the longest in the book, and every jingo might peruse with advantage the eloquent period on the demand now made to "forgive and forget." Mr. Fauré's calls himself a "Huguenot of the Huguenots." His pro-Boerism is something deeper than blood. It is the spirit's native desire for equity. He is willing to forgive and co-operate. He is determined to make the best of the situation in the interest of the land which is his fatherland, his motherland, his country; and though "the Hermit of Camp's Bay may not live to see the South African sun in all its glory at meridian altitude, he is thankful that he has lived through the night and has been privileged to welcome the dawn."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

SEPTEMBER completes the first half-yearly volume of the Albany Review (formerly the Independent) with a most valuable number. We note especially three articles of great importance. Sir John Macdonell writes on "The Hague Conference: Gains and Losses" clearly showing (though he wrote before Sir Edward Fry's speech on the limitation of armaments) how, with all its disappointments, the present Conference marks a real step of progress, and furnishes experience which must be fruitful of much more adequate progress in the future. He pleads especially for more adequate preparation beforehand, and publicity, to insure a better mutual understanding among the Powers, and to secure better results. Then there is a searching article by Edward Carpenter on "Morality Under Socialism," which is really a consideration of the essential meaning of good and evil, which is bound to stimulate earnest thought. His own position is expressed in the statement, "Morality in its essence is not a code, but simply the realisation of the Common Life. . . . To liberate this instinct of the Common Life, freeing it from hard and cramping rules, and to let it take its own form or forms—grafted on and varied, of course, by the personal and selective element of affection and sympathy—is the hope that lies before the world to-day for the solution of all sorts of moral and social problems." And, thirdly, we would call special attention to Baron von Hügel's article on "The Relations between God and Man." It is a study of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's book "The New Theology," for the unavoidable delay of which he expresses regret—but such an article certainly does not come too late. All readers of the book should read this article. Here we simply give one passage on the greatest question of all:—

"I take it that we can retain the grand freshness and immediacy of feeling of the Mystics, and yet can escape from their theoretic extravagances, if we insist with St. Teresa that the human soul is not, in any of its depths and reaches, God or a part or mode of God; yet that, in its depths, the human soul is actually touched, inhabited by God, the Creator Himself, and not only by Grace, a creature. In this way we avoid a Deistic, spatial outside-ness and distance of God, and yet His Immanence involves no identity, His Transcendence is fully preserved. We get a Panentheism, but escape all Pantheism.

It would, surely, be well if such a realisation of God's wondrous nearness and likeness, in spite of his grand farness and difference—a truth so dear to St. Paul and other great Christian saints—became again more common among believers. For only such a warm, tender, deep and penetrating conviction can be sufficiently operative in the human soul to repel these and supplant all hankerings after a Pantheistic Immanence."

The Contemporary opens with an elaborate and valuable article by Professor H. Stanley Jevons on "The Development of an International Parliament," commenting on the significance of The Hague Conference, and working out the ideal of what might come of such international agreements in an actual "federation of the world." Sir W. M. Ramsay, writing on "St. Paul's Philosophy of History," concludes that it was based on the conviction that the history of the Mediterranean world, as he knew it, was a story of degeneration and decay. Mr. E. E. Lang, describing the "All-India Moslem League," sees in it a hopeful sign, making for the better government of India. We note also an interesting article by L. March Philipps on "Gothic Architecture and the Gothic Race."

In the Nineteenth Century and After, Bishop Hamilton Baynes writes on "The New Theology and the Doctrine of the Fall." Religion, he declares, must be always old, and theology always new, because religion is the abiding fact of life, by which we are bound to our fellow-men and to the universe, a fact which in our theology we shall always variously define and explain. For a fall of man he finds scientific proof in the fact of the drunkard, in presence of other races of temperate animals: "The Fall does not consist in the fact that the man was infinite and has become finite, but in the fact that, being infinite, he has consciously identified himself with finite satisfaction." And as a final word the Bishop indicates the way of deliverance: "As the identification of the infinite self with finite satisfaction has spread, like a taint, through that larger personality in which, more or less consciously, we all share, so the identification of self, in the perfect sympathy of absolute unselfishness, with the whole of humanity in the life and death of Christ, has opened up the new possibility of holiness to the race, which is expressed by our Lord's phrase—the Kingdom of God." We note also the articles by the Marchioness of Londonderry on "School Hygiene," and by Florence B. Low on "The Education Ladder and the Girl."

In the September Cornhill the two serial stories, "The Broken Road," by Mr. A. E. W. Mason, M.P., and "Wroth," by Mr. and Mrs. Egerton Castle, are continued. Mr. Arthur Benson contributes another instalment of his musings "At Large," this time the subject being "Friendship." Sir E. Maunde Thompson, K.C.B., tells the story of "The British Museum Reading Room," and Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson writes an appreciation of his friend, the late Sir Spencer Walpole. Dr. W. H. Fitchett concludes his papers, "Amongst the Mutiny Cities of India," with "Lucknow."

TWO SOCIAL STUDY NOVELS.*

WE have coupled these two books together for a brief notice, not because of any close affinity of aim, but for the convenience of reference. They have this much in common that both are clever stories of sustained interest, when one is fairly launched upon the theme, and both are full of the excitement of battle, though in one case it is an economic warfare in an imaginary coming time, and in the other conflict with city roughs and villains in a dangerous quarter of London twenty years ago. Both plots culminate in mob violence, out of which comes a happy issue for the righteous cause, and for the love story, which is interwoven with it; but here the similarity of the two books ceases, for the anonymous story of "What Might Have Been," while it takes us into a new world in which people have learnt to fly, finds room for a grotesque caricature of working men and socialists, in the supposed regime of a socialistic government; while Mr. Arthur Paterson's "John Glynn," with all its vivid imagination and the glamour of "the ring," is based upon a serious study of life among the poor in London, during many years of work for the Charity Organisation Society. This serious side of the study may appear to be only incidental to the excitement of a successful novel, but it is at least in touch with reality, and we shall quote presently an instance or two of this wholesome quality of the book.

The satire of "What Might Have Been" is laboured and its caricature preposterous, but there are some fine bits of imagination in the book. "The coming of wings" furnishes a striking incident at the beginning, and again towards the close of the story, when at the critical moment, the hero, the leader of the forces of enlightenment and private property against the intolerable tyranny and fatuity of the socialistic Government, flies through a terrific storm, from one point of battle to the central office of the "League of Unity" in London, which is surrounded by a raging mob. The description of that flight is too long to quote, but it is realised with great power and leads on to the very dramatic, if not melodramatic climax of the story. Another episode, which pictures Sir John Hampden, the other leader of the party of enlightenment, performing a humble office of brotherly kindness, as a member of the Order of St. Martin of Tours, stands out from the rest of the story and touches deeper chords of what is truly noble in humanity, apart from its connection with the exciting movement of the drama.

We do not propose to tell Mr. Paterson's story here, but simply say that its interest is admirably sustained, and its dramatic force commands our admiration. Serious workers among the London poor at the present day may shake their heads over the introduction of the heroic Yorkshireman, with his tremendous fists and New York "knuckle-dusters," his fortune made in the Western States and his keen sagacity and herculean strength trained in that wild life, as a fitting instrument of the Charity Organisation Society, for battle against the tyrant of "The Nile" and the gang of thieves he is making and holding under his remorseless sway; but we may take Mr. Paterson's romance for its own sake, and as regards present day ideals of influence and work among the poor leave it in its "twenty years ago." Apart from this there is woven into this story much true experience of the character and needs of the poor in such city quarters as he represents, and there is also a picture, under a thin veil, of the Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society, drawn with warm admiration by one who shares his social enthusiasm and the principles on which his work is based.

"How would you raise the condition of the poor?" the Secretary asked of John Glynn at their first interview. And here we quote (pp. 18—20):—

"At such a question from such a man John drew himself together as he had once done in old days when a great professional of the 'P. R.' in New York had challenged him to a turn with the boxing gloves. For an instant he suspected a practical joke, but a glance into Mr. Brooke's eyes, questioning and grave, dispelled that notion at once.

"I would not begin by giving charitable relief," he said, simply, 'my plan would be to brace up every man, woman, and child to be independent and stiff-backed. Charity folk go about making things soft and comfortable. Now, in our country, when a man feels comfortable he lies down and goes to sleep. There may be no particular harm in that if he can get all he wants without work. But it is deadly if he has to support a home, and to do his duty as a citizen. That needs a strong back.'

"Mr. Brooke gave a joyous laugh.

"Verily the wise men of this generation come from the West, and we of the Old World receive wisdom from the Land of the Setting Sun. Agreed. But how about those who have grown up with weak backs? Would you let them starve, put them in prison, or build a lethal chamber for them? Stay, let me put the question in a personal way. You are going to Relton. That is Brabant's idea and a good one. Now, Relton abounds in wasters and weaklings. When they come to you from parson, or visitor, or what-not, who is tired of giving bread which has not been earned, and is honestly anxious, perhaps, to find a way of strengthening the backs if you can tell him how—what would you do?"

"Mr. Brooke was certainly in earnest now. Even the smile on the lips had vanished, and John felt that he was faced by a question which no general statement or platitude would satisfy. It came from the man's heart, and upon the answer would depend his judgment of the worthiness of this new recruit to be a fellow-worker in the cause. This feeling inspired John to give back the best that was in him. The face of his questioner, with eyes of frosty blue—mobile and expressive, yet firm as steel—was stimulating and inspiring beyond any he had ever known. A man for the strong was Edward Brooke. He made John think of an eagle in flight, careless of all small things beneath him, a man who was unerring in his detection of unrealities or shams, and who would pounce upon any false doctrine of social betterment, strike it with pitiless logic, and tear it in pieces without ruth or shift.

"It is not easy to tell what I would do," John answered slowly; "but I know what I would aim at doing. First, I would make the weak back want to be strong. If a man will not use his own strength it is worse than useless to touch him, for the more you do the less he'll try, and the heavier he will lean on you. So I would prick him and sting him until he stood up, then test him. When he stood the test I would help him, and make every friend and relative he had help him, to realise that having once got upon his feet he must keep on the move upward. He should have no rest, if I could manage it, till he was doing for himself. At the same time, though I would harry and hunt and hold him, I would make him feel we were friends, you know. It would be no good without that."

"Good!" ejaculated Mr. Brooke. "Very good."

"There are two ways of doing things," John went on, warming to his work under Mr. Brooke's approving face, as a man digging on a cold winter's morning basks in the beams of the sun. "I am the son of a country clergyman, and saw charity given, not by my father, but by his neighbours, as you give slop to swine. . . . That is why I detest what is called charity. It is my notion that to help a man you must take him by the hand as an equal, get inside his mind, and make him get inside yours, as friends."

We had marked another passage for quotation (pp. 302-3) on the causes of social and physical degeneration amongst city toilers, but the reference must suffice, and this one sentence:—

"Dr. Stansfield was a socialist in theory, but being a doctor by profession, and a scientific man by training, he found in practice that for one woman who needed material aid to give her children a better chance in life, there were a hundred who needed more common-sense, a rudimentary knowledge of domestic economy, and a little skill in plain cooking."

THE Co-operative Holidays Association has had a very successful season, now nearing its close. Over 10,000 guests have been received at its various guest houses. It has ten centres in the British islands and three foreign centres, the latter in Switzerland, in the Vulkanische Eifel of Germany and in Brittany. The new centre at Dinan has proved very popular; and those opened at Halesowen and Bexhill-on-Sea are well patronised. The idea of the Association is to provide a healthy, well-organised holiday with picnic excursions to the most interesting places in the neighbourhood, field talks, social intercourse and companionship. A song book is provided, and songs are sung in chorus in the open air and at the evening social hour in the drawing room. Good fellowship is characteristic of these holiday parties. A delightful feature is the Sunday afternoon service, usually held in the open air, in which members of many different denominations join together in bright and cheerful worship and praise, and the leaders are from as various religious communions as the congregations.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE DOCTRINE OF MORAL FREEDOM.

SIR,—The concluding paragraphs of Professor Upton's article in your last issue claim some words of reply from me, seeing that he put to me one or two direct and searching questions. His severe, yet courteous and kindly criticism of one of my little papers on a "Religious Faith for To-day," does me greater honour than that simple utterance of my own convictions merit. Being unlearned in philosophy and untrained in philosophical discussion, I cannot hope to meet his attack or answer his objections to much purpose. I am sure I had no thought of assailing Dr. Martineau's teaching; I was only trying to state the problem of religious faith as it had cleared itself a little in my own experience.

When Professor Upton asks how I know it "as a certainty," that whatever happens in the universe "is determined by the whole force of the cosmic process," I can only answer that I do not know it as a certainty. But the conception of the world as a unity carries with it the conception of everything that happens in the world as being in vital relation to the whole. If any act, whether of human will or of stellar convulsion, could stand out by itself, as a distinct and disconnected proceeding, the unity would be broken, and something like chaos or caprice would have entered. Hence at the back of the smallest event lies the great cosmic purpose, and nothing less than that can be its ultimate or final cause. I would not say it is so of a certainty; I would only say I cannot conceive it otherwise. The pragmatist, I know, does conceive it otherwise, by bluntly denying the unity; but then, to me, the pragmatist is unconvincing. Professor Upton, I think, does not deny the unity of the whole. Can he tell us how an act of the will can be released from the control of the spiritual energies of the universe without becoming an act of caprice—a lawless proceeding, in fact.

Professor Upton asks how this belief in the whole force of the cosmic process can "co-exist with the belief that in moments of temptation it is possible to determine ourselves in either of two possible directions." But whilst conscious that we do "determine ourselves," must we not ask what determined us—what in all the great past and all the surrounding present made us the persons that we are, so that, acting according to our real character, as thus far developed, we make one choice and not another? Surely we do always act as vital or organic parts of the great whole, not as separate beings standing out in space and time, independent of all else, doing just as we like there!

My object, in the little paper on "Immanence and Personality," was to suggest that we may fully accept the conclusion which the idea of unity seems to demand, and yet not deny the direct deliverance of consciousness which gives us the sense and the joy of spiritual freedom. I must act as a being free to reflect and choose among several possible courses of action, but, having chosen, I am not free to claim that I made such choice as a being standing alone, uninfluenced and unswayed by the "mighty sum of things," to the soul of which I owe my existence every hour. I cannot, in thought, reconcile these two things; but I can accept them, and be inwardly assured that there is a reconciliation. My ignorance of what that reconciliation is comes of the fact that both the universe and my own personality are too deep for my comprehension. It may be very childish, and the sign of a hopelessly unphilosophic mind, but I am strangely happy and content in the presence of this mystery. To act as a free responsible being, and yet to know that I am but a child of the Eternal who is responsible for me, is to be filled with the joy and the consolation of real life. The sense of individuality is a call to the utmost endeavour and a ceaseless struggle with the limits of finitude; the assurance of a universal Presence of sustaining and impelling Life, that is within and yet beyond, makes the unattained ideal a living and pervading reality which, even in the moment of failure, is more truly ours than that failure, because it belongs to, and is, the Eternal movement of things, to which we also belong.

Perhaps the joy and the sense of power which come to us when we do really act as free beings, and put forth all our strength are a sign of this very fact that the Eternal consciously realises itself in the individual thus. To be our own true highest self is to yield absolutely to the power of the Spirit—to be the very instrument of God. And perhaps just there lies the hint of that reconciliation in thought which our philosophy so often fails to give. In feeling and in action we do sometimes have glimpses of the truth which our logic somehow missed by the way.

September 3, 1907.

THE September Calendar of the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, records the placing of a beautiful monumental slab (with bas-relief) in the cloisters of the church bearing the following inscription:—

"William Rathbone, born February 11, 1819; died March 6, 1902, who for the love of God and in the spirit of his Master, Christ, spent his life in the service of his fellow-men. He laboured for them in Parliament from 1868 to 1895, and as Guardian of the Poor from 1867 until his death. With thoughtful sympathy he brought the comfort of trained nursing into the homes of the suffering poor—first, in this (his native) city in 1859, and later throughout the length and breadth of the country. He instituted the Training School for Nurses in 1862. He encouraged learning, and by his wise influence and generous aid University College was founded. His unwavering attachment to civil and religious liberty; his life of high ideals and untiring energy; his steadfast faith, unfailing hope and wide charity have endeared his memory to his fellow-worshippers, by whom this tablet has been erected."

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

"I WONDER what the wedding will be like," said Fräulein Mina, "in Valcava to-morrow."

"What wedding?" I asked.

"Ui jesses!" cried the Tyrolerin, "don't you know? But you will have to marry them!"

"Shall I, indeed? Then they had better make haste and ask me."

Off goes the Fräulein to fetch mine host, for this happened early in the month we spent in the inn at Cierfs, waiting for the Pfarrhaus furniture. Telephones were set to work, and before we had finished our coffee the postmaster of Cierfs was announced.

"My colleague of Santa Maria," said he, "who is also Kirchengvorsteher, ought to have written to you a week ago. The bridegroom is my brother-in-law, and he wants to be married to-morrow at Valcava at half-past eight. Everything is in order. They will send a carriage for you."

You see, until late in September I am the only Pfarrer this valley can boast, and must do all odd jobs in Valcava and Santa Maria. Then the Pfarrer-elect of those two parishes will come into residence, and relieve me at the advance guard of Protestantism. At Fuldera I found a belated official request, and I spent the afternoon in walking down to Santa Maria to borrow a liturgy. Rinaldo went with me, and suggested an extension of our journey to Münster, because rumour alleged that a horse-doctor there would also act, on occasion, as barber. Investigation on the spot confirmed this report, but also disclosed that the versatile artist was away from home and expected back next week. Made bold by despair, we submitted ourselves to the razor and shears of the Valcava sexton, a superannuated stone-mason, and both live to tell the tale.

Next morning I was deposited, not, as I had expected, at the church, but at the home of the bride, where light refreshments were set out, and the members of the bridal procession slowly assembled. Half-an-hour later we marched to the music of the bells down the steep street, the bride leading, on her brother's arm, while the bridegroom, his best man, and I formed the second rank. At the church door the groom claimed his lady, and I passed before them to the Taufstein—the stone table which is used as a pedestal for the baptismal basin, and also for the communion vessels.

Happily it was one of my good days for German—sometimes the spring spouts very unwillingly, in jerky jets—and I could speak to this young pair much as I used to speak when I was one of the two "authorised persons" in Leicester. A word that really goes home at such a time may do much good, forestall much possible evil. But do the poor parson's words, at such a time, ever make a nest in the memory to which they are addressed?

There was no music. Save the "ja" and "ja" which meant so much, no voice was heard except mine.

The bride, on her husband's arm, led the way back, and I followed next with brother and best man. There was a breakfast, at which my civil colleague proposed the toast in Romanish. He lives with his aged wife in the uppermost house in the village, and upon the sitting-room wall hang the portraits of their three sons, all cut off suddenly in the prime of hopeful careers. One of these was that Pfarrer of Silvaplana who died so tragically last year, accidentally shot by his own gun. "When I am asked to describe a Christian," I once heard one of his colleagues say, "I do so in two words—Domenic Pünchera." I can understand this very well. The summary of what is best in human character comes to my lips also in two words—Donald Wilson.

I slipped away early, for I had a sick visit to pay, but Rinaldo and Martina, who were at the church, and were asked to the breakfast, tell me that there were other toasts and much merriment before the happy couple set off for their honeymoon in the Tyrol and Venice.

This wedding recalls to my mind another, a very terrible occasion, when I committed the unpardonable sin. The bridegroom had, I confess, mentioned the date a fortnight before, but he had also promised to send the certificate as a reminder, and had forgotten to do so. The whisper my pillow gave me as I awoke, "Something special to-day," interpreted itself straightway, "Special, indeed! Our eldest son is going to school"—videlicet, to a Kindergarten. Corva and I escorted him to the mystic portal. Then I accompanied her to the printer's, to look after the proofs of a hymn-book she was editing. We met friends, and I was chatting, good easy man, with all the leisureliness in the world, when—horror! up gallops a white-beribboned coach, with a scandalised sacristan on the box. He leaps down, tears open the door and with an indescribable gesture of mingled sorrow and reproof, sweeps me within. Oh, willow willow waly!

Whether any of my words went home to that pale bride's soul I do not know, but some of hers went home to mine. The mnemonic link between these otherwise dissimilar weddings is merely this, that in neither case was there any proffer of a fee.

When I mention this afterwards to Martina she looks at me curiously, and I remember what a charming reward I captured in her case. I admit all that Martinus has to say. I only rejoin, he ought to have taken better care of his rights. When Corva and I—but this is a digression.

Martina, by the way, is a very pleasant companion on a walk, for this reason, among others—that wherever she goes Flora spreads her daintiest wares. "Flowers laugh before her in their beds, And fragrance in her footing treads." Alpen-rosen were cheap when she was here, and if she had only stayed over my induction we should doubtless have lighted on those three or four stars of Edelweiss which fell to the scythe the other day in Fuldera, right down on the valley floor.

The induction ceremony took place at Cierfs and Fuldera on July 14. It was conducted, as the law directs, by the Präses of my Kolloquium, the "Unteren-gadin," Pfarrer Clavuot of Lavin. The church at Cierfs was hung with pine-branch garlands and artificial roses. At Fuldera Alpen-rosen were worked into the pine festoons. In both churches the Taufstein was heaped with flowers. As soon as the singing was over we both stood before the Taufstein, and, after a prayer, the Präses addressed a charge to the parish, and another to me, in eloquent Romanish. His text was Isaiah lii. 7: "O quant bels sun sün ils munts ils peis da quel chi porta bunas novas." He dwelt upon the weary climbing, the footsore arrival of the messenger, and his support in the joy of his tidings. Then I mounted the pulpit and preached, in German, my inaugural sermon. I chose for a text Psalm cxxi. 2.

To these kind people, my own parishioners, I could talk more intimately than to the strange crowd in Schuls. I spoke to them of sacred things, vocation, candidature, while the echoes of old voices sounded faintly on my ears—"I will endeavour myself, the Lord being my helper"—"Take thou authority in the church of God." Then came the tale of inner strife, the beckonings of Rome, the crumbling of foundations, the wrench of farewell, the wondering discovery of a new land where faith wears no bonds, the happy ministry, its interruption, and now its fresh beginning. "I have worked hitherto in great towns, and now I come to this valley, populated with pines, arves, and larches, where the rush of the torrent sounds above the voice of man"—and between my slow words we could hear, even in the church, the mad waters of the Rombach. "I come from an old kingdom, littered with feudal ruins, to this most republican of republics; from work amid my own countrymen to you, the scions of another stock, bred under different traditions; from preaching in English, to the use of two languages, neither of which I have mastered, while one of them is still unfamiliar to me." Some such things I said, and then spoke of that which was common to my old work and this new work—humanity which is more than nationality, the ideal of freedom here and there, the stress on life rather than on formulæ. I bespoke their help, and committed them and myself to the Help Supreme.

When these two services were over—that at Fuldera did duty also for Lü—all provisions of the law regarding entry upon my office had been fulfilled, and the routine of normal work lay before me.

OUR worship needs to be more humanly and divinely warm. Channing calls a church without devotion "the coldest place on earth." Rational instruction, or the thought-side of religion, may well claim a large place; but the sermon itself requires an atmosphere. Unless our "exercises" are merely formal, hymn and prayer, too, will kindle and blaze with heavenly light. We want also the cheer and comfort of human fellowship; we want to bring our families together as part of a larger family, under the sheltering name of a common Father. Home life will be all the richer and sweeter if we carry from the church a feeling of broader brotherhood, a sense of kinship with other men, women, and children, and some hint of our relationship to all who share our common nature. And our custom of clasping each other's hands itself becomes more and more like a sacrament when we have meditated together on higher themes, and joined heart and voice in some uplifting service.—Charles G. Ames.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HOLIDAY WITH GRANDFATHER.

VI.

THE walk across the common to the village post office was the beginning of a series of daily rambles, all of them rendered pleasant by grandfather's unflinching good humour and delight in all the beautiful things to be found on every side. There was a great amount of the child still lingering in the heart of the old man, and, day by day, the presence of Fred and Susie seemed to be making him younger, so that Mrs. Simpson with great joy declared that "the master's just like a boy again, and seems to be years younger than he was before his two visitors came." So, on every fine day the four (for Cholly generally put in a claim to join them) would sally forth on the most delightful expeditions, walking often several miles and sometimes carrying lunch with them, so that there might be no need to hurry back for a midday meal.

But although grandfather was full of information, and could answer nearly all the questions put to him, I think he helped the children most, without knowing it, by the way in which he went about whatever he was doing. He was never fussy or jerky,—indeed so gentle and quiet was he that birds, bees, butterflies, fishes, lizards, and all the more timid and wary animals would allow him to approach quite close to them, without darting off in alarm. By noting and imitating this quiet way of doing things, Fred and Susie found out how much may be learnt about the form and habits of wild things, that could never be known by looking at a dead "preserved" (?) specimen, in a cabinet.

One of their most delightful rambles was that in the wood through which they had walked on the evening of their arrival,—the "enchanted forest." On this expedition they were never more than a mile away from home; yet, as they wandered to and fro, among the trees, or sat for a while on some mossy bank, quietly observing, they found so much to interest them that, when lunch time came, the two young enthusiasts begged to return to the wood again in the afternoon and to spend the whole day there. There is not time for me to describe in detail, or even to make out a list of all the wonderful and beautiful things they saw. The antics of a family of squirrels amused and captivated Susie, whilst Fred found the ant-hill with their myriads of busy workers a most fascinating study, indeed more than an hour was spent in watching one nest, while grandfather told the tale of what was going on inside it.

When he begun his story there were scores and hundreds of ants, coming out and entering into the nest by numerous openings. Presently the ants ceased to come out, whilst great multitudes began to collect from all quarters and to run hastily into the nest. Then grandfather, though the sun was shining and there were few clouds, said, "we shall have rain this afternoon," and, sure enough, in less than half an hour later, the clouds were collecting dark and threatening, and a distant rolling of thunder could be heard. By this time all the wandering ants had collected in their dome-shaped nest and not an opening was to be seen on its whole surface; the busy ants had barricaded the entrances and made all tight and snug,—to keep out the rain. It is indeed marvellous to see how well ants, bees, and many other insects can forecast the weather,—knowing beforehand when it is going to be wet or fine.

The thunderstorm came on quickly, and drove the three nature students home early in the afternoon. This gave them a long evening indoors and it was on this occasion that Fred was enabled to give grandfather a great treat. Before starting for the forest ramble in the morning, he had been down to the pond at the bottom of the garden, and had collected some of the smaller waterweeds floating on its surface. These he had placed in a large glass jar of pond water, in the window of his room, intending to look at fragments of the weed through the microscope, whenever a convenient opportunity occurred. The wet evening was just the opportunity needed, so Fred, following the directions of his friend, the science master, arranged his microscope and placed a very small fragment of waterweed on a slide in a drop of pond water. He placed this on the stage of the microscope and focussed the instrument. At first their did not appear to be anything very interesting, but soon the minute water animals, gaining confidence, began to expand and display themselves in all their marvellous beauty and perfection. There were scores and hundreds of living crystals cups each on a long, slender, slightly spiral stalk, each cup fringed round its edge with quivering cilia. Others, with smaller cups, were arranged on branching stalks, so that they appeared like trees of living glass. The fringes of quivering cilia were all in constant motion so that currents of water were formed, bringing with them a constant supply of minute particles of food. Then again there were long trumpet-shaped creatures, also edged around with waving fringes. But the things which delighted grandfather most of all were some rolling spheres, as clear as bubbles, each sphere dotted over with a multitude of minute green spots. Inside these transparent spheres were other spheres of a most brilliant emerald or grass green. To see these glassy globes come rolling majestically into sight and then passing on to make room for others, quite filled the old man with rapture. "Well, well," said he, "to think that my pond contains all these marvellous living gems, too small to be seen without a microscope, and I've been missing the joy of seeing them all these years."

So it came to pass that nearly every evening afterwards, as long as his two visitors remained, grandfather would beg for "a turn with the microscope," and his proposal was always eagerly seconded by Susie, who was also delighted to get a chance of looking through it, and was still more delighted at the pleasure it afforded to the dear old "grandad."

And now I must leave you to imagine for yourselves the many rambles they took, with all their keen interest in collecting specimens to take home with them,—Susie's delight in pressing and mounting wild flowers, and Fred's pleasure in writing up his "Nature Diary," embellished here and there with sketches of the rare or curious objects which he found.

When the time came for packing up and returning home, although the children were joyful at the prospect of seeing the dear mother again after what seemed to them a very long absence, they felt sad at having to leave grandfather, and indeed, if the truth be told, the old man felt their going most of all, although he did not show it; for their sojourn had been to him the most delightful experience he had had for many a long year, and, as he and Cholly walked home by the field path from the station, after seeing Fred and Susie off, he stooped down and patted the dog's head affectionately saying, as he did so, "We shall be a bit lonely now they've left us, eh, old fellow, for they made us both young again, didn't they?" And there was a tear in the old man's eye and his voice shook. And Cholly's short tail gave a sympathetic little wag.

When grandfather reached home he took his volume of Longfellow's poems and read two of them; one was entitled, "The Fiftieth Birthday of Agassiz" and the other "Children."

THOMAS ROBINSON.

THE August Atlantic Monthly has some beautiful lines on "Mother Magic" by Richard Burton. He remembers sitting as a child in church,

"Too small to comprehend, yet happy there

I lingered, since beside me, close and dear,
Sat the sweet mother with her rippled hair,
Her smile of angels and her colour clear.

"And she would hold my hand, and so express,

In some deep way, the wonder of the hour;
Our spirits talked, by silent tenderness,
As easily as flower nods to flower.

"And to this day, when so I creep alone
Into some sacred corner, list the choir,
Hear some great organ's most melodious moan

And watch the windows flush daylight with fire,

"Over me once again those memories steal;
I sit as in a dream, and understand
God's meaning; for, across the years, I feel

The meek, sure magic of that spirit-hand."

EDVARD GRIEG, "the Chopin of the North," as he was called by Hans von Bülow, passed away early on Wednesday morning at Bergen, in his sixty-fourth year. Of Scottish descent on the father's side, and inheriting from his mother a passionate love of music, his remarkable gift was noticed by Ole Bull. He had four years' training at the Leipzig Conservatorium, where Arthur Sullivan and Walter Bache were among his fellow-students, but throughout his life he was true to the genius of his own Norwegian music. Early in life he worked very hard as a teacher and conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Christiania, until a pension from the Government set him more free to follow his natural bent as a composer. The first-fruits of that leisure was his well-known music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt."

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 7, 1907.

WELCOME TO ROBERT COLLYER.

Is this the seventh or the eighth time that he has come over to revisit the Old Country, drawn by the love of his native Yorkshire, and welcomed always with delight?

Fifty-seven years ago last April, ROBERT COLLYER and his young wife sailed from Liverpool to New York. Born at Keighley, December 8, 1823, but reared in Washburn-dale, a little lad to whom the Factory Act of 1834 came as a welcome relief, giving him more leisure time for reading, he was apprenticed to a blacksmith at Ilkley in 1838, and so came by his trade. There also he found his way into a richer life as a Methodist local preacher, and thus he faced the New World. Settled in the neighbourhood of Philadelphia, he worked for nearly nine years as a smith, and made his way also as a preacher, but it proved a way into a larger freedom than the Methodists could tolerate. So he came into the Unitarian fellowship with Dr. FURNESS for his father in the faith, yet without breach of friendship with his old friends, and with the benediction of LUCRETIA MOTT and her Quaker husband, and others of the true saints of GOD, in his heart.

That was in 1859, when he had openly joined the Abolitionists, and had also preached for Dr. FURNESS in Philadelphia, and so had been excluded from his old connection as a heretic. He accepted at once the invitation, which Dr. FURNESS handed him, to go to Chicago under Unitarian auspices to undertake a mission in that city, and there he ministered for twenty years. Very soon he was called from his special mission to be minister of the new congregation which built Unity Church, and in that capacity passed through the terrible, heroic years of the Civil War. He took an active part in the work of the Sanitary Commission, gaining experiences with which his two sermons on "The Battlefield of Fort Donelson," and "At the Soldiers' Graves" long since made us familiar. Another bitter experience was the loss of his home and his beautiful new church in the great Chicago fire of 1871, a bitter experience out of which much sweetness came, new depths of affection and of faith. That was after he had already twice been back to revisit old friends in England, and to make new friends among the Unitarians of this country. The first time had been in 1865 after the war, when his congregation saw that he greatly needed such a holiday, and the second time was in that very year, before the fire, when he came to preach the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. When news of the fire came, after he was home again, English friends were quick to offer help, and glad of the new bond which thus united them to the man who had so deeply moved their sympathies. Other visits followed, all of which we cannot at the moment date, but 1878 and '86 we know of, and '92 and '98. Always the same strong and tender presence it was, the expressive voice, the winning smile, the quiet humour, the shrewd good sense, the overflowing of the big human heart. And now again the old man has come, called to an honourable task in his native Yorkshire, and welcome as ever to us all.

Four years ago they celebrated his eightieth birthday in New York, and as a token of our gladness at his presence in our midst once more we will recall here one or two of the best things that were said at that time. And then we have a report of his sermon at Chester last Sunday evening.

The birthday celebration was at the Church of the Messiah in New York, where ROBERT COLLYER has ministered since 1879. Some of the friends who rejoiced in that celebration are no longer here—RICHARD ARMSTRONG, for whom he preached both at Nottingham and Liverpool, and J. W. CHADWICK, at whose ordination at Brooklyn he preached in 1864, and whom he was wont to call "my son John." Mr. CHADWICK was present at the birthday celebration and read a poem.

Robert, I sang your seventy years

In seventy lines or less;

Ten years since then have fled, and now
I come again to bless.

Ten years ago your cup seemed full:

So much had then been given,

Your hands were full as they could hold;
We thought you ripe for heaven.

But still the years, the blessed years,

Soft stooping from above,

Have poured the treasure of their grace
The sweetness of their love.

Still happy work and wholesome play

Have kept you strong and glad,

Till half we deem these crowning years
The best of all you've had.

And still through all of cloud and shine,

And all the changing years,

The tenderer light upon your face,

The unforbidden tears,—

For us an ever-deepening sense

Through all the years has grown;

How glad we are that you have been

So long our very own!

Don't think of going, Robert, yet,

Stay with us still awhile;

We need the glory of your laugh,

The sweetness of your smile!

Stay with us long! And, when at last

Much need have you of rest,

Like a great cloudless sun go down,

With every blessing blest.

The report of this birthday celebration in the Christian Register (December 17, 1903) concluded with the following touching lines:—

"And now very humbly the reporter lays one other tribute among the many that were brought that night. There was once a woman who went to hear ROBERT COLLYER preach when her heart was so heavy with grief that the glory of a perfect autumn day was blurred and darkened. She had come out of a struggle not knowing whether she had done well or ill, and the sermon she heard stirred the very depths of her soul. After the service she paused at the door to see him pass. Had she lived in Bethany long ago she might have touched the hem of his garment, but at least in this latter day she could look upon his face. Down the aisle he came, his snowy head held high, the radiance of the setting sun of his life shining in his eyes. Near the woman he paused, perhaps vaguely feeling her need, and he said, 'Lassie, it is a beautiful world!' That was all. But the trouble assumed its right proportion. The sky cleared, and the man who had known sorrow and the woman whom he had taught in those few words to bear sorrow went their ways. If that beautiful service in the Church of the Messiah taught nothing else to them who enjoyed it, it should have taught this, the need of speaking words of love and appreciation while yet it is not too late—to 'be a little kinder than is necessary' when kindness means so much to one who is journeying the life-road over which dear ROBERT COLLYER has so manfully gone."

THE great duty of God's children is to love one another. This duty on earth takes the name and form of the law of humanity. We are to recognise all men as brethren, no matter where born, or under what sky, or institution, or religion, they may live. Every man belongs to the race, and owes a duty to mankind. Every nation belongs to the family of nations, and is to desire the good of all. Nations are to love one another. It is true that they usually adopt towards one another principles of undisguised selfishness, and glory in successful violence or fraud. But the great law of humanity is unrepealed. Men cannot vote this out of the universe by acclamation. The Christian precepts, "Do to others as you would they should do to you," "Love your neighbour as yourself," "Love your enemies," apply to nations as well as individuals. A nation renouncing them is a heathen, not a Christian nation.—Channing.

ROBERT COLLYER AT CHESTER.

"FRONTING THE LIGHT."

MATTHEW HENRY'S Chapel at Chester was filled to overflowing on Sunday evening, when the Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York, was the preacher. The service was conducted by the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, minister of the chapel, the first lesson being read by the venerable minister Emeritus, the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, now in his ninety-second year. Mr. Collyer is only eighty-three. Twenty-one years ago he preached in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, the same sermon on "Fronting the Light," which delighted his congregation at Chester on Sunday evening; and the old sunny smile was there and the music of his voice, the massive head, with clear-cut features and the snow-white hair.

The text was from Job xxxviii. 19, "Knowest thou the way where the light dwelleth," and the sermon opened with a reminiscence. "I remember," said the preacher, "how I went once to a grand old city in England to see many things I had read about, and among the rest a wonderful Cathedral. It was a dismal morning when I got there, full of mist and rain, through which I could see the cathedral looming up grey with age but very grand, and there was one window especially which touched me as I saw it from no great distance by its splendid outline and the exquisite delicacy of its carved work in stone. I could easily see also that this window was filled with stained glass, but it was quite impossible even to guess at the design from where I stood outside, because the background within the church was in a deep shadow; nor was it ever meant to be seen from that side by those who had done the work. It was like looking at the wrong side of a piece of fine old tapestry, rude and ragged and all out of true, so there was no form nor comeliness in it as I stood there, and no beauty that one should desire it. But then I went within the church, and in an instant was aware of a noble transformation when the soft, misty light came in, revealing the master's intention, and clothing all the figures in a dim, grey glory. Still, even in this there was no great satisfaction; the mist veiled the perfection of beauty, the colours hidden in the glass needed a background of sunlight and a clear sky to come forth in their full splendour, and so I went away. But in the afternoon the mists rose and were swept away toward the German Ocean, and the sky opened into that tender blue you only seem to see in England in its full perfection, like blue eyes dim with tears. The sun came out with a mild fair radiance, and then I went again to see the great window. Well, on the street it was still the same, blurred and blotted, so that the light which lay on it made the figures in the glass seem more uncouth than they were before, but when I went in again I saw a great wonder—it was transformed before, it was now transfigured. The whole light of heaven was there for a background, and was smiting the window through and through." After describing the beauties of the window as seen with the background of heaven's resplendent light, he went on to say that he wondered whether the dimness and dismay which troubled us might not come from our failure to find this true background of the clear heavens and the sun, through standing outside overmuch and looking in toward the shadows, instead of standing inside and looking out towards the light.

The grand presences which touch us most potently in the Bible are the men who from Abraham, the friend of God, to that John, who stood on Patmos, saw the light which lights the sun strike through the thick shadows and make all radiant at last down in the mines. It was trouble and dismay and halting to every one of them when they were looking in toward the shadows; it was a joy that grew into great deeds and great psalms when they stood at last, as they all do who are of the most worth to us, looking out towards the light.

Jesus, when he took the lilies and held them up to the sun, and watched the birds on the wing between himself and heaven, from that day to the day when he wept over the doomed city, always looked toward the light. When he wished for a background of heaven and the sun He took a little child and set him in the midst of his disciples, saying, "The Kingdom of heaven is like that child." "Watch," said the preacher, "how the small creature is always eagerly looking 'where the light dwelleth,' and is able to find a bit of heaven in the commonest and poorest fortunes, never trying to spell out the secret from the wrong side, always getting the light to strike all he cares for as yet in the design. Now that child," continued Mr. Collyer, "solves the problem of the standpoint for us all. His angels do always behold the face of our Father, and this was the grand sweet truth Schiller told again when he said, 'My whole life has been the interpretation of the visions and oracles of my childhood.'"

And so with the men outside the Bible who have done nobly in helping to reveal the beauty and fitness of the world we live in, and the loftier meanings and outlooks of the life we have to live. It was Newton's turn, who weighed the mountains in the scales and the hills in a balance, and old Jacob Boehme's, who saw heaven as he sat cobbling shoes, who put Newton, it is said, on the track of the infinite order and harmony, and said to John Wesley, by the mouth of William Law, as the great apostle of Methodism stood looking in toward the shadows, "This is no way to solve your problems; you must get heaven's light for your background, and then you will find your way out of that dismay." So Wesley heard him and obeyed, saw all the wonder of the great design possible to his day, and travelled two hundred thousand miles to tell what he had seen to those who sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

There was a great line of men in the old days who could or would not look where the light dwelleth—Stoics, Cynics, Epicureans, laughing philosophers and crying philosophers, men who kept perpetual Lent, and men who tried to make life one long feast and frolic. But there was one man of their tribe who still stands distinct from his fellows and above them, who did this one thing. Wandering about the streets of Athens, marching out with the army, or talking with those who would hear him, he still insisted, as far as he was able, on getting this background of heaven and the sunlight. And so he sits there in his prison with the cup he must drink because he will tell of the glory he has seen, and his words are among the sweetest and most wonderful that ever fell from what we are pleased to call heathen lips. The men and women who stand in the front rank of our religious teachers and thinkers, not to sects, but to the nations, are those who stand within and look out toward and believe in the light. Emerson, Bryant, Longfellow, Whittier, Channing, Parker, Bishop Brooks, Beecher, Bellows, and a great host beside he could name of the noble dead.

Mr. Collyer related a story of a certain doleful doctor who came to see his patient, and said to him in a sad tone, "My poor fellow, there is not one chance in a thousand that you will get well, but I commend you to be cheerful." "I want no such Jeremiah," cried the preacher, "when my turn comes to be sick, but a man who will bring me all the good cheer in the world in his eyes, in the tones of his voice, and the touch of his hand, and will say to me, 'While there's life there's hope, my friend, and I propose to help you to make a good fight and win. My dear friend Lucretia Mott,'" continued the preacher, "used to say of a fine old doctor in Philadelphia that his simple presence did his patients more good than his medicine, and was easier to take beyond all comparison, for this was forty years ago, and such a presence is always a noble medicine in itself. The contagion of a sunny and cheerful heart helps us always to look toward the light, sets the tides of life flowing again, and cubes all our chances of getting well. It was a very common grievance among the surgeons who had this good cheer in them, when we used to leap out to nurse our men after the great battles in the Titanic struggle between North and South, that well-meaning but woeful-looking men of the old schools of theology would invade the hospitals, and rob the brave fellows of what courage was left in them by the dolour of their words and the sadness of their presence when the delicate balance between life and death drew about ever, and would very often turn the scale for death. I want no such curate," said Mr. Collyer, "for mind or body, no such doctor, nurse, or priest. They must come as the good Christ came, for healing, and not for affright. There have been and are those who find the place where the light strikes through the grave, yes, the very grave, and then the whole haggard and hopeless sorrow suffers a change; and we must try to find that place, too, who sit in darkness and the shadows of death. There may be many a thing we cannot make out after all, as there was to me that afternoon in the great window, but the light is there burning through, and this is the one grand matter. Death has no dominion when we once find the place where a sure faith and a great hope in God can smite through these shadows of death and the grave.

"Do I stand at the portals of life, with the world before me and wonder how I shall win my way? I will front the light. Do I find dimness in old age? I will explore old Bunyan, and have him tell me how those that fare on toward the end of the pilgrimage come at last to where the sun shineth always. Is such a faith as I hold, itself in the shadows, not lost out of me, but still full of shadow? Why, then, when it is darkest I will sing with the fine old Wesleyan heart I inherited from my mother church, 'In hope, against all human hope, self-desperate I believe.' I will sing until the sun comes, and hasten his advent by my singing. Nothing shall withstand my wilfulness to front the light. I will also say, 'Put my name down, Sir. I mean to go in there and wait for the glorious appearing.' The old dreamer shall say of me also, 'Verily, I know what this meaneth.'

"Two powers since first the world began
Have ruled our life, and rule it still,
Twin forces in the life of man
Are Faith and Will.
The Pole-star and the helm of life,
That sets the head, this gives the force
Through seas of peace or storms and strife
To shape our course.

The powers that stand in God's own strength,
In dark and light, in joy and doom,
Unshaken are the powers at length
That bring us home.
But where is home? That Faith can tell.
But what is Faith? That Will can prove,
In striving bravely, working well,
And fronting God's eternal love."

THE AMERICAN IDEA.

A LAST YEAR'S SERMON BY THE REV. S. R. CALTHROP, LITT.D., OF SYRACUSE, N.Y.

"Let the people praise thee, O God! Yea, let all the people praise thee!"—Psalm lxxviii. 3.

TO-DAY I speak of the "American Idea." We are tired of the old Fourth of July oratory. It did very well when we were not quite sure of our national position, and had to lift ourselves up, as the man does in the hydrostatic paradox, by blowing ourselves up by our own breath. But now it is admitted on all sides all over the world that we are a first-rate nation with a first-rate destiny. The boy pulls incessantly at his incipient whiskers. The man knows they are there and leaves them alone. They only serve to remind him that he is a man.

"Let him that glorieth glory in the Lord," says Saint Paul. When Americans glory wisely, they glory in the good things which God and the brave toil of their fathers have brought to pass, glory in the new-found possibility of a freedom which prophets and kings vainly desired to see. If, then, America must boast, let her boast not so much of her achievements, as of her idea; not so much of what she has done, but of the task God has set her to do. That glorying is one with the profoundest humility.

What, then, is the American idea? Swedenborg says that the speech of the angels is very concentrated. They often say in one word more than could be said by many thousands in any earthly language. Perhaps, then, when the angels say the word "Man!" they include in that one word all his infinite possibilities, his inevitable development, his ever-unfolding history, and the unspeakable grandeur of his final destiny.

Be that as it may, the American idea is indeed the idea of man as man. In one word, the American idea is man! The American idea is man mere, not man and something more—not man and a wig to make a judge, not man and a gown to make a preacher, not man and a title to make a legislator, not man and a crown to make a ruler. The American idea roughly brushes aside all these accessories, and takes its stand on manhood pure and simple. Man's justice can make laws without the aid of the barber's shop. Man's adoration, man's intuition, can give his religion voice without any aid from tailor or milliner. A "Dr." or a "D.D." before or after a man's name adds no jot to his insight, and no jeweller can put royalty on a fool's head. The kingship must be in the man. Man, then, man his own law-giver, prophet, priest, king—that is the American idea. When God crowns a man, then, and then only, the American idea says, Amen!

What, then, is our distinctive glory among the nations? We have no time-honoured cathedrals, sacred legacies handed down by the worship of the past, no great ancestral names, no history going back far into the darkness of far-off days, no titled aristocracy fenced about with courtly manners. Take away from us our belief in man, and we have nothing left. Leave us that and in time we will reproduce all that is grand in the old, and add to it all the glory of the new.

Let us fairly admit at the outset that one of the irresistible ambitions of our America is size. So far, European opinion of us is quite justified. To vast areas of soil vast populations must be fitted. Great nations must have great cities. We can hardly think of France without Paris, of England without London. London is London because it has 5,000,000 inhabitants. Without that, no Crystal Palace with its acres of glass, no Kew Gardens with the plants of every zone, no Zoological Gardens with every known animal, no British Museum with every book and every fossil. With its summary of art in all ages London is an epitome of the planet.

The great nation, too, must have millions of hands—in the fields, in the mines, in the ships, in the factories, in the workshops. Everywhere each pair of hands is, or should be, one more source of power to the great nation, so that, other things being equal, the nation that owns the most pairs of hands, and the most heads above the hands, is the most powerful.

True, it is absolutely necessary for us to make a stand against the vulgar conception of the dignity of brute numbers only. To the commonplace man numbers mere are divine. One man with a conviction is to him only an insignificant unit among the surrounding millions. The word of a thousand people begins to be respectable; of a hundred thousand significant; of a million powerful; of a hundred millions, divine. It is impious to go against that. "Vox populi, vox Dei" ("The people, right or wrong"), is the vulgar motto. Nevertheless, numbers have a certain divine significance, and form an essential part of America's future. Very soon we shall number a hundred millions of people! Think of it! A hundred millions believing in God's justice and man's destiny! What despot in the wide world would dare to enslave or oppress, if such a nation said him nay?

The American idea, then, requires numbers; for the American land, which is the body of which the American idea is the soul, is so vast that it requires a vast amount of that life-blood, of which each human soul is one drop, before its heart can beat, and its circulation flow with adequate force and fullness. The desert must be peopled, and railroad and telegraph must run from New York to San Francisco, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, through and through a continent swarming with men, women and children, before the American land comes to its own, before the American idea can find adequate numerical expression, before the voice of America can get volume enough to echo from shore to shore and across the Atlantic and the Pacific deep.

Secondly, the American idea requires numbers, because it must be first proved here, beyond controversy, that man is capable of self-government on the grandest scale; that a free republic is capable of indefinite expansion without the least danger to its permanence; that absolute justice to all men is a foundation for a State more solid than any throne.

Thirdly, the American idea requires numbers because there are a great number of human beings in the world, and, therefore, the American idea has a mission to many men. It has, in short, a gospel to preach to a billion and a half of human beings at present upon the earth, and to a quite indefinite number of billions who are among the inevitable things of the future. It needs numbers to illustrate its principles. Its message is indeed for all, for high and low, rich and poor; but its peculiar mission is to the millions, to "the sons and daughters of toil," to the "lower classes," to the "scum," to the "mudsills," to the slaves everywhere. Its special mission is to bid all such arise up and be men. Here, first, it must prove itself by nobleness achieved, by justice done to every man, woman, and child among all its millions, and then its sound shall go out into all lands and its words to the ends of the world.

I. All greatness has its enemies. The most deadly foe to the American idea to-day is the unholy alliance between corporate greed and corrupt politics, the greed of wealth ever greedy for more wealth furnishing the money, and the corrupt politician delivering the goods for a consideration, having debauched thousands of voters for the purpose. It is frightful to think of foreigners who seek a refuge here, being sold and bought before they can know what a crime they are aiding and abetting. They are helping to assassinate the very country which has given them a refuge. I would that my voice could reach a few intelligent and conscientious foreigners, and persuade them to strive to the uttermost to enlighten these poor unfortunate countrymen who are thus made the tools of the criminal rich.

The present time, then, brings a great crisis in the history of the United States. Civic virtue is needed as never before. Civic vice has been more rampant, more unblushing, more open, more audacious, more powerful, more oppressive, more defiant than ever before. Never before has civic vice had means of corruption so vast, never before were the prizes for the successful debauching of the public mind so immense. It is a terrible thing for one whose whole soul believes in democracy, in the government of the people, for the people, by the people, to face the awful fact that in every large city of the United States a group of powerful persons is found, who are resolved, as far as in them lies, to use the forms of popular government simply to aggrandise and enrich themselves at the expense of the whole body politic, and are prepared to corrupt just as many thousands of voters as are necessary to give them continued control of public affairs. In a Republican city there is a Republican machine, in a Democratic city a Democratic machine, skilfully constructed to grind out provender for the owners of the machine and their henchmen. It is a terrible thing to see the owners of such machines actually ruling great States of our Union, some of these owners using publicly vast sums of money to elect themselves, to buy outright, in open market, votes enough to elect themselves governors of States or senators of the United States, as Clark did in Montana and Addicks in Delaware. The shame and disgrace of Philadelphia, Minneapolis, St. Louis, and many other cities, must cause the cheek of every one who loves his country to blush. It is dreadful to think how many hordes of rich plunderers there are in our land who are busied night and day in finding out the price of a poor man's honour, and making it impossible for him ever to hold up his head as a free American citizen.

A great storm of public indignation against such men has just passed over our land, and the man whom its lightning strikes is killed politically. But here comes a pressing danger. In our indignation against the authors of our national shame, we are prone to imagine that our indignation is sufficient, that we have discharged our full duty by being indignant. Alas! That is only the bare beginning of our work,—work which will be very difficult, work which must be continued patiently through many, many years. The first and chief difficulty will be the reforming of ourselves. The whole nation needs a moral uplift, and the one sure way of aiding that moral uplift is to raise the whole tone of our own lives. You and I must begin at once to do this. I must see to it that my discharge of my duties to you and the Church of God in Syracuse shall at once be raised to a higher plane. My ministrations must be more effective for good. My watch over your souls, my longing for a higher truth and beauty to be manifested in your lives must be deeper. My heart's desire and prayer for your growth in all manly and womanly nobleness must rise higher—rise toward the throne of God. Each and every one of you must likewise raise your whole tone of living—in your business, your society, your home. This is to be your contribution to the highest welfare of your beloved country, this your supreme gift—the gift of yourselves, to the Genius of Liberty in this her hour of sorest need.

II. The first century and a quarter of our republic reveals much that is full of fine promise, something of noble performance, much that is still lacking to a complete national consciousness. It contains, too, matter for grave foreboding, almost for dread. It shows us that there is no royal road to greatness, that the mere fact that we are a republic will not save us from the one-sidedness which is the consequence of half-culture, from the littleness which is the sure result of low aims, or from the swift retribution that follows wrong. It shows us that the stern laws of the universe are around us also; that in a republic as well as in a monarchy greatness comes by law and not by luck; that honour is the reward of reality, not of make-believe; that high dignities are gained not by self-seeking, but by self-sacrifice. The giddy height on which we stand is enough to make thoughtful men ponder and religious men fall on their knees to ask for strength equal to this tremendous day of the Lord, the issue of which is to place either the fool's cap of the charlatan or the diadem of victory on the brow of our loved republic.

One thing, I think, is evident. We shall either be greatly noble or greatly base. Yet it is to be confessed that many, even of our most thoughtful well-wishers in Europe, think that the reverse is to be the case, and that we are to present in the future a fine specimen of amiable mediocrity, an immense mass of average well-being, a hundred millions of well-to-do, comfortably housed, well fed, good-humoured people, not too much burdened with ideas, and not much troubled in our digestion, with longings after the unattainable perfect. They do not expect that great artists, deep thinkers, inspired prophets and poets, are to be born and graciously nurtured here; but they do look forward to low poor rates and wages at two dollars a day. They do not anticipate any high stimulus, any grand impulse toward the ideal to emanate from America, but they feel reasonably sure of capital crops of corn and cotton, pigs and cheeses.

Now I think that we would all repudiate indignantly this degrading conception, if not for ourselves and our own performance, at least for the grand idea of democracy, which we are supposed to represent. We would all cry out: "We ourselves may be as commonplace as you please; but, if we are, blame us and our unworthy, contemptible conception of the American idea. Do not blame that idea itself, for that is God's angel of hope and promise for the days to come."

Is the American idea going to dwarf men simply because it exalts manhood alone? Does the absence of arbitrary class distinctions—that is, distinctions founded on conventional, not real, superiorities—necessarily belittle? Let us see. The old idea of a calling was the position in which a man was born. "To do my duty in that station of life into which it has pleased God to call me," used to mean, Be content with the position into which you were born, whether that be a palace or a gutter, but very especially the gutter! That is, the eternal surroundings of a man, not the soul within him, were to legislate for all his future. But in our America God's verdict is not looked for outside, is not supposed to be told by fustian jacket or broadcloth, by plaster walls or marble, but within, by brain power, nerve power, mind power, heart power, spirit power. Whatever a man can be that is he bound to be. "Capacity is the limit of sphere." As the children of Israel were taught to expect that God would inspire whomsoever He willed among the people, lowly or lofty, and more generally lowly than lofty, so the American idea teaches us that princes may come out of hovels, and that the leaders of America to-morrow may be the wagon-boys or shoemakers or rail-splitters of to-day.

Does, then, the American idea bar the road to great achievements simply because it opens wide the gates that lead to that road, and bids millions enter, where only a handful entered before? If a million heads are opened to the thoughts of science, art, invention, discovery, is there less chance of high excellence being developed in some of these millions than if only a hundred heads were thus opened?

"The French Revolution," said Napoleon, "proclaimed to all the world that at last a career was open to talent." "How far will America allow a man to progress?" ask you. Just as far as he can. She writes upon her portals, "The career is open to talent." Just what a man can do, that shall he be free to do. All walks of literature, all researches of science, all distinctions of orator, statesman, merchant, poet, shall be his, if his hand be strong enough to grasp them. "Through all the roads of heaven," says Plato, "the chariots of the blessed gods roll free, and whosoever hath the power and the will hath free right to follow whatsoever chariot of whatsoever god he pleases. For envy hath no place in the feasts of the gods."

But, lastly, I look forward to all manner of grand achievements for America, because I perceive that high thought in all departments of knowledge is democratic. Certainly science is democratic. Science does not ask what the colour of a man's coat or his skin is before she will deign to accept him as a votary. She examines neither his coat nor his cuticle, but his calculations, his discoveries; not his ancestors, but himself. Again, the imagination is democratic. Let two men write a poem, one an Ayrshire ploughman, the other a king, if you will, and the imagination crowns the ploughman with its laurel, if the ploughman's verse touches the deeper chord in the heart of man. Royal authors have had, in general, a very disloyal public, and for this reason—that the imagination is democratic. It refuses to admire that which is not admirable, to be touched by that which is not touching. Is anyone foolish enough to suppose that, if a poor man or a black man wrote a noble poem, the imagination would refuse him the tribute of tears and sympathy because he was poor or black?

Does, then, the true democratic idea lower the imagination, make it coarse or commonplace? Does it refuse to any man the right to have grand, glorious thoughts because the thoughts of the average run of people are the reverse of grand and glorious? No. All it says is, "The career is open to talent,"—beautiful thoughts to those who can think them, whether the face be red, black, brown, or white; thankful recognition, gratitude to all givers of beautiful thoughts, regardless of all things else save the beauty of the thoughts.

Last of all, above all other departments of human genius, religion is democratic. This has been written in letters of light on human history ever since Moses inaugurated his grand theocratic democracy, and took his stand not upon one inspired man or one inspired class, but upon an inspired people, each individual of whom was to keep himself ready for the heavenly call. "Enviest thou for my sake?" says Moses to Joshua, who was grieved that Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp. "Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his spirit upon them!"

Does, then, democracy in religion mean that we are to have no prophet more, that henceforth the heavens are to be closed to the piercing eye of genius, because it is not fair to the generality of people that they should be blind as bats to the everlasting glory, while others understand the secrets which the heavens are for ever telling? Oh, no! Democracy in religion means that the heavens are ever open to the sons of men, that the thoughts of God are near to every man's head, that not one soul shall be defrauded of its just right to be put into communication with the great thoughts of the wise of old, that no soul that can climb the hills of God shall be kept down because the skin of its body is red or black or brown, or its food is coarse, or its birth humble.

Democracy can never alter the great law of divine communication, which is "thought kindling itself at the fire of living thought." But what it can do is this: it can give all men education enough to come within range of divine thoughts. It will develop nobler religious genius, because it will give millions a chance to develop it where only a handful had the chance before.

Stern, yet simple, is the law of divine inspiration. "Thou hast asked a hard thing," says Elijah to Elisha, when Elisha had asked that a double portion of Elijah's spirit should descend upon him. "Nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken up, it shall be to thee even as thou hast said. And it came to pass, as they still went on and talked, behold! a chariot of fire and horses of fire descended, and parted them both asunder, and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven. And Elisha saw it, and he cried, My Father! my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof! And he saw him no more. And he took hold of his own clothes, and rent them in two pieces. He took up also the mantle of Elijah that fell from him, and went back and stood by the bank of the Jordan. And he took the mantle of Elijah that fell from him, and smote the waters and said, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? And, when he had smitten the waters, they parted hither and thither, and Elisha went over. And when the sons of the prophets looked upon his face, they said, The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha!"

These things are an allegory. Whosoever can follow religious genius in its upward flight toward the heavens, and, with undazzled yet kindling eye, behold it mount its chariot of fire, even till the uncreated glory shines forth upon it, and the finite soul and the infinite become one light,—upon him a double portion of the spirit of religious genius descends. He, too, can take up the prophet's mantle, and with it smite the waters that separate the common, sordid world from the world of eternal principles.

This, then, is the divine right which democracy has to secure not to one, but to all souls—opportunity to be kindled into flame by hearing and studying the divine words of souls that glow with the fire of God, and a free right to believe that the vision of the eternal is no private property of a few favoured ones, but belongs to man as man.

I look for a grand development of religious genius in America during this twentieth century. When the land shall number a hundred million of free men, all educated to the consciousness of mind, how poor must human nature be if under such mighty influences, unchecked, unbarred, it cannot show that religious genius grows in free soil like the flowers, each after its kind! Democracy in religion tend to dull uniformity? Not while the world bends before the immortal life of the Carpenter of Nazareth!

The world has grown weary of the pyramid style in national architecture, where millions of living souls are walled up in utter night, used only to form the hidden support to the polished ascending slabs of gentleman, lord, marquis, duke, prince, and princess, which adorn the sides, and completely cover up the vast solid masses below, which alone make their position possible, while on the apex a single crowned figure stands, with rayless darkness underneath its feet. The world has grown weary of that, and begins to long for the grand Christian cathedral style of national architecture, where no single stone is despised or bereft of its dower of glory and beauty, where arch and pillar, groined roof, and deep-stained window, massive buttress and slender pinnacle, are alike shaped to forms of grace and nobleness,—ay, where every niche of this living temple of souls is consecrated to noble service, where every pillar is twined with tender tracery, every rafter of the ceiling is carved with an artist's hands, where the arched gateways are adorned with many a statue of angel or of hero-saint, and where the solemn twilight of the crypts below is dedicated to the monumental resting-places of the mighty dead, where wall and tower and battlement without fill the landscape with hope and beauty and dignity, while within all is glorious with the light that streams through mighty pictured windows, where every stone vibrates to the music that echoes along its vast expanse, and where over its high altar the lowly-born king of men is seen ascending to God, bearing man's nature with him. Such a national cathedral, each stone a living soul, each stone dedicated to use and beauty, each in its appropriate place, each supporting each, each necessary to each other and the mighty whole, each an integral part of the glory of the whole, that whole forming a grand national church of the living God, dedicated to His praise and to the service of man—such a human cathedral, its floor a continent, its arching roof the sky, it is our task to rear. In God's name, let us arise and build!

LETTER FROM NEW ZEALAND.

THE Editor reminds me that some account of the Unitarian movement in New Zealand should be presented before the readers of THE INQUIRER. This I am pleased to do, because we have nothing but a series of successes—far beyond the expectations of any one here—to record.

The first Unitarian church at Auckland has now a church and a schoolroom of its own. All this has been accomplished in seven years under the guidance of our good and energetic friend, Mr. Jellie. During the past year Mr. Jellie took unto himself a partner, and from all quarters comes the good news what a valuable asset Mrs. Jellie is in connection with all the movements of the church. The future of the Auckland church is safe. It cannot be said that there is anything extraordinary to report, but something better can be reported: the people's devotion to their church, and their willingness to sacrifice for the noble cause of Unitarian Christianity. They have accomplished great things in the past, and the crystallising process of many different elements has been very successful.

When we turn to Wellington, the capital city of New Zealand, we find many things to be grateful for. I reached Wellington in the end of March, 1906. Previous to that there was a Unitarian society here with about two dozen members. Most of these had never been connected with any Unitarian church before, and had therefore but little experience of what we stand for. Few had had this experience. A congregation has been formed of which I feel very proud. Sixteen months have passed away, and the evening congregation has fluctuated but little indeed. We meet in a hall capable of holding between 300 and 400 people, and it is well filled every Sunday evening, and often we have to insert in the papers, "Seats must be occupied by 7 o'clock."

I am writing at the close of a grand sale of work, which has been held for three days, and which was opened by one of our faithful members, Sir Robert Stout, Chief Justice of New Zealand. We have succeeded in making a clear profit of about £250, and find ourselves now in sixteen months with the sum of £600 set aside for building purposes. It is a small sum when we take into consideration that we have to collect between £2,000 and £3,000, but we are hopeful that when a direct appeal is made to members and friends in New Zealand, and to you in Great Britain and Ireland as well, our goal will be reached before long, and a second Unitarian building will be established in this colony. The need is great. It would lift many Unitarians out of their pessimism if they were to read through the correspondence of Mr. Jellie and myself. Almost daily communications come inquiring what Unitarianism is. We could never do anything here without the name Unitarian. The people think it a grand name, and rally round it because it expresses something very definite to them. I need not inform you of the opposition from many of the orthodox pulpits. This is only what I expected, but it can now do us no harm, and some amount of it is doing good. Some ministers, with churches more than half empty, declare that we have had our day, whilst often we can find not sufficient sitting accommodation for the people. Yes, during the past sixteen months we have had our day, and a very good day it has been too.

Let me give you an illustration of one of our week-night classes. It is a class for the study of "The Growth of the Mind." We must not hire a room, for we have to turn everything to the Building Fund, so we have to borrow rooms for our meetings. This room will seat about forty, but we have not sufficient chairs. Numbers have to sit on shelves, on cupboards, on the piano, on the steps, &c. When this was announced on the next Sunday evening, a gentleman in the congregation—a furniture dealer—stated that he would be glad to lend as many chairs as would be needed. But I must leave this matter, and pass briefly to another of great importance outside Wellington.

I received instructions from Mr. Bowie to visit Christchurch and Dunedin—the two chief towns in the South Island. The weather proved most unfavourable. For three days after we left, the boats could not leave Wellington Harbour. Also the Hon. T. M. Bolt, who was arranging the meetings for me in Dunedin, died suddenly a few days before my arrival there. I was fortunate in having two splendid workers in Dunedin, Mr. W. H. Trimble, son of the late Col. Trimble, an old Unitarian family of Liverpool, and Mr. Rawson. In spite of the pelting rain I had audiences of 250 at Dunedin in the two lectures I delivered there. About half a dozen ministers were present, a larger number of theological students from Otago University, and we remained in that hall from eight until eleven o'clock on each of the two nights. Three theological students have revealed secrets to me which I cannot at present disclose. Mr. Bowie, at a future date, may make this result known to you. Over thirty people came forward at my request and wrote their names as sympathisers of a Unitarian movement, whenever it is established in Dunedin.

We returned on the Saturday to Christchurch, where I was to deliver five addresses.

The two Sunday services were conducted as regular religious services, and all questions had to be reserved for the week-night addresses. Mr. Easom, manager of the New Zealand Express Co., and Mr. Harry Atkinson, the labour movement lecturer and worker, worked hard for the success of these meetings. The hall had about 250 people present on Sunday afternoon, and over 300 Sunday night. In spite of the pelting rain—such rain as is not experienced in England—audiences of about sixty came together for the lectures. The whole journey turned out to be a far greater success than I had hoped for, and the daily papers were good enough to give about a column each day of the addresses. But who is to carry on this work? Mr. Jellie is too far north to help, and it would take him nearly four days to reach Dunedin, and my hands are full. Is there no young man ready to spend some years of his life in this glorious work?

In a future letter I shall present before you some of the aspects of the work. Kind regards and best wishes from my wife and myself to the Unitarian community at home.

LETTERS FROM THE WEST.—III.

WINNIPEG.

WHEN I saw Winnipeg twenty-five years ago there was no C.P.R. The proposal to build had only just been made. In the course of four years trains were running daily, and settlers were pouring into Manitoba and the North-West. The population, which was a mere handful when I first saw the city, began to grow. Then the great "boom" in real estate came, and Winnipeg was thrown on its beam ends for years because of the fictitious prices at which land was held.

I visited the city again in 1902 and in 1904, and each subsequent visit surprised me by its development as a town. But I am utterly astounded at its substantial growth to-day. There is no touch of Dickens's "Garden of Eden" about it, although, mushroom-like, it has sprung up quickly.

It is safe to say that Winnipeg has 100,000 people, and is increasing. Interested agents declare there are 150,000. The city is cosmopolitan enough to suit the tastes of anyone. Besides large substantial looking business blocks, there are acres of streets of small houses, and a whole district of beautifully laid out residences, which, if they are as nicely equipped inside as they are outside, would be a credit to any place. Unfortunately for Winnipeg, the real estate men are running prices up once more, and once more scores of men who think themselves well fixed will be poor.

Like Toronto, Winnipeg has many fine churches, and a great many men attend the services.

I preached in Manitoba Hall on Sunday evening, August 11, to a fairly large congregation. I had met representatives of the pioneer congregation on Friday night at 10 o'clock, and we decided to have a service. It was announced next morning. On Monday morning I rose to find an "eminent Unitarian divine" from England had been in the city the day before, and had "exploded some old-time notions." There is a splendid field in Winnipeg for a live Unitarian minister. One who has a message and will fearlessly deliver it would not only be heard, but would have a strong congregation in a very short time. It was delightful to meet so many English on this flying visit. Here were people from Manchester, Liverpool, Bristol, London, and other places, all bent on improving their prospects in this world, and all faithful to the traditions of their early homes.

I had a long conference with the committee of the Icelandic Unitarian Church in Winnipeg. They have a very pretty church, and are steadily growing. Yet they have much opposition from their fellow-countrymen of the Lutheran Church, who outnumber them. With the advent of a really strong man to the Canadian congregation the Icelanders' position would be strengthened considerably. All the other denominations follow their members into Manitoba, and the West, and provide them with ministers and buildings, and we must do likewise or be recreant to our heritage. It will soon be now or never, for the Congregationalist and the Baptist are trying to take possession, and even the Presbyterian is trimming for an advance.

On Saturday, August 10, Winnipeg and the district around were visited by a little "twister," which is colloquial for cyclone, to distinguish it from a "straight," a tornado. It was accompanied by heavy thunder and lightning and a terrific hail-storm. I picked up hailstones which fell in shape like tomatoes, and measuring one inch by an inch and a half. They resembled hens' eggs in size. The mosquitos come, and look people over, and help themselves in their own way, and there is no satisfaction in disturbing them, for it would simply mean removing one contingent for another. Their name is legion.

If it is no consolation to Londoners, it will be interesting to them to know that the summer in Canada is just as fickle and is quite as backward as it is at home. The cry is general—in England, on the Atlantic, on the Lakes, and throughout the West—summer is slow in coming. If California cannot tell a more seasonable story, we will hear what the South has to say.

THE VAN MISSION.

No. 1 VAN continued its work in the Sheffield district. Revs. A. H. Dolphin and J. Ruddle assisted the missionaries, Rev. T. A. Gorton, of Birmingham, and Rev. E. L. Buckland, of Derby, until their departure for America; and Rev. W. J. Cock, of Attercliffe, has helped since his return from holidays. Messrs. Dungworth and Turton have also taken part in the meetings, and the Upperthorpe and Attercliffe congregations have furnished contingents of helpers. Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Manchester, relieved Mr. Buckland at the beginning of the week, and on Thursday the Van was to move to Masbro', where the Rotherham congregation were to help. Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Leigh, is missionary for the week, and Dr. Griffiths will again be with the Van in the following week.

No. 2 Van, with Rev. E. T. Russell, held large meetings at Greenock, where inquiries were forthcoming as to why no Unitarian Church had been founded there. Mr. Russell closed his month's mission on Friday, the 30th, and no further meetings were held until Rev. Ottwell Binns, of Scarborough, arrived on Monday. Port Glasgow and Kilmalcolm are in the programme for this week, and on Monday next Rev. J. M. Mills, of Bootle, will mission.

No. 3 Van remained at Hackney until August 28, and then moved to Stepney Green. At the former place Rev. H. Rawlings had splendid meetings, excepting on one evening when the rain was heavy. At Stepney the attendances were smaller. The meetings were conducted by Mr. Capleton, and the musical arrangements were greatly helped by members of the band from Limehouse. On the Sunday evening (officially reported attendance, 140; as per another report between 200 and 300) there were chanted responses and much singing of hymns, and the reading of extracts from Isaiah specially appealed to young Jewry. During the week Rev. J. Toye, of Limehouse, and Messrs. G. Ward, W. R. Marshall, H. G. Chancellor, and F. Collecott delivered addresses. This week Rev. J.

Hipperson, of Bermondsey, is in charge of the meetings, and will be followed by Rev. H. McLachlan, of Leeds.

No. 4 Van after its run of fine meetings came to Northwich, where Rev. J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley, succeeded Rev. W. T. Bushrod. The failure of the town to provide a suitable site meant the abandonment of one meeting; and on another evening the mission joined forces with the local I.L.P., who on this, as on other occasions, very earnestly supported the mission. Leaving Northwich on its way into South Lancashire the Van made a halt at Knutsford, where the missionary was assisted by Rev. G. A. Payne, and on Thursday this week it moved to Ashton-in-Makerfield, where Rev. H. F. Short is conducting meetings on a return visit. He will be followed next week at West Houghton and Leigh by Rev. G. Payne.

Several subscriptions have been received during the week in response to the letter which appeared in the last issue, including one of 20s. from "W. W.," which, owing to the absence of address, cannot be acknowledged directly. All the subscriptions will of course appear in the printed report, and it is urgently hoped that the response to the appeal for funds may enable the mission to pay its way. Subscriptions may be sent to the treasurer of the British and Foreign Association (H. Chatfield Clarke, Esq.), at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., or to Rev. T. P. Spedding, Buckingham-road, Heaton Chapel, near Manchester.

SWINTON JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

THE Jubilee of the present building of the Swinton congregation was celebrated on Saturday and Sunday, August 24 and 25. The history of the congregation goes further back, as will be seen from the following notes.

It originated with Mr. Samuel Boardman, of Temple Lodge, Swinton, who in 1820 was accustomed to invite his neighbours to his residence to read with him the Christian Reformer. The following year, with the assistance of his son, Mr. Wm. Boardman, he established a small Sunday school, and a congregation was afterwards formed, the services being held in a room over the kitchen at Temple Lodge. In 1825 the school was removed to an upper room over a blacksmith's shop near the Market-place, and three years later there was a congregation of 80 people and 150 scholars. A small school-church was built by Mr. Boardman in 1831 on his own land, and here for 25 years Mr. Wm. Boardman worked zealously, teaching the children every Sunday and sometimes conducting the church services. In 1842, on the invitation of Mr. Aspinall Turner, M.P., the local Unitarians attended service in the chapel attached to Pendlebury House. By 1856 the Swinton meeting house had become too small, and a movement for the erection of new premises resulted in the building of the present church and Sunday school in Swinton Hall-road, which were opened on August 16, 1857. For eleven years the work was carried on by laymen who had been associated with Mr. Boardman. In 1868 the Rev. W. Harrison became the first minister of the church, and for ten years he worked arduously to establish the congregation on a sound basis. He was followed by the Rev. J. Moore, who led the work of the Sunday school with such success that the school was enlarged and the church renovated. After a ministry characterised by great activity, Mr. Moore left Swinton for Hindley in 1891, and was succeeded by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, who brought about still greater activity in the work of the church, and formulated schemes which resulted in an improvement in the finances. On his departure, in 1898, the Rev. W. E. George, M.A., took over the work, and energetically carried out the duties of pastor until his removal last year to take charge of the congregations at Urnston and Chorlton-cum-Hardy. He is succeeded by Mr. W. McMullen, of the Home Missionary College, who has just entered upon his charge. Neither he nor Mr. George were able to be at the Jubilee celebration. This began with a Saturday afternoon procession, headed by the Lostock Industrial School band, and a children's festival, followed by tea in the schoolroom, at which some 500 were present.

Councillor COLIN JOHNSON presided over the subsequent meeting, and Mr. PETER HOLLAND, one of the oldest members of the congregation, gave an address reminiscent of old times, and was followed by the three first ministers in succession, the Revs. W. Harrison, John Moore, and W. R. Shanks, who also had happy memories of their connection with the congregation and good wishes for its future.

The Rev. W. HARRISON said he was delighted to see such a large and enthusiastic gathering, but would like to remind them that it was not by big meetings and special efforts that the work of a church was carried on. It was by regular attendance and constant service, by encouraging their pastor, and showing by their lives and conduct that the church was a blessing to them. He could commend to them their new minister, Mr. McMullen, and hoped that when he came they would rally round him, and show the same attachment to him as they had done to his predecessors.

The Rev. J. MOORE said that one of the grand features of their work as teachers, ministers, or workers in the Sunday school was that they were filling the minds of the young people with happy memories which in days to come they would recall with pleasure. They were always taking mental photographs, and it was well that they should try to fill the treasure-house of memory with beautiful scenes, happy incidents and kind remembrances as they went along. For those for whom the school had a fond place in their memory he put it as a duty that they should help on the work of the church for which the school existed. The more closely they allied themselves with the church and school the better they would be helped in times of trouble and trial, for nowhere would they find spiritual sustenance so well as in their religious home.

The Rev. W. R. SHANKS said that if that congregation was to have a continuous life, it could only be by strict adherence to the religious principles in which they had been trained. The best legacy a man could leave to his children was not money, but a moral religious training. They would have a church and congregation fifty years hence stronger than it was to-day; just so far as those who were now adults did their duty to the young who came after them.

The Jubilee Services on the following day were conducted by the Revs. W. R. Shanks and John Moore respectively, and at the afternoon service Mr. Peter Holland gave an address with memories of his long connection with the congregation.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare: Highland Place.—Col. T. Phillips and Councillor R. N. Williams, who are among the large company which sailed for Boston by the Invernia on Tuesday to attend the International Congress, were entertained on the previous Wednesday evening by the Highland place congregation at a farewell tea-meeting, which was very largely attended. The Rev. M. Evans, who presided, referred to the active part both gentlemen had taken in the opening of their chapel seventeen years ago, and the debt of gratitude the Unitarian body owed to them. The Rev. R. J. Jones, of the Old Meeting, also wished them God-speed on their journey and a happy return, and Mrs. Mackintosh and Mrs. Watkins, on behalf of the congregation, made a presentation of ebony walking-sticks and fountain-pens, with suitable inscriptions. These gifts the two travellers very cordially acknowledged, and the meeting closed with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" and the Doxology.

Atherton—The school sermons were preached on Sunday last by Rev. J. J. Wright, resident minister, prior to his sailing on Tuesday for the Boston meetings. There were large congregations, and the collections amounted to £56 9s. 9d.

Colne.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held last Sunday, the minister officiating at both services. There were large congregations present, and the collections were in advance of those of last year. The fruit banquet on Monday evening was also well attended. The Rev. John Evans will close his ministry at Colne on Sunday, September 15. All correspondence should now be sent to Mr. Sam Laycock, 3, Claremont-street, Colne, who has been appointed church secretary in place of Mr. Hird.

Halstead.—The jubilee of the church is to be celebrated on Sunday, October 27, and it is on that occasion that Mr. F. Maddison, M.P., is to conduct the services.

Lydgate Chapel (Resignation).—On Sunday last the Rev. J. Hanson Green, M.A., who for fourteen years has been minister of the Ludgate congregation, gave notice of his intention to resign the pulpit, and asked that this might take effect as early as possible. The committee, whilst accepting the resignation with great regret, congratulated Mr. Green and themselves on the fact that he would still remain a member of the congregation. It was arranged that Mr. Green's ministry should terminate at the end of September, and the committee hope to make a new appointment at a very early date.

A CONFERENCE upon housing was held by co-operators in connection with the recent Crystal Palace Exhibition, at which the Garden City idea was introduced by Mr. Aneurin Williams, and generally discussed. Facts from several quarters were quoted to show that co-operative societies were interesting themselves in the problem, though it is evident that on the whole they are dealing with it in a very limited and somewhat timid manner. The success of the Letchworth pioneers will doubtless encourage them to some wider and more imaginative effort.

God is active, and out of His activity He formed all creatures. As in the deep seas in their endless movements there is calm beneath, so in God are depths of peace as infinite as the activity of His creation. So, too, His creatures partake of infinite peace and intensely active service.—T. T. Carter.

We speak of saints and enthusiasts for good, as if some special gifts were made to them in middle age which are withheld from other men. Is it not rather that some few souls keep alive the lamp of zeal and high desire which God lights for most of us while life is young?—Juliana Horatia Ewing.

A READABLE WEEKLY.

"'PUBLIC OPINION' was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read," said Dr. W. R. Nicoll in the "British Weekly."

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

"PUBLIC OPINION" is eminently a readable paper. There is no padding in it. It is a paper which exists to put on record the ideas which men are thinking, and especially the ideas which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress as these are recorded in the world's books, papers, and magazines.

It is a paper specially suited for those who exert public influence—for "PUBLIC OPINION" does not reflect one side of life only—it seeks to cover all sides of thought and opinion.

It is the bare truth to say that there is no other paper published in Great Britain which every week contains such stimulus to thought, or such a vast amount of real information presented lucidly and in a readable type.

"PUBLIC OPINION" is published every Friday, and its price is Twopence. It has been in existence 47 years.

"PUBLIC OPINION" can be obtained from any newsagent or bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to :—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A WELCOME note from the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who sailed from Liverpool by the Sazonia, August 20, and arrived happily in Boston on Wednesday night, August 28, to disembark next morning, tells us this week of his experiences by the way. We hope soon to have further letters from him, with some account of the Missionary visit he is to pay to the Unitarian Churches in Canada, with the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and C. J. Street.

WELCOME home to the Rev. R. H. Lambley, M.A., who reached London this week on his return from Melbourne! In the INQUIRER of August 17 we published an account of the farewell meetings at Melbourne, which showed how high a regard Mr. Lambley had won for himself during his nine years' ministry in that city. Mr. Lambley is a graduate of Oxford, and before going out to Australia held pastorates at Todmorden and Glossop. He is ready now to minister in this country again.

THE Rev. Robert Collyer on September 26 will receive the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters from the University of Leeds, and on the evening of the 28th he will be entertained at dinner by the Yorkshire Unitarian Club, when Lord Airedale is to preside. This dinner is open to non-members (tickets 3s. 6d.), and early application should be made to the hon. sec., Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parfield-mount, Beeston, Leeds.

AN interesting article in the Co-operative News headed "Forge to Pulpit" gives the story of Robert Collyer's career, and recognises him as "one of the foremost preachers of the United States." It relates how, long after his settlement at New York, he heard that the factory in the Washburn valley in Yorkshire at which he worked as a boy was to be demolished, and asked for a piece of the factory bell that used to call him to work at four o'clock in the morning. A member of the Leeds Council sent him the whole bell, which now hangs in the Cornell University, New York, and calls the students to their duties. It says, also, that the gates of Ilkley churchyard, where his first wife and child were buried, are his handicraft.

THE President's address at the Trades Union Congress at Bath, delivered by Mr. A. H. Gill, M.P., dealt chiefly with the subjects of the unemployed and old age pensions. The most pressing question of the hour he declared to be old age pensions, and he recommended that it should be made the first plank in their programme. The only satisfactory measure would be one which provided not less than 5s. a week from the age of 60, and it should be "universal, non-contributory and non-discriminatory." In discussing how the money could be found, he suggested that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should turn his attention to the unearned increment which had accrued to landlords, mining royalties, which, except in England, usually went to the State, and the large fortunes bequeathed and which had been made by means of the industry of the workers. These were sources which could be legitimately tapped. At a subsequent meeting of the Congress a resolution was carried unanimously in agreement with this recommendation, with an instruction to the Parliamentary Committee to initiate a vigorous campaign throughout the country during the winter "with a view of securing immediate solution of this urgent social problem."

A SIGNIFICANT indication of the tendency towards international trades unionism was given by the resolution of severe censure unanimously passed upon Britishers who had engaged themselves to syndicates to interfere in foreign labour disputes. The action of British "blacklegs" at the Hamburg and Antwerp dock strikes was condemned in vigorous terms. Mr. J. O. Grady, M.P., drew attention to cases of "sweating" in the workshops of the social wing of the Salvation Army. His speech and the subsequent resolution that was carried were calm and deliberate, not animated by any hostility to the "Army," but instructing the Parliamentary Committee of the Congress to negotiate with a view to obtaining a full inquiry into the matter, a course which Mr. O'Grady said he believed General Booth would himself insist upon when he was aware of the evidence.

As a whole the conference heartily condemned compulsory military training, which would remove young men from their trades and occupations at the time of life when excellence in craftsmanship is most easily obtained. Another view was presented by Mr. Will Thorne, M.P., on behalf of some Socialists who desire to establish a citizens' army instead of a mercenary standing army; other Socialists, however, declared that he did not represent the general opinion of their body. A resolution in favour of compulsory arbitration in trades disputes was not carried. The Trades Union programme in regard to Education was re-affirmed, though there was decided objection on the part of some delegates representing about one-tenth of the total votes, to the demand for a purely secular system. There was no difference of opinion about feeding children, medical inspection, and the provision of secondary and technical education for every child.

At the final sitting of the Congress it was occupied with the consideration of housing and the unemployed. With unanimity the Bill dealing with the housing of the working classes introduced by Mr. C. W. Bowerman was endorsed, and Mr. Burns and the Government were called upon to fulfil the pledges they had given to deal with this question.

THE problem of the unemployed, it was declared, was due to industry being unorganised and carried on for private profit, not for the use of its products. The remedy advocated was the carrying out of works of public utility by means of the labour at present unemployed, thus laying the foundation for a permanent reorganisation of industry on a co-operative basis.

THE subjects to be considered at the annual convention of the National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, which will meet at Manchester on October 21, are exactly those on which it is important to have the opinion of women workers of all classes. The general subject will be "The Economic Position of Women." Miss Clementina Black will speak on the position of women in the unskilled industries, referring specially to the sweating evil, and Mrs. Beer, M.A., on their position in the skilled industries. The relation between men's and women's labour is a most important subject, to be discussed by Miss Margaret Ashton, and the wage earning of married women is another theme of not less significance. The effect of Trades Union upon the condition of working women, and the position of members of the sex as paid workers in official positions are also to be considered. Last year's convention at Tunbridge Wells was of great interest, and we may expect not less this year.

WHEN the Rev. E. Hall, Congregational minister, of Shirebrook (Derbyshire), offered to conduct evening service for the Rev. E. Braddon, vicar of the parish, who was absent through illness, he acted in a perfectly natural Christian way. And when the vicar accepted the offer of his Nonconformist brother, he acted with similar naturalness. In fact both men acted in such a manner as should not, were things less crooked than they are, call forth any remark. The relations between the two gentlemen seem to have been of that cordial description which should be usual with public teachers of a common faith. When, further, the vicar subsequently asked Mr. Hall to take orders and become his assistant, he pursued a kindly and consistent line, though, had it been left to the vicar instead of the bishop, Mr. Hall's orders were obviously valid enough. But Mr. Hall, who, before becoming a Congregationalist, had been a member of the Church of England, says: "I have no intentions of re-entering the Church of England. I left the Established Church because, as a Sunday-school teacher, I was asked to teach certain doctrines about infant baptism which I do not believe. I still dissent from those doctrines. Nor could I ever ally myself again with a Church which lends itself so readily to ritualism. . . . I could not sacrifice the freedom of action which I have now as a Congregational minister."

THE Church Times characterises Mr. Hall's courteous act as "a flagrant breach of Church order," and further says, "We do not know what the churchwardens were about to permit such an irregularity. . . . As for the part the vicar took in the proceedings, we can only suppose that the state of his health temporarily affected his judgment." Surely, if that be the case, it were not uncharitable to wish for the health of others of the Church clergy to be similarly affected.

THE record of the Rev. Edward Schnadhorst must be all but unique in the annals of Congregational pastorates. A man of independent means, Mr. Schnadhorst devoted himself without fee or reward to the ministry of North Bow Congregational Church, and has lived to celebrate the jubilee of his honorary pastorate. His name is familiar through the fame which came to his younger brother, Mr. Frank Schnadhorst, a distinguished political organiser in the Liberal cause. To choose such service, and to select the East of London for his sphere, were themselves noble intentions. To have persisted in the one work for half a century is to have won the esteem of all religious parties. It is a privilege to join in congratulations to Mr. Schnadhorst on his jubilee and retirement.

Two Russian refugees were recently rescued at Cardiff from the fate to which the Aliens Act would have condemned them. They were two brothers, Lettish labourers, of Libau, who as humble organisers of reform among their fellows had fallen under the suspicions of the police. The elder had been exiled to Archangel, escaped, and returned home only to be recognised by a spy. The younger, only 18 years of age, had eluded the police who had come to arrest him as a Socialist. The brothers met unexpectedly on an emigrant ship bound to New York. There they were refused asylum, and sent back to their fate. But about dawn one morning in the English Channel, they sprang overboard with life-belts, and after nearly four hours in the water were picked up by a Greek steamer bound for Cardiff. Here they had been handed over to the Russian Consul, when the local branch of the I.L.P. asked to be allowed to take all responsibility for them. The request was acceded to, and an endeavour is now being made to find the men suitable employment.

THE visit to this country of the President of the Liberian Republic recalls its founding in 1822, in the palmy days of the African Colonisation Society, as an asylum for emancipated American slaves. Though Henry Clay and many other statesmen upheld its objects, and Abraham Lincoln during his presidency attempted more than once to carry out its policy, it was regarded by the abolitionists as an enemy to emancipation, since, while the repatriation of the whole body of American negroes had become impracticable, the promulgation of the scheme prevented other action. The total population of Liberia now exceeds a million, but probably less than a twentieth part of these are descended from freed and repatriated slaves. It is conceivable, however, that under favourable conditions the emigration of the negro race might in time have been achieved. The population of Ireland has decreased by four millions in sixty years, and 400,000 have left it in the last decade. The number of slaves in America at the time of the Civil War was, if we remember rightly, about four millions. If, therefore, the American nation had so desired, it might ere this have carried Clay's policy to a final conclusion.

FROM BOSTON.

THE boat swung off by inches, by feet, at last clear away from the pier, the crowd shouted, and laughed, and cried—and we were started. Bright afternoon sunshine gilded the roofs and glorified the haze of Liverpool, and the sea-gulls gave us friendly convoy mile after mile. Gradually the hills of Wales rose far on the left, lights began to appear, finally appeared Holyhead with a brilliant constellation; then came night. Next morning the hills and bays of Ireland lay on our right. Presently we anchored off Queenstown and took in great regiments of passengers. By noon we had set off again, and pleasant weather showed us the lonely looking loveliness of the South-West of Ireland, till the last stubborn rock sank into the mist behind us, and the grey Atlantic was all around.

The days that followed were chiefly notable for mists and fogs, unprecedented in such frequency, it was said. We had rain also, but no storm to speak of. Despite the fogs we made good progress, and within two days of American shores the weather turned as beautiful as could be—a good pagan might well have worshipped that glorious sea.

I cannot tell how many pagans we have sailed with; out of some two thousand three hundred souls a few may be suspected of not being as energetically Christian as could be wished. But to all appearance the many hundreds that I have observed have been decent companionable folk, ready to oblige, willing to please and interest one another; while among those who have come into my closer intimacy have been many varieties of sect, class, age, and station—all a great deal nearer (in everything but opinion) than they may have imagined. Our little quartette of Unitarians (supplemented by another or two casually revealed), the genial Congregational minister, the Baptist principal of a "seminary," the zealous Christian Scientist, the Catholic, and the Episcopalian, have all more than managed to exist comfortably together. Sightseers, students, Professors of Harvard College and elsewhere, clerks, blacksmiths, artists, teachers, cockneys, Lancashire lads, Irish Norsemens, Esperantists, traders, propagandists, old, young toddlers, babies—what a little world we have been. We have had chats on things gay and grave; the racy criticisms of Americans on the home country have been accepted or defied as case may be. We have played together and prayed together, coupling King Edward and President Roosevelt in our petitions, and remembering dear ones far away; and at last we have surely come to see that, whether of one country or another, of one church or another, there is "a great deal of human nature about folk." On the whole it seems to me no bad preparation for a world's congress, or for a subsequent writer's work at home, thus to sojourn on the great deep for a week or so, with all sorts and conditions of men, everyone voyaging to the "unknown yet well-known."

This brief note or two will probably give some hint of experiences common to most of us Westward-bound travellers. I may add, for what it may possibly lead to, that my own chief talking has been with the Catholic! W. G. TARRANT.

JOHN RUSKIN'S ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL TEACHING.

I.

THE MANNER AND METHOD OF IT.

MR. J. A. HOBSON remarks in the closing chapter of his interesting and valuable book upon Ruskin: "It is a matter of serious doubt whether his brilliant literary qualities have aided or retarded the acceptance of his thought"; and he practically adopts the less favourable alternative. This must, one would suppose, be a depressing conclusion for so warm an admirer. It must greatly diminish the pleasure with which he sees the cheap editions of Ruskin upon the booksellers' shelves, and reflects that his author will now be more widely read than he ever was before. Those "brilliant literary qualities" will retard the acceptance of his thought by his new readers! Oh, why was he so brilliant?

But no, this is not the kind of question that Mr. Hobson asks. He asks, rather, Why are people so dull and stupid? "Wit and imagination, eloquence and passion," says he, "those qualities which are essential to the 'literature of power,' exercise a curious double and contradictory influence upon the mind of most English readers. While our enjoyment and appreciation of such writing is both keen and genuine, this very relish awakes our suspicion; our cautious temperament shrinks from any full abandonment to the feeling, and our very admiration of emotional power is provided with an automatic check." And again, in more imposing language: "It is primarily due to a false psychology, based on defective temperament, which seeks wrongly to isolate the ratiocinative faculty, and considers that the imaginative faculty has no proper place either in the discovery or the teaching of truth. It is this notion which underlies the popular distrust of an attractive style."

Now, surely there is something radically wrong in all this? How can relish of wit and imagination and eloquence and passion awaken suspicion? Do men taboo the imaginative faculty in the manner described? Is there really any popular distrust of an attractive style? It appears to me that Mr. Hobson has invented a paradox, and then invented others to explain it. Of course, "brilliant literary qualities" may retard the acceptance of a writer's thoughts by those who do not feel them to be such. But how can they produce this effect when they are enjoyed and appreciated? In the very nature of things they must do the opposite. Did they not aid the acceptance of Ruskin's art-teaching? Undoubtedly. Then there must be other reasons for the slow acceptance of his social teaching. Had it imperfections as regards truth and wisdom? Mr. Hobson himself thinks so. For he makes strong criticisms upon some of Ruskin's principal doctrines; and he would, of course, admit that the most brilliant literary qualities ought not to secure acceptance of these doctrines. Not only so. When a proposition is believed by a reader to be false in substance, then every device which is employed to trick it out or give it force is likely to strengthen his feeling of protest. And here, if anywhere, Mr. Hobson's belief in the retarding power of brilliant literary qualities would be appropriate. But, lastly, even Ruskin's literary manner and method may not have been always brilliant; or, even when possessing some brilliant qualities, they may have failed in the important one of perfect suitability to the subject in hand. I have been set pondering over these points, not only by Mr. Hobson's apology for Ruskin in the form of an indictment of his readers, but also by a recent study of "Unto this Last" with a few young people and by a re-reading of a considerable portion of Ruskin's works. And I should like, if possible, to make some contribution to the solution of the question which Mr. Hobson has stated, but (as I think) not solved—namely, Why have Ruskin's ideas not made way more quickly?

First, then, I submit that the extraordinary licence in comprehensive denunciation which Ruskin allowed himself, and which Mr. Hobson is disposed to defend, betrayed a weakness in its author, and aroused an antagonism which was natural and just. As an example, take a passage from Letter 67 of "Fors," a letter which is especially suitable for quotation, because it was written deliberately "that it may be sent to inquirers as alone sufficiently explanatory" of the Constitution of St. George's Company:—

"A 'civilised nation' in modern Europe consists, in broad terms, of (a) a mass of half-taught, discontented, and mostly penniless populace, calling itself the people; of (b) a thing which it calls a Government—meaning an apparatus for collecting and spending money; and (c) a small number of capitalists, many of them rogues, and most of them stupid persons, who have no idea of any object of human existence other than money-making, gambling, or champagne-bibbing. A certain quantity of literary men, saying anything they can get paid to say; of clergymen, saying anything they have been taught to say; of natural philosophers, saying anything that comes into their heads; and of a nobility, saying nothing at all, combine in disguising the action, and perfecting the disorganisation, of the mass. But with respect to practical business, the civilised nation consists, broadly, of mob, money-collecting machine, and capitalist."

This, surely, was strange material for a manifesto designed to enlist Companions of St. George. It was only fit for a company of cynics—cynics of the bitterest brand. Mr. Frederic Harrison, thinking of such passages as this, has said: "It remains a psychological puzzle how one who could write with passion and scorn such as Carlyle and Byron never reached . . . was in private life one of the gentlest, gayest, humblest of men." But he suggests that "vehement language was with Ruskin a literary intoxication rather than a moral fault." This appears to me to be true, so far as it goes, if the word "intoxication" be used in the unfavourable sense implied by Mr. Harrison when he adds, "He has paid a bitter penalty for failing to overcome the tendency."

But this I believe to be only a part, and not the principal part, of the explanation. Ruskin always had a gift for powerful language, but he had not always that vehement and indiscriminating scorn which saddened or repelled so many of his readers.

The contrast between "Fors" and "A Joy for Ever" is marvellous. The latter is one of the most beautiful and noble and strong books of its kind. It anticipates much of the author's later social teaching. It is full of close and clear reasoning, and also of deep feeling. And yet there is not a harsh word in it. What a change must have come over him before he could write, as in "Fors." Here is another example, this time from Letter 58: "I do verily perceive and admit, in convinced sorrow, that I live in the midst of a nation of thieves and murderers; that everybody round me is trying to rob everybody else. . . . I yet do verily trust that out of this festering mass of scum of the earth, and miserable coagulation of frog-spawn soaked in ditch-water, I can here and there pluck up some drowned honour by the locks."

It is clear that when Ruskin wrote thus he saw things in false proportions. He was not merely a victim of "literary intoxication." He frequently defended himself from both friendly and hostile criticism of his manner by asserting the entire seriousness and deliberateness of his choice of language. "I never set down a single word but with the serenest purpose" (Letter 44). "The violence, or grotesque aspect, of a statement may seem as if I were mocking; but this comes mainly of my endeavour to bring the absolute truth out into pure crystalline structure, unmodified by disguise of custom or obscurity of language" (Letter 67).

Such statements are hard to accept without deduction. Ruskin was apt to forget how and what he had written. But in many bitter passages there is an elaborateness of construction and a fineness of finish which are inconsistent with passionate haste. And, often at least, we can but take his word that to him his most savage denunciation was "a pure, very dreadful, and utterly imperious veracity." There we have the principal source of the tragic failure of his economic and social crusade. What he thought to be most true or wise, others, even his best friends and sincerest disciples, thought to be not true or wise. And he knew well enough that literary qualities, brilliant or otherwise, had little to do with the matter. "I am left utterly stranded, and alone, in life and thought," he writes in Letter 37. "I don't suppose any man with a tongue in his head and zeal to use it was ever left so entirely unattended to, as he grew old, by his early friends; and it is doubly and trebly strange to me, because I have lost none of my power of sympathy with them." Such pathetic words often recur in "Fors." Let us pass to the second cause which made them true.

At the end of Letter 67, in the original edition of "Fors," there is a letter to Ruskin from Mr. Frederic Harrison which contains this sentence: "Your 'Fors' fills me with melancholy each time I read it." And what was Mr. Harrison's complaint? That Ruskin was not content with general denunciations of society at large, or the great classes into which it is divided, but that he singled out the political economists and kindred thinkers for special vituperation, as being propaga-tors of the generally accepted ideas, and therefore responsible for all existing evils. Thus, in Letter 5, we read: "You have founded an entire science of Political Economy, on what you have stated to be the constant instinct of man—the desire to defraud his neighbour." In Letter 62 we have the statement that "Adam Smith formally, in the name of the philosophers of Scotland and England . . . declared that all men 'naturally' desired their neighbours' goods, and that in the name of Covetousness all the nations of the earth shall be blessed." And in Letter 78 we have Adam Smith's teaching summed up thus: "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye hate one another." The name of J. S. Mill is repeatedly used in a similar manner.

How Ruskin came to make such foul charges against honourable men is an interesting and important question upon which I may say something in a future article. At present I only point to them as a principal clue to the distrust with which his economic and social doctrines were met from the first. For the spirit which they breathe dictated the very first words of "Unto this Last."

I will now only speak of one more point—namely, the remarkable fewness of the references or quotations with which Mr. Ruskin supported his tremendous charges. He quoted Adam Smith, I believe, only once; and it is significant that he then misunderstood him entirely and fatally. I refer to the quotation which is made in the preface to "Unto this Last." The quotation is followed (only in Allen's editions) by "a very earnest request to any Christian reader to think within himself what an utterly damned state of soul any human creature must have got into who could read with acceptance such a sentence as this, much more write it." In all Ruskin's writings there is nothing more damning to his reputation as a student and critic of the Economists than this judgment. Adam Smith argues that close trade-corporations (such as existed in his day) were a less effective check to malpractices than direct and free dealing between producer and consumer would be. And I will indicate the real meaning of the passage quoted, by inserting in square brackets the qualifications which are implied by the context. "The effectual discipline which is exercised over a workman [who needs it] is not that of his corporation, but of his customers. It is the fear of losing their employment which restrains his frauds and corrects his negligence [whenever he is inclined to fraud or negligence]." It is very extraordinary that Ruskin should have read this passage as approving, or accepting as normal, the type of workman described. For observe that, even if Adam Smith is mistaken in his comparison of methods, his aim is the checking of fraud and negligence, which was also the aim of all Ruskin's economic and social teaching.

The danger in reading Ruskin is not what Mr. Hobson supposes it to be. The danger is that his brilliant literary qualities will aid the acceptance of his thought, even when it is false. True, the careful reader will learn to suspect those qualities when he finds them frequently associated with error; and, if he has been led seriously astray, he may even feel aversion.

Both critic and disciple must learn the habit of respectful frankness if they would select and appropriate the good things which have been put abundantly at their service by the many and varied qualities of so great a writer and man as John Ruskin.

H. RAWLINGS.

NEW EDITION OF JULIAN'S DICTIONARY OF HYMNOLGY.*

STUDENTS and lovers of hymnody will very cordially welcome the revised edition of Dr. Julian's "Dictionary of Hymnology," with all the added information contained in its new Supplement. The Dictionary was published originally in 1892, a work of immense patience and wide research in a subject which had never been so systematically treated before, and three years ago the first edition was exhausted. A mere reprint from the stereotype plates for a fresh edition would not satisfy the enthusiasm of the editor, or really meet the need of the continued demand for such a work, since the years that had passed since its appearance had brought much new material into the field, and there were naturally many fresh dates of the lives and the death of hymn-writers to be recorded. But to re-cast the whole work would have been too great a labour and too great a cost, and it was therefore decided to add a new Supplement, while such corrections of the plates of the original work as were necessary and possible, with an added line here and there, were made. Thus, in the body of the original article on James Martineau there was just room to add the date of his death, on January 11, 1900; and a good many of such additions have been made, while in many other cases a separate line in the new Supplement makes the record of death. It was, perhaps, too much to expect that all the mistakes in the original work would be corrected by costly alterations of the plates. Thus, of small details in articles of special interest to our readers we note that Samuel Longfellow is still credited with having been minister at Gall, instead of Fall River, and his ministry at Germantown is dated 1860 instead of 1878. It was in 1860 that he went abroad and at Nice selected the hymns for his and Johnson's "Hymns of the Spirit" (1864). The date of his death, October 3, 1892, is added at the end of the article. Then, in the original article on Unitarian Hymnody there is a mistake which we should have been glad to see corrected (p. 1, 193, i.). The part of the edition of Dr. Priestley's hymn-book of 1790 (which thus escaped destruction by the Birmingham mob) was not provided, as stated, for Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, but for the Mosley-street congregation, and it was probably as a supplement to this collection that the Rev. J. J. Tayler's selection of 1829 was made.

The original Dictionary contained 1,616 pages, but now, with the new Supplement, the number is 1,768.

Of the additions made to the principal articles we note in that on Church of

* A Dictionary of Hymnology, setting forth the Origin and History of Christian Hymns of all Ages and Nations. Edited by John Julian, D.D., Vicar of Topcliffe, Yorkshire; Prebendary of Fenton in York Minster; and Canon of York. Revised edition, with new Supplement. (John Murray. 1907. 21s. net.)

England Hymnody a record of the new edition of "Church Hymns," 1903, and of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," 1904, "received with great coldness," and the publication of "The English Hymnal" of 1906, of which it is said that "if some fifteen to twenty hymns at most were eliminated it would be a formidable rival to the new edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.'" Under Methodist Hymnody the new Wesleyan book of 1904 is fully described—a book of which more than a million and a half copies were sold within twelve months of publication! Among the additions to Scottish Hymnody there is the "Church Hymnary" of 1898, used by the chief churches of that country, and among Congregational books Mr. Garret Horder's "Hymns Supplemental" of 1894, and the completed edition of his "Worship Song," in 1898, with the musical edition of 1905. In the further article on American Hymnody four new books are recorded, but the name of Mrs. Tileston, editor of the "Hymns for Church and Home, with Tunes," published by the A.U.A. in 1895, is misspelt, with an initial F.

Nearly three columns of the Supplement are given to the article on English Unitarian Hymnody, which describes the two editions of the Essex Hall Hymnal (1890 and 1902) and the "New Hymnal" of 1905, noting also the 1891 edition of Mr. Stopford Brooke's "Christian Hymns," the Manchester College Book, and several others, including three children's hymn-books. Notes are added on several recent and living Unitarian hymn-writers—Agate, Blatchford, Chalmers, Russell, Sadler, and Tarrant. Single hymns by five other writers are also mentioned.

One feature of special interest to our readers in this new Supplement will be the notes on a number of the hymns of Gannett and Hosmer, material for which was supplied by the authors themselves, and those on Chadwick's hymns, supplied by his widow. Dr. Savage also comes into the Supplement (where he follows Sankey, while close by is a further note on the hymns of Savonarola). He is, however, credited with being still in Boston (1906), when he had been for years at the Church of the Messiah, in New York, as colleague to Robert Collyer, whose hymn, "Unto thy temple, Lord, we come," written for the dedication of Unity Church, Chicago, is duly recorded.

One other instance we will mention of how the Supplement brings welcome additions to our knowledge. In the second appendix to the original Dictionary the three hymns by T. A. Ashworth, in Martineau's two books of 1840 and 1873, "Christian Warrior," "Pour, blessed gospel," and another are recorded, with the note added: "Concerning Mr. Ashworth we have no definite information." Now we find that he has been traced as a native of Manchester, born January 1, 1806; vicar of Farnworth, 1830–36, where he published a "New Selection of Hymns" for his church in 1831, including those three hymns of his own; and he died at Hillingdon, near Uxbridge, February 5, 1884.

We are tempted still to linger among the many interests of this new Supplement; but must refrain, and now simply commend this new edition of an invaluable work to friends on both sides of the Atlantic.

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY.*

WITH this volume the Cambridge History enters upon definitely modern times. We have passed the watershed of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, and find ourselves in the dull and yet, for the future, highly significant period which stretches from the Congress of Vienna to the eve of the revolutionary outbreak in '48. It was a period of incubation, of transition and incompleteness, in which we can see clearly the dependence of social and political change upon the silent working of spiritual and intellectual forces. And other spirits there are standing apart

Upon the forehead of the age to come ;
These, these will give the world another heart,

And other pulses. Hear ye not the hum of mighty workings ?—

Listen awhile, ye nations, and be dumb.

So Keats had written, with prophetic insight, in 1817.

One notable feature of the present volume is the number of foreign scholars among the contributors. Professor Émile Bourgeois writes on reaction and revolution in France, and on the Orleans Monarchy, Professor Carlo Segré on Italy—an essay which includes the movement of the Carbonari, the early years of Mazzini, and some account of the literary activity of Manzoni, Silvio Pellico and Rosmini—Professor Rafael Altamira on Spain, Professor Askenazy on Russia and on Poland and the Polish Revolution. This mass of translated work cannot be said to enhance the literary quality of the History, but this is hardly noticeable where the point of view is so rigidly scientific and the English contributors pay such scant attention to graces of style. In any case this unavoidable defect is compensated for by the close association of English and Continental scholars in the work of historical research. Nothing could be of better omen for the emancipation of the study of history from the blighting influence of political and religious prejudice.

We have called attention previously to the tentative and unsatisfactory way in which the Cambridge History discusses literature and purely intellectual influences in their relation to national life. In the present case, we are not disposed to quarrel with the inclusion of two chapters devoted entirely to literature in Germany and England respectively, for the revolution in knowledge and ideas prepared the way more than anything else for the rapid growth of popular liberties, and the advent of modern democracy. If we have a complaint it is that we are treated too much to a catalogue of names and dates interspersed with a few lines of literary criticism, and too little to a broad survey of intellectual and spiritual tendencies in their relation to political development. Within these limits, Professor Robertson's account of literature in Germany may be commended. His tribute to the influence of Herder—in some important respects he sets him above Lessing—is particularly good. "All that is best in the next hundred years of German intellectual history—and much that has made for progress in that of Europe as a whole—may be traced back to Herder's stimulating initiative. He, for instance, first clearly understood the principles of the organic evolution of national life; and, with the help of this conception, he revolutionised the methods of historical science, and defined the principles of modern æsthetics and literary criticism." His observations on Goethe, and the critical use which he makes of the inevitable comparison between Goethe and Schiller, are also worthy of close attention. Dr. Courthope writes on the Revolution in English Poetry and Fiction in the even and unimaginative style to which we have grown accustomed in his History of English Poetry. Some of his critical observations are likely to win only a very partial assent. Thus, when he tells us that "it was not so much the matter of Burns' verse as the complete propriety of its poetic form, which won for him the unique place he holds in the affections of his countrymen," the reader is inclined to ask where the Scottish peasantry obtained this doubtful gift—usually the mark of an exotic and over-civilised taste—of valuing metrical form more than the emotions of love and pity and tears, the matter of lyrical verse which makes any wide appeal to the popular heart. Dr. Courthope's remarks on the poetry of Walter Savage Landor reveal to our mind a critical blindness to his great lyrical qualities; and his whole treatment of Shelley is unsympathetic. By the way, was it not Shelley's youthful essay on the Necessity of Atheism, and not, as Dr. Courthope says, his wild political enthusiasm, which led to his expulsion from Oxford?

The last two chapters are devoted to economics. Professor Chapman's essay on Economic Change is a broad and interesting survey of the progress in agriculture, means of transport, engineering, and the various branches of industry in the British Isles and abroad. Professor Nicholson writes on the British Economists, Adam Smith, Ricardo, and Malthus among the great pioneers, and in the second rank Godwin, Robert Owen, Arthur Young and many others, who illustrate the growth of economic thought along divergent lines and the emergence of the problems of modern industrial life. W. H. D.

WHEN a pure and resolute mind has made some great sacrifice to truth and duty, has manifested its attachment to God and man in singular trials, we do not feel as if the whole energy of virtuous principle were now put forth, as if the measure of excellence were filled, as if the maturest fruits were now borne, and henceforth the soul could only repeat itself. We feel, on the contrary, that virtue by illustrious efforts replenishes instead of wasting its life; that the mind, by perseverance in well-doing, instead of sinking into a mechanical tameness, is able to conceive of higher duties, is armed for a nobler daring, and grows more efficient in charity. The mind, by going forward, does not reach insurmountable prison-walls, but learns more and more the boundlessness of its powers, and of the range for which it was created.—Channing.

TWO LETTERS AND A CONTRAST.

THE following letters have been received by Van missionaries. They are typical of different orthodox attitudes and explain themselves.

No. 1.—To —.

A word of kindly warning to the Unitarian missionaries. The word of the Lord is—He that believeth and is baptized, not he that does his duty towards God and man merely, but he that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned. Beware! lest you find your eternal portion with the Devil in the lake of fire for ever and ever, or unto the ages of the ages. Rev. xix. 10.

Please read the following lines to audience. [The lines were on "Eternity," and the writer also enclosed a copy of a pamphlet he had recently published, adding a postscript praying that its recipient might be led to "tremble at God's word," &c.]

No. 2.—SIR,—As one of your audience last night I feel under a deep sense of obligation to you for the very plain and straightforward manner in which you answered the legion of very perplexing and difficult questions put to you. I am frank enough to admit that I am not a Unitarian, and that having been cradled amidst beliefs and teachings foreign to your own, I cannot as yet accept in its entirety your teaching, but I nevertheless respect you as a man who is trying to uplift his fellows to a higher sense of their responsibilities to the Supreme Being as the Governor of the earth and all that is therein. I sincerely trust your stay with us will prove a blessing to yourself and the cause you represent, and, should no other good result from it, you may leave this town conscious that your mission has brought men and women to their Bibles—so often and so sadly neglected—and that, not alone to read, but also to consider what they do read. Trusting that this may be of some little encouragement to you, and with every good wish.

SHORT NOTICE.

The Making of a Miracle, by T. W. S. Jones, purports to be "the true story" of New Pompeii and of the Sanctuary of the Madonna of the Rosary there, which is described as the "newest, the most fashionable, the most widely popular, the most successful of the countless miraculous shrines" devoted to the worship of Mary. Mr. Jones views Roman Catholicism and all its works from the ordinary Protestant Evangelical standpoint, and he can hardly, perhaps, be regarded as a very impartial historian; but he writes largely from personal knowledge and observation, and has certainly much that is interesting to tell. How the now famous picture of the Madonna was purchased for eight carlini (about 2s. 7d.) and brought to New Pompeii on a dung cart; how after being installed in the church it began to manifest "miraculous" powers; and the many ingenious ways by which Signor Bartolo Lougo, the founder of the sanctuary, has made these powers efficacious for the devout, may be learnt from this book. In dealing with his subject Mr. Jones refers to the growing cult of Joseph, and gives much information regarding the more superstitious developments of Catholicism generally. (Elliot Stock, 6s.).

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

ONE of my bad days for German happened to be a Sunday. I preached very nervously and haltingly. In the course of the next few days four people said to me, "We understood you much better last Sunday than before. You gave us more time," or words to that effect. This set me thinking and investigating, and I found that my somewhat too literary German was, as a medium of communication with my parishioners, even less adequate than I had supposed. The sooner I began to preach in Ladin, the better for my work.

Romanish, you must know, though spoken by less than 50,000 people, is yet broken up into any number of dialects. The chief division, that between the Oberland and the Engadin, is almost great enough to justify our speaking of two distinct languages. They differ in syntax, accidence, vocabulary, orthography, pronunciation. Where the man of Disentis says igl luft, igl sufel, igl urizzi, for air, wind, storm, the man of Celerina says l'aria, il vent, il temporel. When they both say tatt, the one means grandfather, the other great-grandfather. Where they both have the same word for the same thing, they do their best to conceal the fact. Igl uffont=il infaut=child; l'aua=l'ova=water; igl feug=il fö=fire. Between these two lie the dialects of Oberhalbstein and Bergün. Then again, the dialect of the Surselva is different in many respects from the ordinary Oberländisch, the language of the Unterengadin varies remarkably from that of the Oberengadin, and the indigenous Münstertaler dialect is a third thing. There are other minor dialects, and, even within the limits of the same dialect, the choice of words and the pronunciation varies from village to village. You can walk from Bevers to Celerina before breakfast, but in one place the commonest of verb forms, the word for "is," is pronounced like "ice," in the other like "ex," though in both it is written ais.

The late Dr. Bühler, of Chur, devoted his life to the construction of an eclectic literary dialect, which should become the current Romanish of cultivated men. But his own Oberländer would have nothing to do with it.

To show the likeness and unlikeness of the dialects of the Upper and Lower Engadin, here are the last two verses of John in both idioms. If you are not interested you may skip them. If you are interested, please note that ai and au are both pronounced, as a rule, in Oberengadinisch something like the German ä, while in the lower valley they are pronounced like the same diphthongs in German.

Oberengadin: Quist ais il discipul, chi do perdüta da quaistas chosas; e nus savains, cha sia testimoniaunza ais vaira. A sun auncha bgeras chosas, cha Gesu ho fat, e scha quellas gnissan scrittass sü üna zieva l'otra, craj eau, cha'l muond svesse nun podess contgnair ils cudeschs, chi füssan da scriver.

Unterengadin: Quaist ais quel scolar, chi testifica da quaistas chosas; e nus savain, cha sia testimonianza ais vaira. Ma qua sun eir bleras otras chosas, cha Gesu ha fat, las qualas, scha füssan scrittass d'üna in üna, schi m'impaiss, cha'l muond istess non podess tgnair aint ils cudeschs, chi gnissan scrirts.

The men of the Vorderrhein call their language Romontsch, those of the Upper Inn say Romauntsch (with a vowel like the English a in wares), and the Unterengadiner Ladin. The last-named dialect seems to be purest, and shows most clearly what spoken Latin was like in nooks which the ferule of Orbilius did not reach. Pity the case of a Grammar School boy who should show up a copy of prose with such sentences as this: O quantum bellos sunt super illos montes illos pedes de qualem qui portat bonas novas, qui annuntiat illam pacem; qui portat novas de bonum, qui annuntiat illum salutem, qui dicit ad Sion: teos Deus regnat.—Or this: Illum senior est meos pastorem; ego non venio ad habere mancum.—Yet this is plainly the kind of Latin which used to be spoken here, the Latin which underlies my inductor's text, and that of my first Romanish sermon.

I had made some little progress with the dialect of the upper valley, chiefly through listening to sermons at Celerina; then, in view of coming here, I had read a little Ladin, and lastly had found, to my great joy, a version of William Tell in the "Ladin da Müstair." But I learned at Cierfs that this last work represents the idiom of Münster village, and is further away from that of my parishes than is the Ladin of the Inn Valley. I also discovered that in the schools the same books are used here as at Schuls and Lavin, so that what may be called standard Ladin is understood, though it is not spoken with the Engadin accent. Wherefore, I decided to preach in that language.

Before preaching in any tongue it is, I believe, usual to learn that tongue. But after a month in the Münstertal I was no whit nearer a conversational command of Ladin than when I came; nor, so long as my intercourse with the folk—beyond a passing "bundi" or "buna saira"—was all in German, was I likely to make much progress. I could not hang about odd groups of village debaters, on the chance of picking up a word or two, or haunt the public-house with that object. In short, if I meant to swim I must enter the water. I must learn to preach in Ladin by—preaching in Ladin.

I wrote a sermon in German. Then I translated it as well as I could, with constant reference to the Bible when I was in doubt about an idiom, into Romanish. Next I called on my amiable Kirchenvorsteher, begged a favour, and made an appointment. "I am going to read something out to you," said I, when I had captured him. "Pull me up when I go wrong." He pulled me up fairly often. Now I had mispronounced, now made use of an Oberengadinisch word, now of a dictionary term which the people would not understand. Once or twice I was all astray in idiom. Still, the experiment was decidedly encouraging. The thing as a whole was intelligible; I made no mistakes in grammar or syntax; my pronunciation won applause. (The great difficulties are, first, to distinguish tsch, the sound in "nutshell," from ch; the sound in "much;" second, to frame the horrible s-ch [=schch] trippingly on the tongue; and not stop in mid career to wrestle with it; third, to trill the peculiar Romanish r exactly aright).

I preached that sermon, or something as nearly like it as I could manage, next Sunday in Cierfs. Number five of my first sermons! It was the most nervous of all. Indeed, I was almost on the point of deciding for German at the last moment, and would have done so if I had not been sure that I should never be able, after such cowardice, to brush my hair without blushing. As it was, my suffering told upon my construction, and I fear, upon my audience too. But I went on, and went through without any ghastly tragedy, and as I left the church after the women, I heard the men behind me break out in a sudden buzz like a startled hive.

It went better at Fuldera. I made three mistakes. One was to insert somewhere a superfluous indefinite article; the second, to say, "in good ways," Anglicè, instead of "on good ways"; the third, to mispronounce a vowel (ü for u) in the liturgy. In comparison with my purpose of getting home to the people's minds and hearts such slips as these, I told myself, are not important. I dare say I have sometimes made worse slips even in English. And I decided to preach again next Sunday, my first Sunday in Lü, in Ladin.

The good people on the heights had festooned their pretty little church in honour of my coming. I was glad to have some little observance to offer them in requital. But I was even more nervous than I had been at Cierfs. Once, indeed, I lost my thread, but regained it in the course of a harmless interpolation. The day was magnificent, and the walk down to Cierfs, a splendid tonic. "If anybody had told me three years ago that I should to-day be walking, high up on a mountain side, amid an Alpine panorama which is grand beyond dreaming, under such a sky as I had never then seen, from a parish church where I had been preaching in Ladin to another where I was to do likewise, I fear I should have been rude to him." I preached that sermon again to the woods and peaks; and when I preached it for the third time, in Cierfs, I am bold to think it was free from error—I mean, of course, philologically speaking; its theology is another matter.

Fuldera.

E. W. LUMMIS.

MULTITUDES who profess to believe in Christ have no faith in the efficacy of his spirit, or in the accomplishment of that regenerating work which he came to accomplish. There is a worse scepticism than what passes under the name of infidelity, a scepticism as to the reality and the power of moral and Christian truth; and accordingly a man who calls on a nation to love the great family of which it is a part, to desire the weal and the progress of the race, to blend its own interests with the interests of all, to wish well to its foes, must pass for a visionary—perhaps in war would be called a traitor. The first teacher of Universal Love was nailed to the cross for withstanding the national spirit, hopes, and prejudices of Judea. His followers, in these better days, escape with silent derision or neglect.—Channing.

OBITUARY.

MR. ALFRED BACHE.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Alfred Bache, M.I.M.E., M.I.C.E., which took place at his residence, St. Mary's-place, Penzance, on Friday morning, September 6, at the age of 72. Mr. Bache, who was a brother of Edward and Walter Bache, the well-known musicians, was born in Birmingham, August 5, 1835, the son of the Rev. Samuel Bache, for many years minister of the New Meeting, Birmingham. He was educated at the Edgbaston Proprietary School, whence in 1852 he matriculated at London University, being first in Classical Honours and winning the exhibition. Entering the engineering department of Queen's College, Birmingham, he graduated B.A. (London) in 1854, and was third in the honours list for mathematics and natural philosophy. In the then new workshop at Queen's, many of the tools were forged, sharpened, and tempered by his hands. On leaving college in 1854 he entered the office of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers, then located in Birmingham, as assistant to the secretary, and in 1869 the council of the institution appointed him to be their assistant secretary. In 1877 the institution was removed from Birmingham to London, and in 1884 (the year after his marriage) Mr. Bache was elected secretary out of 190 candidates by a very large majority. The institution then had 1,554 members, and an invested capital of £10,617. Under Mr. Bache's management the progress was so rapid that in 1897, his last year, the membership had increased to 2,496, and the invested capital was £35,893. In 1898 he resigned the secretaryship on account of failing health, after having served the institution for forty-four years, being succeeded in that office by Mr. Edgar Worthington.

Since his retirement Mr. Bache has resided at Penzance, and there found welcome leisure once more fully to indulge his great love of music. While in Birmingham Mr. Bache had been a pupil of Mr. Stimpson, organist of the Town Hall, and himself achieved a considerable reputation as an organist. The Penzance Choral Society was much indebted to his practical interest, as was also the military band and the Penzance Library, for Mr. Bache was an accomplished linguist and a good draughtsman. A man of unfailing kindness, Mr. Bache has left many friends. He was held in high regard in the town where the evening of his life was spent.

LET us have a church that dares imitate the heroism of Jesus, seek inspiration as he sought it, judge the past as he, act on the present like him, pray as he prayed, work as he wrought, live as he lived. Let our doctrines and our forms fit the soul as the limbs fit the body, growing out of it, growing with it. Let us have a church for the whole man, truth for the mind, good works for the hands, love for the heart; and, for the soul, that aspiring after perfection, that unfaltering faith in God which, like lightning in the clouds, shines brightest when elsewhere it is most dark.—Theodore Parker.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE HOSPITAL FETE.

IT was a bright sunny afternoon, and Tommy and Lilian were in high spirits. They were on the top of an electric tramcar, going with their mother to a fête in aid of the hospital.

"What is a 'Hospital Fête,' mummy?" asked Lilian.

"A hospital," said Mrs. Weldon, "is a place where poor people can go when they are ill, and be nursed by good nurses and attended by good doctors for nothing. Hospitals are a great boon to poor people. Some day I will take you to see the one where the poor little children go when they are ill or hurt. But a great deal of money is wanted to keep the hospitals going, and this fête is one way of raising it. 'Hospital Sunday' is another way. It gives all the people who go to church or chapel the chance of contributing, and 'Hospital Saturday' is another way. This is 'Hospital Saturday.'"

At this moment the tram stopped at a crossing, and a man with a white band on his arm and a red cross on it lifted a box on the end of a long stick to the people on the top of the tramcar.

"Is that for the hospital, mummy?" whispered Lilian.

"Yes, dear."

Then little Lilian began to fumble for the sixpence her mother had given her to spend at the bazaar.

"Hurry up, miss!" called the conductor over the top of the car.

Lilian grew very pink, but still she fumbled, and still the box on the long pole waited by her till at last she found the precious sixpence in the inside of her glove and put it in the box.

Then the hospital collector moved on, and so did the tramcar.

"Well," said Tommy, when they had got off the tram and were walking towards the park, "well, you were a silly, Lilian, to give away that sixpence. Now you won't be able to buy anything at the bazaar, and that's for the hospital, too, you know!"

"No, Tommy," replied his mother. "Lilian has done well. It's all very well to buy things at bazaars, but after all someone else has given the things first, so the gift to the hospital is really theirs, not ours, who buy. And remember, Tommy, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'"

Lilian gave her mother's hand a little grateful squeeze, and they reached the park gates. Inside there were flags fluttering and prettily dressed people, and booths with things to sell, and a tent with a concert going on, and a place for shying at cocoanuts, and a big lake with a fresh breeze blowing up from it, and green trees and sunshine.

Mrs. Weldon went to a tent where white-capped hospital nurses were busy selling things to a crowd of ladies. She was a long time buying things there while the children fidgeted outside. Lilian had no money left to spend, and Tommy could not see anything he wanted to buy.

"Come along, Lilian," cried he, at last; "we'll go to the cocoanut place, and I'll have three shies, and you shall have the other three with my sixpence."

So they trotted off to the cocoanut place, and to their great delight they each hit a cocoanut, and went back joyfully to the nurses' tent, where they met their mother coming out laden with parcels.

"Now, children," said she, "we'll go to one of those little tables and have tea, and then we'll go to the Baby Show!"

So they had a delicious tea brought them by a smiling lady in a white dress, and then they hurried eagerly off to the Baby Show.

They found a sort of pen with a number of mothers and babies inside, and a bigger enclosure round it into which they went by paying something, and outside that a great crowd of people stood, seeing as much as they could without paying.

The poor mothers in the pen looked very hot. Some smiled, some looked tired, and some looked stolid, as if they didn't care about anything.

Every mother had a baby dressed in its best. There were fat babies, thin babies, pretty babies, plain babies, dark babies, fair babies, and every mother thought her baby the best, of course, and hoped to gain a prize. So they all sat and faced the people till the two doctors, who were to judge the babies, came.

It seemed a long time, but there was one dear little friendly soul there of fifteen months who kept smiling and waving her hands at the people, and at last scrambled out of the pen, and toddled among them, and everybody smiled at her, and watched her, and wanted her to come to them, and so by her sweetness she whiled away the long, dull, hot time till the judges came.

At last they arrived, and went round among the babies, asking questions of the mothers, and awarding the prizes. There were first, second, and third prizes for babies under six months, and the same for babies over six but under twelve months.

Soon one happy mother was placed on a chair in the front, and a big blue bow was put on her sweet little baby. She had got the first prize.

"I'm so glad, mummy," said Lilian, "for I did think that the dearest baby of them all!" But the baby slept on in her mother's lap, all unconscious of her honours.

Then came another proud mother and sat beside the first, and her baby wore a big yellow bow, for he had got the second prize, and yet another came forward with a big red bow on her baby. This was the one that had got the third prize.

They all sat in a row, happily smiling and talking together, while the doctors went to judge the older babies on the other side of the pen. Suddenly came a loud and angry voice, "I've had enough of this! I'm going home!" and a vexed, cross young woman, whose baby had failed to get a prize struggled through the crowd and carried him away.

"What a pity, children," said Mrs. Weldon, "that she has lost her temper. See how it spoils everything, and makes her look ridiculous, and see how sweet and patient all the other mothers are whose children have not won prizes. They know they can't all have prizes, and they take their failure calmly, and are glad their friends should have success."

The six successful mothers and babies were then photographed in a row with all the others behind them, while everybody cheered them, and then the Baby Show was over, and Tommy and Lilian were tired, and their mother took them home.—V. SOLLY.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

THE liberal movement within the Roman Catholic Church has again been brought under the notice of English readers during the last few weeks by some remarkable publications. In the Times of August 10 and 12 appeared two articles by M. PAUL SABATIER on "The First Four Years of PIUS X.'s Pontificate," in which all honour was done to the personal character of the Pope, his humility and saintliness, but at the same time the complete failure of his government of the Church, in face of the present crisis, both in France and Italy, was clearly set forth. A saint of mediæval temper, imperfectly educated, misinformed and ill advised as to the true significance of the modern movements of thought and life, PIUS X., in his conception of his high office and the needs of the Church, "is already defeated; with him and in him the old conception of transcendental authority is perishing honourably, but for ever." Such is M. SABATIER's judgment; and he adds: "Does this mean that the life of the Church is stricken, and its organisation moribund? Far from it. The end of the extrinsic conception of authority will no more be the end of the Church than the end of belief in the divine right of Kings has been the end of France. Already within the Church itself, under the influence of men like Father TYRRELL, LOISY, LABERTHONNIÈRE, LE ROY, MURRI, SEMERIA, and others, a new conception of authority is growing up, thanks to which the Church will become once more, above and beyond the grouping of nationalities, a higher fatherland, a laboratory of disinterested work, an asylum for those who feel as an imperious instinct the need of not living egotistically from one day to the other." And again towards the close of the second article we read: "The POPE on the one hand, the modernists on the other, are the representatives of two mentalities, of two civilisations, confronting each other. Which of the two will prevail? To state the question is to answer it.

Life and youth must necessarily prevail." And M. SABATIER, who, though himself a Protestant, has the deepest sympathy with the Catholic ideal, and believes wholeheartedly in its persistence in the ancient Church, concludes with an appeal to the POPE on behalf of earnest believers, who have been sorely tried by recent events, but desire still to recognise in him "the living symbol of the spiritual unity of humanity." They wait, says M. SABATIER, "for no apparition of the Archangel Michael, for no startling revelation of the Divine mysteries. They wait for a word of human truth, of living reality, which shall awaken a powerful echo in their hearts, and give them strength to escape from materialism."

The appeal to the POPE, in view of what has just been said, must appear rather hopeless, but such faith in the future of the Church as it embodies is undoubtedly held with very deep conviction and a passionate loyalty by many liberals within its fold. Of this we have further witness in two new books, the first by Father TYRRELL, author of that most striking "Much Abused Letter," to which we have already called attention: "Through SCYLLA and CHARYBDIS, or the Old Theology and the New, by GEORGE TYRRELL" (Longmans, 5s. net)—a book which goes to the very heart of religion; and the second: "What we Want: An Open Letter to PIUS X. from a group of Priests. Translated from the Italian, together with the Papal Discourse which called forth the letter, by A. LESLIE LILLEY, Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington Green" (Murray, 2s. net). This manifesto of a group of Italian priests, loyal friends of DON ROMOLO MURRI, leader of the Christian Democrats in that country, is more severe even than M. SABATIER in its criticism of the POPE, and unequivocally declares their welcome both of science and democracy, in the interest of religion and the Church. "Christianity," these priests maintain, "exists in the world as a law of Love and of Truth. It is love and truth that inspire those two factors of modern civilisation—science and democracy. That we may make it Christian we have welcomed them, seeking to make them our own, without reserve, without fear, without excessive concern for the past." And their plea for a new spirit within the Church and a wiser policy in its government is thus stated:—

"The democracy demands of the Church not only an attitude less conservative and less intent upon favouring the last remnants of the privileged nobility, but also a transformation and purification of forms and persons in her own Government, still as tenaciously monarchical and absolute as when she adopted it at the end of the third century and consolidated it in the Middle Ages. To this end those old coercive methods must be abandoned or relaxed; a certain measure of autonomy in their own provinces must be restored to the Bishops; a more liberal consideration shown towards the religious activity of the laity; sounder tests established in the choice of persons appointed to the supreme direction of her affairs; and in this directing body a wider representation of foreign nations provided for, whereby each may be governed by rules suited to its genius and local requirements." And in the same spirit they go on to demand freedom for the truth, both in science and the comparative study of religions, as all embodying "revelations of God to the human soul." It is not any imposition of authority that will confirm the people's faith. The soul, through its own free action, they declare, must find the ultimate truths of religion, "must find their reasons and learn their worth under the stimulus of its own religious experience, and bring this experience into relation with the religious experience of the human spirit throughout the ages."

That is the view of religion expounded in a most searching manner and with great power and beauty of expression by Father TYRRELL in his new book, while he also makes an uncompromising demand for the liberation of the Church from the present ill-advised despotism of its government, and pleads for a more spiritual conception of its Catholic ideal. "Through SCYLLA and CHARYBDIS" is a collection of essays, most of which have already appeared in this country or in foreign reviews, but it also contains a new essay on "Revelation" to which we would call special attention. It appears to us worthy to take its place as a classical utterance of religious faith, side by side with the section on Worship, in ROBERT BARCLAY'S "Apology for the True Christian Divinity" (1676), a vindication of the principles and doctrines of "the people called, in scorn, Quakers."

"On the ears of the hearer," says Father TYRRELL, "prophetic utterance must fall dead, unless there be within him a capacity to be evoked and directed by the Divine Word, a spirit to answer the Spirit. In default of such, the word may present concepts to the understanding and pictures to the imagination, but no real spiritual content. It will, if anything, rather puzzle, perplex, and annoy, than illuminate and kindle; for it will be estimated as theology or history, and not as true religious revelation—as statement and not as experience. To recur to what is plainly the aptest illustration, it will be as the great poetic and dramatic self-utterances of love to one who has never been stirred by passion, who lacks all experience of the spiritual force that so utters itself. Divine Love, the love of God, and of man in relation to God, is the very sum and substance of religious experience. It is the phenomenon that explains itself spontaneously in Revelation, and which it is the prophet's aim to reproduce in others through the communication of the Divine Word. His work, then, is a social work, analogous to that of the teacher. Thanks to the teaching and tradition of the society into which we are born, we can appropriate the gathered results of the experience and reflection of others, and start, not from nothingness, but with a vast capital at our disposal."

"This assimilation is precisely an act of inward recognition—a response of spirit to spirit, and not only the mental apprehension and acceptance of statements and meanings. This latter is but the assent to the word of man falling on the ear; not to the word of God spoken in the heart and conscience. Conscience must first appropriate the word, recognise it as its own, as the explanation of itself, and so impose it, as it imposes all its behests, imperiously and absolutely. In other words, the teaching from outside must evoke a revelation in ourselves; the experience of the prophet must become experience for us. It is to this evoked revelation that we answer by the act of faith, recognising it as God's word in us and to us. Were it not already written in the depths of our being, where the spirit is rooted in God, we could not recognise it."

* * * *

"Here [in the Old and New Testaments and in the authentic teachings of the Christian Church] mingled inextricably as gold in the ore, with much that is merely theological and ethical reflection, and much that is mere history and sacred legend, we have that revelation of Himself which God has given at sundry times and in divers manners to the prophets, and last of all through His Son JESUS CHRIST and his chosen Apostles. We have, so to say, the utterance of a collective and continuous experience of the human spirit in varying degrees and modes of contact with the Divine. It is ever one and the same truth, one and the same Love, that strives to break into full consciousness and find a sufficing self-utterance, which it finds at last in Him who was pre-eminently the Word of God.

"It is, then, in this great religious tradition that the soul finds the normal and necessary instrument of her awakening, formation, and guidance. Yet to take it as such it must be given her from within. She must see it mirrored in the depths of her own being" (pp. 304-7).

We have made this long quotation as the surest way of sending readers to Father TYRRELL's book. There are many other things we would gladly have said about it; but we can only refer here for a moment to the final essay, which was published first in the new liberal Italian monthly, Il Rinnovamento, on "From Heaven, or of Men?" in which his plea for the truer ideal of the Catholic Church is powerfully enforced. "For us," he says, "once freed from our imaginative representation of an external God, who works upon humanity from outside; for us who recognise that the Divine Spirit is to be sought in the human spirit, where alone it speaks to us and reveals itself, the question as to whether authority (civil or religious) is from Heaven or of men assumes a new complexion, and needs a new formulation." It must at once be clear from such religious principles as are here avowed—and surely there is in them fundamental spiritual truth—that there is in the world and the Church an authority higher than the Pope and the ruling hierarchy of which he is the head. "It cannot be denied," says Father TYRRELL, "that in the life of that formless Church which underlies the hierarchic organisation, God's Spirit exercises a silent but sovereign criticism; that His resistlessly effectual judgment is made known, not in the precise language of definition and decree, but in the slow manifestation of practical results; in the survival of what has proved itself life-giving; in the decay and oblivion of all whose value was but relative and temporary." Father TYRRELL and those who hold with him to their old allegiance within the Roman Church, believe that it may still be brought to embody in the world the high ideal which possesses their own noble and lofty souls. What we feel is that they are expressing universal religious truth, which kindles our souls also. If the Roman Church can be so renovated, as they dream it may, we shall indeed rejoice; but assuredly the Spirit of God is now moving in many ways, and through many of the churches of this world, for the perfecting of that greater Catholic Church in which already, in faith and love, all who believe in the freedom of the spirit and the grace Divine may have a part.

THE essence of prayer is reverent and trustful seeking, the earnest desire, the upward look, and the confiding will.—Samuel Longfellow.

We must search out, set free, restore to honour the true life, assign things to their proper places, and remember that the centre of human progress is moral growth. What is a good lamp? It is not the most elaborate, the finest wrought, that of the most precious metal. A good lamp is a lamp that gives good light. And so also we are men and citizens, not by reason of the number of our goods and the pleasures we procure for ourselves, not through our intellectual and artistic culture, nor because of the honours and independence we enjoy, but by virtue of the strength of our moral fibre. And this is not a truth of to-day, but a truth of all times.—Charles Wagner.

THE CHURCH FOR TO-DAY.*

BY THE REV. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

Ye can discern the face of the sky, but can ye not discern the signs of the times?—MATT. xvi. 3.

ONE of the signs of the times evident to everyone who considers it, is the very rapid decay in this country of all sectarian zeal and the sectarian motive in the building of churches. A generation or two ago this sectarian motive was everywhere present, and had only to be appealed to to bring results. When a few people gathered together with ideas different from their neighbours, what more natural for them than to build a church, to call it by some denominational name, and then to invoke denominational loyalty in its support? To-day there is everywhere another idea of the function of a religious institution. It is coming to be seen that it stands for the things which men have in common, rather than for the things which are peculiar to certain individuals. There is a revival of the ideal of catholicity, of unity; and everywhere there is a tendency for nearly related religious denominations to come together in some kind of unity.

In speaking to-day of the work which is before us in this nation, before us as Unitarians, the national aspect of it, I do not wish to invoke the spirit of sectarianism or denominationalism, but I do want to point out the crisis in American life, religiously, and the need of some body of people ready immediately to meet that crisis. It is not a purely intellectual difficulty, not something which concerns the diffusion of ideas which we may value and which seem to us important. If we are interested merely in the diffusion of religious ideas, it is a question whether the church itself, in any of its forms, is the best means for such diffusion—that is to say, the meeting with certain ideas the want of individuals merely as individuals. The printing press does that in very large measure to-day. It goes everywhere, meets people in their thoughtful moments. They may read the book, the newspaper and the magazine and come in contact very directly with the precious thought of to-day.

What we are interested in to-day is something very different from that. We are interested in religion not merely as an individual privilege or attainment but in religion as a great social force, religion speaking to men together and showing them what they can do together. We are interested in having here in America some institution which shall stand distinctly for the ideal life, for the things of the spirit, for the dreams and the hopes of humanity. Just as we are building up other great institutions of civilisation, so we would have the soul of our modern civilisation adequately represented at the present time. And the question is, Is the soul of our modern civilisation adequately represented? Have we here in America an American ideal of manhood and of womanhood around which all may rally, and through which the best things of the present day may be transmitted to our children? It is that question which comes to us as we look beyond the limits of our parish, to the nation of which we are a part. And it does not follow because there is a great deal of freedom, of intelligence, of idealism in America, all these good things are to be adequately organised without our effort and without our planning.

In a recent article upon the ideals of modern Germany, the writer, who knows his Germany and his America as well, tells of the way in which the German Empire is full of ideal aspiration peculiarly national; the ideal of social justice stirring the hearts of great numbers of men; the ideal of the infinite, with all its thought of religion; the ideal of truth gripping multitudes of earnest men and making them devoted to the further exploration of truth. The ideals of poets and artists, of citizens are mentioned. And then the writer says the strange thing about it all is that in all this spiritual ferment the church of Germany is counted out. It exists, it grows in its fashion, it has its steady constituency, but it has nothing to do with all these things which are most characteristic of the best life and the finest enthusiasm of modern Germany; that is to say, the church is not representative of the religion of Germany.

Now, I think, while at first we say, "What a contrast to our land," for it is a contrast in a great measure, that no one can look at what is going on, no one can discern the signs of our time without feeling that there is a very great danger of the same thing happening here in America which has happened in Germany. So far as large classes are concerned, that has already happened here in America—a divorce between the highest idealism, which is but another name for the deeply religious motive, the lover of the perfect, and the ordinary organisation of religion. That is to say, if you are travelling about our country and want to find out what are the best things being done, the finest enthusiasms cherished, the greatest hopes, the tenderest loves, the deepest faiths, you do not take it for granted that that last and best word that thrills the hearts of men as a living truth, is spoken in the church; that the truth lover, eager to speak his utmost word, must go out from his father's house, he knows not whither. That divorce of the eager idealism of a land from the institutions of religion is the real danger that threatens our land. That is the thing which brings anxious thought to those who to-day are looking at the signs of the times.

And then one asks, Who is to blame for this divorce if it comes? And I think the frank answer must be, The church itself, in its organised capacity, must bear the blame. I think you will say that there never was a time when what we call the "lay" thought of a nation was more serious, more spiritually minded, more truly idealistic than it is to-day in America, just as it is to-day in Germany or wherever men have been touched profoundly by the modern spirit. Here are the materials of religion, the hunger for religion everywhere manifest. That is to say, everywhere people are coming to feel that they cannot live by bread alone, but by something which nurtures the spirit within them. You cannot take up a daily newspaper without seeing that. You cannot take up any representative magazine of our day without seeing that eager desire for social righteousness which is instinct with religion. Why does not the Christian church, with its long history, with its great struggle and achievement, above all with that tradition of the pure religion which Jesus preached against the conventionality of his own time, come to be recognised as the natural home for all these thoughts which rise above the present and lay hold upon a glorious future? Why is not its institution made for this very thing, used everywhere for every good cause? And the answer is one that goes back, not to an indictment against Christianity, but touches upon the weakness of human nature. It is simply this, that everywhere about us the growth has been a growth of freedom. The church has been clinging, desperately it may be, but clinging still to its own past, which was not one of freedom but one of external authority.

The dependence upon authority, upon the word of some other men, is not something that belongs to religion alone in its earlier history, to the church in its earlier organisation. All human society was organised in that way. Everywhere men have been pushed away from it. Everywhere by the method of experiment, of reason, there has been a profound revolution, first in thinking and then in feeling. It has changed within the last few centuries all political institutions. It has changed at a later time the institutions of education—a new education in the place of the old education. It has changed within our own time with amazing rapidity all the institutions of philanthropy, of reform, all the institutions for the punishment of the wrong-doer—all based to-day upon the principle of free inquiry as to present facts.

Wherever you go you meet persons who have been educated in that spirit. Ask them why they do in this way rather than that, and they answer in the most matter-of-fact way, not as their fathers would have answered, by appealing to some ancient authority and quoting his text as final. They tell you this is the result of experience, experience which can be verified every day, their experience and your experience. So every new step has behind it this test: experience of those who are competent.

Now what should we expect in the highest sphere of human thought and aspiration? What should you expect of a church which has become the organ of the spiritual consciousness of that kind of a community? You should expect that it, also, would appeal directly to present facts, would adjust itself to present conditions, would be seeking to interpret the life of its own time in terms of the spirit. What should you expect of a religion that is the natural development of the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth, beginning in his freedom of the spirit? It should face the modern world just as Jesus faced his world and interpreted it in the high ideals of the religious consciousness. What do you find? The church everywhere hampered by its own traditions, everywhere confused in its attempt in some verbal fashion to elate itself to its own past, the greater world sweeping on, and the church instead of guiding it and leading it, anchored fast to some old ideal. We are upon a great pilgrimage. Here are men bewildered, seeking spiritual light, and what they need is not some light behind them, but some light that goes before them, a pillar of fire to guide them through the night. And it is just that which above all things is lacking here in America, the sense of the primacy, the leadership of the spirit, and that is just what men ought to band themselves together to establish here and there throughout our whole land.

An Italian historian has lately given to us a life of the Emperor Julian, whom the churchmen gave the ill-omened name of "apostate." He has given us a picture of that great "apostate" from Christianity who so shocked the church in its earlier field. After the empire had become Christian Julian apostatised, the churchmen said, into heathenism. The historian gives us an account of the man turning his back upon organised Christianity, not because of its austere requirements, but because Christianity no longer represented for him or represented to the world the highest and most uncompromising ideals of morality. Here was a man representative of high ideals, of great purposes and of austere life, and he looked about him for something which should impress itself upon the whole empire of which he was the head, should magnify these great things. The church only a few centuries after its beginning had completely forgotten those ideals which gathered together the little band of fishermen around Jesus. His predecessor, Constantine, with all the grossness and cruelty of his nature, was looked upon as a saint, not because he practised the life of Jesus of Nazareth, but because he upheld the correct metaphysical doctrine of Christianity. And so Julian said, naturally enough, "If this be Christian then I am not a Christian." He sought to revive again the teaching and the life of Marcus Aurelius.

That question is the question which the Christian Church to-day must again confront and it must confront it with absolute frankness if it is to hold its place of moral leadership in our own land. What is the central thing? What is the one thing which we are to seek and to follow? Is it a life, or is it a theory or a form? When we say it is a life, a principle of daily action, then it is not possible for us to give this merely a secondary place, it must be given the supreme, the deciding voice in all action and in our thought. Then it means that every one who seeks such a life is our brother; that everyone who is building up that life is not a destroyer but a helper and a friend. It means the destruction of our personal lives, the reconstruction of society according to the doctrine of love, according to the doctrine of friendship and of justice. The church will have its doctrines, but they will be the doctrines of the spiritual life. The church will have its faith, but it will be the faith not professed of the lips. Again we shall say, "The righteous man lives by a faith," and we shall search out the things that do contribute to the lives of righteous men. Wherever we see one who is thus conspicuously righteous, just, we shall go to that man—whatever he may call himself, Pagan, or Jew or Christian—and ask, "What is the faith that sustains you, that flames forth from your life in some deed of daring rectitude, that sustains you in your time of trouble, puts love into your heart and peace?" We will go to that man and learn of him just as the man of science goes to learn the power he actually sees somewhere in the world. He doesn't know what it is, but he knows that it is there, recognises it, and studies it.

And so the church of which we dream, and for which we seek to lay here in America the first foundations, shall be one that shall treat every phenomenon of the spiritual life with just that kind of seriousness which the lover of any truth treats the facts which come to him. There we shall find the secret of its historical continuity. There are just a few great impulses that move society, that in their measure come to every life, the impulse to live, the hunger for life that is behind all business activity; the desire for social justice which makes our laws and our civilisation; the desire for beauty which is behind all the arts that give joy to life; and then that great human hunger for moral and spiritual perfection which is behind all religions and is common to all men. God does not lay before us at the beginning so that we can see it all that which shall satisfy these hungerings. The hunger is implanted in our own souls and it becomes the spring of all our various endeavours. We believe that this land of ours needs above all things more of this passion for the spiritual life. We believe that there is no real conflict between this passion and the other powers that are moving about us. We do feel, however, that the Christian church needs to be reorganised, needs to be organised according to the present freedom and sound reason, before it can do its great work as the centre of the best things in our American life. So here and there we seek to build up churches, weak though they may be at the moment, which shall be forever open to the new influences which come from the eternal; open to truth, open to humanity, open to the growing soul of man. And it is this desire for this more adequate expression of the actual religion of the present time that is the spring of our real activity.

THE deepest want of man is not a desire for happiness, but a craving for peace; not a wish for the gratification of every desire, but a craving for the repose of acquiescence in the will of God; and it is this which Christianity promises. Christianity does not promise happiness, but it does promise peace.—F. W. Robertson.

CHRISTIANITY does some of its most characteristic work in souls upon which the Lord has poured quietness and whose way into the great world He has barred. They can only do duties which are very near, and often they can only serve by waiting; but their gentleness makes them great, and, having nothing, they possess all things.—Rufus Ellis.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE DOCTRINE OF MORAL FREEDOM.

SIR,—I agree with Mr. Jupp that the universe is a unity; for it seems to me that all that it contains is created and sustained by one self-existent Spirit, who by his immanence and activity in all his creatures relates each to each and all to Himself. But this gives me no ground for assuming that the acts of living beings are "determined by the whole force of the cosmic process." Still less does it compel me to believe that the moral decisions of rational beings are thus determined. All organisms are themselves centres of energy. As the process of biological evolution ascends from the inorganic world to the human being, creatures higher in the scale appear to have a greater range of self-originated activity; and I am inclined to think that Lotze is right in holding that this evolutionary process is probably intended by the Eternal Spirit to culminate in the advent of rational creatures who are not only self-active, but who are capable of freely choosing between co-operating with, and resisting, the expressed will of the God within them. It is evident that the necessary condition for this exercise of moral freedom could not exist till in the course of mental development man became capable of feeling the presence of moral ideals and the claims of the moral imperative. Such rational beings are, of course, related to and acted upon by all the physical and mental forces which surround them, but these relations do not exhaust their reality; they are self-acting spirits; the directive causal power which they exercise springs from the centre of their own being and cannot be adequately explained by any account of the physical and other forces which act upon them.

As moral and religious beings they and the immanent God who reveals Himself within them meet at this centre of their personality; and the all-important fact about them is the nature of that private intimacy between them and the indwelling God. It appears to me to be utterly vain to seek to give an exhaustive explanation by means of physics or psychology of what goes on in the inmost centre of our being where God and man thus hold intercourse with each other. God here reveals Himself not only as immanent, but also as transcendent; and the human personality and the divine personality are, in our ethical and spiritual experiences, distinctly felt to intelligently commune with each other, that communion being sometimes attended by a painful feeling of discordance, and at other times by the ineffable peace and joy of souls who are fully at one with the Father within them.

I believe that experience clearly testifies that at this point where God and man thus directly meet in our moral consciousness the human spirit in a measure transcends the limitations of law, and by a perfectly free act determines in each case of real temptation, its own relation to the indwelling God. This meeting-place of God and the soul is the seat of moral freedom, of real personal responsibility; it is the theatre where characters are fashioned; it is the spring whence arise all inspiration and all divine consolation. It may be disappointing to physical science and to psychology to be told that here is a sphere of real freedom which they cannot fully bring within the scope of those laws which it is their business to formulate; but this disappointment is more than compensated by the fact that it is in this limited but all-important sphere of spiritual freedom that both ethics and religion breathe the breath of life, and so become the most potent influences in the elevation and liberation of mankind. The charge made by Green and some other Hegelians that such freedom is equivalent to "caprice" has, in my opinion, been amply disproved by Martineau, William James, James Ward, and many other eminent students of ethical psychology.

In this attempt to set forth my own position on this great question of moral freedom, I have indirectly indicated my answer to the larger portion of Mr. Jupp's thoughtful and suggestive letter. He admits that we do determine ourselves, but he adds:—"Must we not ask what determined us—what in all the great past and all the surrounding present made us the persons that we are, so that, acting according to our real character, as thus far developed, we make one choice and not another?"

Now, this is precisely the question which Spinoza asked himself, and he answered it in the way in which Mr. Jupp appears to have answered it. He thought that all the influences of the past and the present have entirely made us the persons that we are; have given us each a particular character, and that according to our character at the moment of decision we do and must determine ourselves. I have stated my reasons for dissenting from this account of the matter. No unsophisticated person ever asks himself what determined him to determine himself in a particular moral crisis; he is conscious that he himself was the original author of his self-determination. The growth of character is the outcome of a multitude of acts of free self-determination; and it is because of this that we feel ourselves to be in a measure responsible for the formation of our characters. But if you deny the reality of these free choices, and make the whole of our moral history the necessary product of past and present cosmic conditions, then assuredly you can reach one, and only one, conclusion, and that is the conclusion which Spinoza reached, viz., that all our moral decisions are determined for us, and that what we call free will or moral freedom is a wholly baseless illusion. We think we are free because we are not conscious of all the influences that determine our decisions. If we knew all the facts, says Spinoza, we should see that our character is wholly determined for us by God or the universe; and hence, he asserts that all such sentiments as repentance and remorse are wholly irrational and unjustifiable.

Such is the moral doctrine which Spinoza draws from Mr. Jupp's assumption that all our moral decisions "are determined by the whole force of the cosmic process." Mr. Jupp's religious nature revolts from Spinoza's conclusion, and he personally escapes from it by saying that in spite of his cosmical theory he feels that "he must act as a being free to choose between several possible courses of action." Surely not only Spinoza, but nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand intelligent persons would reply to Mr. Jupp: "If the cosmical philosophy which you profess to hold is true, this 'feeling' of yours, which you confess you cannot reconcile with your theory, must be regarded as a pure illusion—a mere survival of some outworn superstitious idea."

It is one thing when, as in the case of thinkers like Martineau, the "feeling of freedom" and the philosophy corroborate each other, and quite a different thing when, as in the case of Mr. Jupp, the "feeling" and the philosophy appear to be irreconcilably at variance.

Much as Mr. Jupp may deprecate it, I cannot but think that the great majority of those who are convinced by him that "our moral decisions are determined by the whole force of the cosmic process," will draw from this the necessary logical inference, and this inference will land them, not in free-will theism, but either in necessarian pantheism, or else in complete agnosticism. I feel assured that, in the case of mankind in general, it is psychologically impossible to believe at one and the same time that all our noble or ignoble actions are the necessary resultants of all the cosmical forces, and also that we were free in the performance of them, and are to be held morally responsible for that performance.

From Mr. Jupp's case and from the somewhat similar case of Mr. R. J. Campbell, the believer in the freedom of the will may, perhaps, not unfairly, draw the encouraging moral that in deeply religious natures neither Spencerianism nor Hegelianism, nor any demand for logical consistency avails to quench belief in the great libertarian principle that in all the moral crises of life there is open to the soul a free choice between two equally possible alternatives. CHARLES B. UPTON.

THE DISSOCIATION OF PERSONALITY.

THE title of this article is that given by the author, Dr. Morton Prince, an American doctor of recognised position, to a strange, painful, and at the same time fascinating book, describing a remarkable case of mental pathology. It ended in the restoration of the patient to complete bodily and mental health, but only after passing through a long course of bewildering experiences of a most extraordinary character.

Readers of Myers' "Human Personality" are familiar with the general facts, but in Dr. Prince's book they are given with a fulness, and precision, and dramatic detail which adds immensely to their interest. It is not only a scientific treatise and a study of an obscure problem in psychology, but also a pathetic and exciting story.

The patient, who is called Miss Beauchamp—though that is not her real name, which, for obvious reasons, is concealed—was a young lady who came to Dr. Prince in April, 1898, suffering from "neurasthenia of a pronounced type," severe headaches, and general debility, that incapacitated her from pursuing the studies to which she was enthusiastically devoted.

Nothing gave her any relief except hypnotism, which was resorted to when all other means of treatment had failed, and produced a marked, but only temporary, improvement. Unhappily, though the ultimate issue was successful, this led to a complicated Dissociation of Personality, as it is called. She assumed or became an entirely different character. Instead of being refined, intelligent, and even morbidly scrupulous, with saintly submission and unselfish resignation, she became childishly tricky and irresponsible, and also childishly winning in her ways. And in this condition she was not only free from her bodily ailments, which were thus shown to have been hysterical rather than physical, but incapable of feeling pain or weariness.

In this state she declared that she was not Miss Beauchamp, whom she insisted in speaking of as "her," and called "that chump," being now addicted to slang and cigarette smoking, which Miss Beauchamp detested, and gave herself another name, "Sally." She had a strong contempt and even animosity for her other self, and delighted in annoying her with practical jokes—such as putting spiders, of which she was extravagantly afraid, where she knew she would find them. As "Sally" she had lost her knowledge of French and other acquirements; but, on the other hand, she was clearly aware of many things of which as Miss Beauchamp she had at most but a sub-conscious knowledge. She described, e.g., with glee how Miss Beauchamp had in absence of mind torn up a bundle of banknotes for several dollars, and enjoyed the thought of her discomfiture when she discovered the loss.

Sally knew all that passed in Miss Beauchamp's mind; but Miss Beauchamp knew nothing of what she said or did as Sally, except from the effects.

After a short time the case was complicated by another change, called by Dr. Prince another "personality." The mental and moral differences in all three cases were so great, and so consistently maintained, that it was difficult to avoid thinking of them as if they were different people. They appeared to have separate and antagonistic wills, as well as different thoughts and memories and characters. In the last condition Miss Beauchamp was strong-willed, self-assertive, and haughtily reserved. And these characteristics were naturally intensified by the fact that she had no memory of her former life, and found herself, she knew not how, among strangers who treated her as a friend or intimate.

Between the first and the third state there was no community of memory. Miss Beauchamp's life in the one state was a blank to her in the other. But in the second state, as "Sally," she knew the actions, words, and thoughts of the first, and the acts and words, though not the thoughts, of the third. Or if this apparent mutual ignorance was some sort of hysterical assumption, it was consistently maintained for several years.

It was a strange "Comedy of Errors." It seemed as if there were three different persons, of widely differing character, with a strong aversion and contempt for each other, possessing alternately the same body; only that one of them was too amiable for any feeling of ill-will, and was only pained and shocked by the doings of the others. Dr. Prince speaks of them as distinct personalities, and felt towards them as if they were separate persons. Though he says in one place, "They were, after all, the same being, inhabiting the same body—though no amount of argument could persuade 'Sally' to admit the fact."

The results were such as may be imagined, and in Dr. Prince's book they become a drama—sometimes farcical, sometimes pathetic, and at last threatening to reach a tragical termination.

The various personalities, or impersonations, were so real that he felt towards them with affection, pity, or respect, as if they were separately existing individuals.

They wrote letters to each other, often abusive or contemptuous. They interfered with each other's plans, one tearing up the manuscript written by another, and annoying each other in various ways. They replaced each other in the command of the body, often quite suddenly, and several times in the course of a day. The transition would take place in the midst of a conversation, and Miss Beauchamp in the altered condition would have to continue it in entire ignorance of what had been said before. In all the conditions she was anxious to conceal her distressing peculiarity, and showed remarkable ingenuity in doing so. With this object she would write notes of her doings in one condition for her guidance in another, and sometimes got hints through automatic actions as to the answer she should give to unintelligible questions. She succeeded so well that none of her friends, though noticing something strange and unaccountable in her behaviour, ever suspected the real state of the case.

The appearance of distinct individualities was greatly increased by the antagonism of will between the different conditions, ending in a severe and prolonged struggle for predominance between the second and the third, in the course of which the first was nearly suppressed. In this strange contest the poor body, which was the common battlefield, suffered so severely as to bring imminent danger of insanity or death. And yet through all the secret was jealously guarded.

But before things reached this pass Dr. Prince had made a momentous discovery. The Miss Beauchamp who had come to him for medical treatment was not herself. She had suffered from morbid nervous conditions from childhood, and a mental shock six years previously had produced a serious change in her character; putting her into the neurasthenic, ailing, over-sensitive condition of body and mind in which she first presented herself to him. The momentous discovery was that the real Miss Beauchamp was not either of the alternating conditions. She was a sort of compound of the first and third, without the moroseness and extreme self-assertion of the one or the depression and exaggerated meekness and scrupulosity of the other.

The problem was to re-unite these two sides of her nature. They both objected to being merged in the other; and "Sally" also objected to the consequent elimination. But, in spite of all difficulties, Dr. Prince at last succeeded, chiefly through hypnotic suggestion, in effecting the re-union; but not till the antagonism of the fractions was reduced by the sufferings that had resulted from the contest among themselves.

Finally, Miss Beauchamp was restored to her normal self. She became again a healthy, intelligent, refined, and cultivated young lady. And this condition has persisted since June, 1905. There is something admirable in the common-sense with which she regards her own case. She remembers her thoughts and actions in the first and third conditions, and Dr. Prince says, "She has told me frankly about herself and her points of view in both conditions. These different states seem to her very largely differences of mood." She regrets some of her doings, saying, "After all, it is myself," but without any exaggeration of feeling.

That "difference of mood" gives us a clue to a partial explanation of this strange case. She might naturally have in her first morbid or hysterical condition an underlying consciousness of its unreality, bodily feelings of pain and feebleness without any bodily disease; for they disappeared immediately under suggestion and in her alternating conditions. And the bewildering changes might be a distorted effect of the protest of her real nature against her morbid condition, throwing her into an opposite or complementary state as a relief.

Her ignorance in one condition of her doings in another is paralleled by common hypnotic experience, and there are indications that it was not so complete as it appeared.

So far as the first and third states are concerned, this gives us the outline of an explanation. There is no need to think of there having been two separate minds in one body. It is sufficient to suppose that she passed alternately into strongly contrasted conditions of character, disposition, and memory. Yet it remains a very strange psychological phenomenon, which is in great measure unaccountable, though there have been other instances with which it may be compared.

But the second condition, "Sally," introduces further elements of difficulty. There are strong indications that the character, the chain of memories, and the will indicated by that name existed simultaneously with the other states of consciousness; that there was really another mind co-existing with the alternating states of consciousness. On one occasion, for instance, Miss Beauchamp was delirious with fever. And then "Sally" came—a sane though rather childish intelligence. She talked rationally about the delirium of her other self, and co-operated in the nursing, by coming at regular intervals to take the necessary nourishment and medicine.

Dr. Morton Prince and other good judges are convinced this secondary intelligence had an at least partially separate existence along with the primary, as a distinct and coherent consciousness and will. I am not able to accept such a tremendous assumption—one brain serving as the physical basis of two minds. But there are certainly peculiarities which distinguish this state from the others. The memories belonging to it were not taken into the consciousness of the restored Miss Beauchamp. It had many resemblances, in character and in the extent and limitations of its knowledge, to that part of the mental life out of the focus of consciousness, which is called, by a different metaphor, the Subliminal Self, and which is manifested in the phenomena of automatism. The words and acts of a neurasthenic hysterical patient are a treacherous foundation on which to erect such a structure of theory.

The "Dissociation of Personality" is a convenient technical expression for indicating a certain class of cases. But it suggests the theory that personality is only a combination of elements of consciousness without any noumenal or real self. It might be employed with some advantage in that sense; but the metaphysical conception of a real unitary Self cannot be extruded from our thought. And the attempt to do so appears in this case to lead to the setting up of more than one personality in one body, theoretically only being distinguishable chains of consciousness, but in actual feeling regarded as almost separate beings.

This makes it worth while to give an account of Miss Beauchamp's case in terms of change of condition rather than personality. It is of great interest, and difficult to explain. Probably nothing like a complete explanation of it can be given. Insanity is a good word, but it does not help much. Explanations are offered basing the strange transitions upon brain changes, some of its constituent elements ceasing to function, and being replaced by others. But as a mere general statement, without any definite account of what the nature of these brain changes might be, this amounts to little or nothing. The most philosophical suggestion is, after all, that of Miss Beauchamp herself—that it was "largely differences of mood." Something more requires to be said about the condition called "Sally," but any further discussion of it would necessitate detailed references to the evidence beyond what is here permissible. C. D. THE VAN MISSION.

It has been sought to make the weekly notes a record at least of all those friends of the Mission who have rendered assistance from the platform. Omissions have been brought to our notice, but they were unintentional, and not indicative of any want of gratitude. In addition to the visiting missionaries and the friends who have helped as occasion served there have been three men whose work should be specially mentioned before the summarising of the Van reports is passed on to another hand. Mr. Bertram Talbot, Mr. A. Barnes, and Mr. C. Barker have been the lay missionaries in charge of Vans Nos. 3, 1, and 4, respectively and with them the work of the Mission has been a labour of love as well as a duty. Their responsibilities have been innumerable. It does not seem an onerous position to bring a Van into a town, drive apparently instinctively to the most suitable site, and when the meeting-time comes move freely among the crowd with a cheery word here, a leaflet there, a reply to the next comer, and anon the soft answer that turneth away the wrath of the indignant. Happy also is the missionary when crowds are clamouring for his literature, and when friendly hands are ready to assist him in the evening's triumph: What a jolly, picnicking sort of life it is as well—the constant change of scene, the pleasant journey through the best bits of England, the halts at noontide by the wayside! And what a glorious thing is sleeping in a van. How many there are, the sisters of the household in the main, who want to know how that is managed, but who search in vain for Mollycroft and downwards for the suggestion of that couch on which the tired missionary enjoys (!) his well-earned rest. But the change is effected behind closed doors. The Van is sitting-room, kitchen, office, and book-room by day; it is a wonderful chamber by night. Only it isn't the waving of a wand that makes the transformation. In the early stages of the work, the effort to build up a bed from a stack of pipes in its way is suggestive of the superhuman; and even in the end it takes the mere man as long to build his bed as it takes her of the accustomed habit to "make" one. And this toil and discomfort is but symbolic of the whole of the other side of the lay missionary's life. There are always plenty of good folk present in the hour of his success, but not many in his seasons of disappointment. And the picnic side of things is largely a matter of the imagination. A noisy cul de sac in the dark places of the city and the town is more frequent than the meadow with the promise of a bird song in the morning: It comes about now and then that you sleep secure amid the silences; there are other nights when the friendly watchman bids you safe bind if you would safe find, "for the place is infested with thieves." And then the sites don't provide themselves. There has been a preliminary survey of the ground before the tour opens, but the matter doesn't end there. The missionary has always to be feeling his way, and worrying himself over the next pitch. A score of difficulties crop up, and he is never quite sure until the end of his visit that he will have a peaceful tenure of his bit of land. He begins to dream of the territorial millennium foreshadowed by the politician, when he finds that because of his "Truth, Liberty, and Religion" he may encounter the domineering of the local autocrat, and, like Joe, have to move on. And he's not quite sure of his reception at the hands of his own people. He never goes away without converting the local Unitarian, who comes to the notion that the Mission is a splendid agency, but he generally has to face the idea that has gone in front of him that vanishing isn't a respectable form of Unitarian propagandism. In his mind's silence he is conscious of a high comradeship in this matter of want of respectability, but the tactful vanner holds his peace, and is content to bide the issue. So in all respects there is "another side"; and it is out of the recognition of the fine way in which our lay missionaries have played their part, that a fellow-worker commends those upon whom so large a share of the work of the Mission depends. It has meant much to have such loyal and earnest men as Messrs. Talbot, Barker, and Barnes in charge of the vans.

The Scotch Van (No. 2) has been worked on somewhat different lines. For one month a lady shared with her husband the duties of the Mission, and Mr. Forrest's experience was in many ways unique. Messrs. Lenny, Russell, Kirkhope and Hall have each spent some time with the Van as lay missionary, and shown that eagerness in the work that justified the feeling of regret that their services must necessarily be of such short duration. One man one van, especially when your man is of worth; and if there are more men than you can use, then provide more vans—when those you have are paid for! Which word, indeed, suggests the only disrespectability that could attach to the Mission—if the body whose message it has carried far and wide should allow it to come home without having paid its way! Perhaps that passing rejoinder may be permitted to a criticism which is still heard where the facts are not known.

The returns for the week are again normal—that is, more than a half better than last year. We are suffering from holidays, and America, and other things. It is more difficult to get helpers at the moment. The vans are splendidly equipped with acetylene lamps, that make a big meeting on a dark night a pleasure. Unfortunately, in the absence of the lay missionary, our two ministerial brethren made the preparations, but, probably through an overdose of carbide, they burst the generator. While the tank was away for repairs, Mr. Winstanley, a good friend from Park-lane (near Wigan) lent a powerful motor lamp, and the eclipse was thus largely averted. One evening meeting had to be abandoned owing to the necessity of a long day's journey to overtake the programme, the Van passing by reluctantly a number of towns which were in the original scheme. The motive in this instance was to enable the Van to undertake definitely promised work in South-East Lancashire, and No. 4 Van accordingly was transferred to Ashton-in-Makerfield, where, last year, Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Crewe, was heckled night after night by a lay evangelist of the Established Church. After the Van left, this gentleman had the field to himself, and began to undo the effects of the four nights' Unitarian teaching. "What the Unitarians have left in Ashton," was the title on his first hand-bill. Meetings were held for weeks, and Mr. Short made one reply. But for a year the evangelist fulminated against the infidel, and up to this moment a correspondence is in progress in the local papers, conducted on the one side by Mr. C—, who has since last year been ordained and is now in charge of a local church. Curiously enough, however, now that Mr. Short has appeared in Ashton there to expound more fully his tenets, the champion of orthodoxy comes not forward, even though Mr. Short may again be setting forth doctrines which ought not to be left in Ashton. There have been splendid meetings at Ashton, and the little chapel at Park-lane has been filled as well.

The gross attendances for 21 meetings reach 7,305, an average of 350, and the total for the season has so far passed 95,000. No 1 Van finished at Sheffield, where Revs. E. S. L. Buckland, of Derby, and Dr. Griffiths, of Manchester, the missionaries, were well supported by Rev. W. J. Cook of Attercliffe, and his people. This week Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Leigh, is at Masbro, and next week Dr. Griffiths will be at Mexbro. No. 2 Van was at Port Glasgow, Kilmalcolm and Johnstone, Rev. Ottwell Binns, of Scarborough, being missionary; Mr. R. J. Hall, of Oxford, the lay missionary, taking the week-end meetings alone. Sunday's report gave the promise of big meetings later, and this was fulfilled to the tune of 1,000 and 1,200 on succeeding nights. These figures, however, belong to next week's return. Rev. J. M. Mills, of Bootle, has been with the Van this week, and will be followed by Rev. A. Hall, of Norwich. No. 3 Van has missioned at Deptford and Greenwich. Revs. J. Page Hopps, G. Carter, A. J. Marchant, and T. P. Spedding, with Mr. G. Ward, were at the former place, and Rev. Jesse Hiperson and Mr. Evans at Greenwich. Lowest attendance for the week, 250. Rev. H. McLachlan, of Leeds, is with the Van this week, and help is wanted from Thursday next. No. 4, after leaving Knutsford, went, as already shown, to Ashton-in-Makerfield, and is working West Houghton and Leigh this week with Rev. Geo. Payne, of Knutsford. Next week Rev. Walter Reynolds, of Liverpool.

All communications and subscriptions for the remainder of the tour should be addressed, "Van Mission, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: The Old Meeting Church.—The Rev. Robert Collyer preached here on Sunday morning last. There was a crowded church, and many old friends assembled to hear the voice and see the noble face of the grand old man. The sermon, "Enoch walked with God," will appear in the October Seed Sower.

Blackpool: South Shore.—After a period of some unsettledness and uncertainty, we are glad to report that the affairs of this congregation have been satisfactorily adjusted. As the result of an application to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission all the old liabilities of the congregation have been discharged. To effect this a loan has been obtained for a number of years, within which period the church hopes to be able to pay off its debt of about £700. Some changes have taken place in the trusteeship, and the land and building are now vested in the following, who have accepted appointment as trustees:—Mr. Thomas Harwood, Bolton, and Mr. David Healey, J.P., Heywood (chairman and treasurer respectively of the N. & E. L. Mission); Mr. J. W. Barlow, Bury; Mr. W. Duckworth, Heywood; Mr. John Cunliffe, Blackpool; Miss Pollard, Blackpool; and Mr. J. M. Taylor, Blackpool, who are the continuing trustees. At a meeting of the congregation recently held these changes were ratified, a vote of thanks was passed to the retiring trustees, and the hope was expressed that the church would speedily regain its prosperity. The building is conveniently situated in the Lytham-road, near the South Shore Station, and the services, which are conducted largely by members of the congregation, with occasional ministerial assistance, are bright and hearty. The many friends of the church will be glad to learn that its members are looking forward with confident anticipation to the future.

West Bromwich: Lodge-road Church.—The congregational outing to Warwick and Leamington was greatly enjoyed by all who attended, splendid weather succeeding a rather threatening start. The annual meeting of the gymnasium was held in the Lodge-road school on Wednesday last, the Rev. F. A. Homer being in the chair. The accounts of the society are in a flourishing condition, and the members are looking forward with enthusiasm to the coming season.

To live in love is to live an everlasting youth. Whoever enters old age by this royal road will find the last of life to be the very best of life. Instead of finding himself descending the hills of life, he will find it uphill all the way, into clearer air. There the vision reaches further; here the sunsets are more golden and the twilight lasts longer.—Mary A. Livermore.

We possess as a portion of our being a law higher than appetite, nobler and more enduring than all the laws of matter, the Law of Duty. We discern, we approve the Right, the Good, the Just, the Holy, and by this sense of rectitude are laid under obligations which no power of the outward universe can dissolve. We have within us a higher force than all the forces of material nature, a power of will which can adhere to duty and to God in opposition to all the might of the elements and all the malignity of earth or hell. We have thoughts, ideas, which do not come from matter, the Ideas of the Infinite, the Everlasting, the Immutable, the Perfect. Living amidst the frail, the limited, the changing, we rise to the thought of Unbounded, Eternal, Almighty Goodness. Nor is this all. While matter obeys mechanical and irresistible laws, and is bound by an unrelaxing necessity to the same fixed, unvarying movements, we feel ourselves to be free. We have power over ourselves, over thought and desire, power to conform ourselves to a law written on our hearts, and power to resist this law. Man must never be confounded with the material, mechanical world around him. He is a spirit. He has capacities, thoughts, impulses, which assimilate him to God. His reason is a ray of the Infinite Reason; his conscience an oracle of the Divinity, publishing the everlasting law of Rectitude. Therefore God is his Father. Therefore he is bound to his Maker by a spiritual bond. This we must feel, or we know nothing of the parental relation of God to the human race.—Channing.

A READABLE WEEKLY.

"'PUBLIC OPINION' was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read," said Dr. W. R. Nicoll in the "British Weekly."

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

"PUBLIC OPINION" is eminently a readable paper. There is no padding in it. It is a paper which exists to put on record the ideas which men are thinking, and especially the ideas which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress as these are recorded in the world's books, papers, and magazines.

It is a paper specially suited for those who exert public influence—for "PUBLIC OPINION" does not reflect one side of life only—it seeks to cover all sides of thought and opinion.

It is the bare truth to say that there is no other paper published in Great Britain which every week contains such stimulus to thought, or such a vast amount of real information presented lucidly and in a readable type.

"PUBLIC OPINION" is published every Friday, and its price is Twopence. It has been in existence 47 years.

"PUBLIC OPINION" can be obtained from any newsagent or bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d. and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"GREETINGS to 'INQUIRER' readers from readers on 'Ivernia,'" is a wireless message which reached us, via Crookhaven, on September 13th. Our appreciation of the kindly thought will be understood by the senders, although this acknowledgment will be late in reaching them.

We are glad to hear that Dr. Collyer is to preach in London on Sunday morning next, September 22, at Essex Church. The service begins at 11. Notting Hill-gate, the nearest station, is easily reached by Inner Circle, or Central London Tube.

It had been hoped that Dr. Collyer would preach at Highgate on the evening of the same day, but everyone will realise that such an undertaking would be too great a tax upon his strength, so we feel sure there will be a greater muster of London Unitarians at Essex Church to welcome the venerable minister.

A REPORT has been issued by the London County Council's joint Committee on Underfed Children, giving the average number of meals provided weekly for the school children of the metropolis during the last seven years. The children thus assisted numbered nearly 19,000 in 1900-1, and nearly 27,000 last year, when meals were provided in connection with 263 schools.

THE religious event of the week and of the year is the formal union of the three Methodist bodies—the Methodist New Connexion, the Bible Christians, and the United Methodist Free Churches—under the one name, the United Methodist Church. The Methodist New Connexion and the Bible Christians represent very early schisms in the Methodist Church, the former dating back to the end of the eighteenth century, and the latter to the expulsion of William O'Brian from the Society in 1810. The United Methodist Free Churches were formed just fifty years ago, being themselves a union of several small offshoots from the parent church. The two great Methodist bodies which remain outside the Union are the Wesleyan Methodists and the Primitives. The divergencies between the parent church and the united church are at present too considerable to give ground for hope of an early union, but the Primitive Methodists might—had the voices of their ministers alone decided it—have been included in the Union; their laity, however, were reluctant to surrender their privilege of a two to one representation in the councils of the denomination.

THE Rev. Dr. Townsend, in the Methodist Times, gives a sketch of the manner in which the Union has been reached. The original proposal for the opening up of negotiations between the Methodist New Connexion Conference and the United Methodist Free Churches, with a view to organic union, was made by Dr. William Cooke, forty-one years ago. Two years later Rev. Samuel Hulme made a similar proposal for negotiations between the Conference and the Bible Christian Church. Both efforts were fruitless—apparently. But about twenty years later a Union Committee of representatives of the New Connexion and the Free Churches actually got to work, sat for two years, and drafted a scheme. It was not, however, until 1902, that the three uniting bodies appointed a United Committee. The scheme which has now been embodied in an Act of Parliament, and which has been adopted by the first Conference of the United Methodist Church, "represents an immense amount of patient and scrupulous labour extending over five years, during which the Committee has carefully touched and dealt with every side of denominational life and operation." "It was delightful," concludes Dr. Townsend, "to observe how the healing influences of time operated increasingly to make the work of the Union Committee easier as the years went past; prejudices exhausted themselves, opposition subsided, difficulties were removed, even those who were at first impracticable finally resigned the struggle and were quiescent."

THE resolution consummating the Act of Union, whereby the three uniting bodies became the United Methodist Church, was passed at Wesley's Chapel, City-road, on Tuesday, amidst scenes of extraordinary enthusiasm and unanimity. It was most fitting that this historic event should take place on the Wesleyan family hearthstone. The Rev. E. Boaden was elected first President of the United Conference, and the Rev. G. Packer first Secretary, 612 votes being recorded for the former and 604 for the latter, not a single vote being cast, in either case, for any other. The same unanimity prevailed when the resolution making valid the union was put to the great assembly, whilst the Foundation Deed Poll was passed with only a single dissentient; and that was a great and impressive moment when the President declared that the three uniting denominations would be known by their distinctive names no more, but by the common title of the United Methodist Church. The Thanksgiving Fund of 100,000 guineas was started the same day, £22,000 towards the total being subscribed with alacrity.

DR. HORTON's protest last Sunday against the Limerick craze was timely and merited. Very justly he drove the blame home to the right quarter—unscrupulous and money-getting journals, which put sensation before truth, gain before good. Contrasting the journalism which is with that which was, he showed how in many respects the old-time journalism was better. They of the past at least recognised the duty of furnishing their readers with facts. They had recourse to argument, and they made their appeal to human nature's nobler side. These considerations scarcely seem to count with some modern newspapers. Dr. Horton spoke with deep gratitude of that section of the press which had refrained from stooping to such base methods of gain. Referring to the demoralising effects of these lotteries, he said: "Milton received £5 for 'Paradise Lost.' Here we have ten persons each receiving fifty-one times as much, and half a million people having their minds diverted from useful work in order to write nonsense. It is a dream of Bedlam, and argues a country bordering on insanity."

A FABIAN Summer School has been held in Merionethshire, near Llanbedr, the lecturers including Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Sidney Webb. It has been the occasion of much brilliant conversation, free discussion, and good fellowship; and was admirably calculated to bring about a better understanding among people who are all thinking for themselves about the greater social problems, and who, therefore, rarely find themselves in complete agreement. A co-operative holiday in the most beautiful part of Wales, to which a certain piquancy is given by economic lecturing and discussion, may be much more effective for fellowship than many London conferences.

CONGREGATIONAL ministers of the liberal school, emboldened by their leaders, have been giving freer utterance to their opinions, with the inevitable consequence that some have been compelled to resign their charges, and other have found themselves in tight corners. Certain young ministers have suffered acutely, and, to relieve them a Fund for the Defence of the Liberty of Prophesying has been opened. In a suggestive letter to the Christian Commonwealth, the Rev. E. W. Lewis, of Clapham, makes a magnanimous appeal to his brethren and the laity to rally to the support of the fund. He says: "I for one want to subscribe to it an adequate sum every year of all the years that I have anything to subscribe, so long as it is needed." Such a challenge is the best of all indications that the liberal movement amongst Congregationalists is on right lines—lines which recognise that the open mind is a poor thing apart from the open hand.

BUT Mr. Lewis goes further. He wants to see the fund put on a sound and business-like footing. Still more, he wants it to embrace a much broader and bolder scheme. He says: "At the present moment our movement, so far as its propaganda goes, is a question of sermons, books, magazine articles, public meetings, and demonstrations, with a newspaper or two; this is not enough for permanence; we have got to crystallise into something that has shape and point in it. We want an order of men . . . something like the Preaching Friars . . . they had better be young men; they must consecrate themselves to poverty and celibacy; to both these because in their work they must be absolutely free; they must have nothing to gain, and nothing, save themselves, to lose. No city can be taken by the blast of trumpets, and in this matter of ours there's a battle to fight, and it can only be fought as it must be fought by men who are not encumbered either by stipend or by family ties." Mr. Lewis is confident that the world is ready for a reaction in the direction of romance.

THE Committee of the Friends' Russian Famine Fund, 1907, has reported that £20,000 passed through its hands, including £1,100 subscribed by readers of Punch in response to its appeal for the Russian children. The committee believes that all monies remitted to Russia have been honestly and wisely administered.

WITH the strike in Belfast still unsettled and all its sinister incidents fresh in our minds, we cannot but regard with the gravest anxiety the present crisis in the relations between the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants and the railway companies. The dispute has arisen out of the refusal of the latter to recognise the former. It is surely now too late in the history of the labour movement for this country to be plunged into all the troubles of an industrial war at the beginning of the winter season, because certain employers refuse to acknowledge the legitimate office of the Trade Union. Mr. R. Bell, M.P., speaking in the St. James's Theatre, Manchester, on Sunday night, described the history of the present dispute, which began in January, 1906, with the refusal of the employers to permit deputations to them to be accompanied by the trade union officials. The refusal was repeated three months later. There followed mass meetings throughout the country, and a conference of delegates last November, which decided to postpone decisive action, in the hope of accommodation. Further advances were again met by the companies with refusal to negotiate. Finally, towards the end of August, Mr. Bell asked for a conference between the executive committee of the Amalgamated Society, representing 100,000 workers, and representatives of the railway companies, in order that they might come to an understanding as to what is involved in the recognition of the Society. He repudiated all desire to interfere with the management of the companies or with the discipline of the men. The executive had also decided to take the opinion of the members of the Society, as to whether they wished to withdraw their service from the companies at a given time in protest against their attitude. The original demands of the men, as given in the Daily News, were for a standard eight hours day for skilled and ten hours day for unskilled workers, with extra pay for overtime and Sunday labour. But the dispute is still the old quarrel over the recognition of the right of combination. It is a matter upon which sooner or later an agreement must be arrived at, and the sooner it is settled the better for the commonwealth.

EXHIBITIONS of "sweated" industries have attracted considerable attention in London and the provinces, and have quickened the efforts of those who seek a remedy. Another exhibition of the kind has been arranged to be held from September 21 to October 7, at the Bishopsgate Institute, Bishopsgate-street Without, this time with the very desirable addition of demonstrations of spinning, weaving, cabinet making, printing, book-binding, metal work, embroidery, &c., under satisfactory conditions, and some of the best work done in the country will be on view. It will thus be a combined exhibition of sweated work and of the arts and crafts as they should be. It is always more helpful to show how to do a thing well than merely to show how not to do it.

JOHN RUSKIN'S ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL TEACHING.

II.—POLITICAL ECONOMY.

IT is difficult to discover how far Ruskin made serious efforts to understand and appreciate the political economists of his day. Mr. Collingwood says, with reference to his lectures on the "Political Economy of Art," delivered in 1857 (now entitled "A Joy for Ever"): "He had been studying political economy closely for some time back." But the only direct evidence he gives for this statement is a letter written to Carlyle in 1855, in which Ruskin speaks of "reading up" this and many other subjects for his "Modern Painters," and adds: "My studies of political economy have induced me to think that nobody knows anything about that; and I am at present engaged in an investigation, on independent principles, of the nature of money, rent and taxes, in an abstract form, which sometimes keeps me awake all night. My studies of German metaphysics have also induced me to think that the Germans don't know anything about them." Make what allowance you will for hyperbole, this is a significant passage. But it hardly prepares us for the following words in the preface to those very lectures of 1857: "I have never read any author on political economy except Adam Smith, twenty years ago. Whenever I have taken up any modern book upon this subject I have usually found it encumbered with inquiries into accidental or minor commercial results" and so on. The first of these statements seems an extraordinary confession for a man who, two years previously, had pronounced the private opinion that "nobody knows anything about" political economy, and about two years hence was to make bitter attacks upon economists. But it is not consistent with the second, for Ruskin implies that in "taking up" books on political economy he had also read at least sufficient to justify an unfavourable estimate.* Indeed, I am afraid we get no clear light from such passages. Probably they are little more than first utterances of that dislike which blazed out into anger and contempt in later books, and no amount of reading would have much altered the course of his thought. For it was chiefly a matter of temperament and cast of mind. Even Mr. Hobson admits that Ruskin was "never fair to scientific men or to their methods" (ch. x. § 14).

The best way to explain Ruskin's quarrel with the ordinary political economy is to describe his own. This shall be done as far as possible in his own words. In "Unto this Last" we read: "The real science of political economy, which has yet to be distinguished from the bastard science, as medicine from witchcraft, and astronomy from astrology, is that which teaches nations to desire and labour for the things that lead to life; and which teaches them to scorn and destroy the things that lead to destruction." And again, its object is the distribution "not of everything to every man, but of the right thing to the right man" (pp. 119, 123). In "Munera Pulveris," the most systematic of his economic writings, Ruskin says: "The object of political economy is the continuance not only of life, but of healthy and happy life"; it is "the multiplication of human life at the highest standard" (§§ 5, 7). "The essential work of the political economist is to determine what are in reality useful or life-giving things, and by what degrees and kinds of labour they are attainable and distributable" (§ 11). And as examples of the wide application he would give to these principles, we may take the following passages: "We have to consider the economical and educational value, positive and negative, of literature; the means of producing and educating good authors, and the means and advisability of rendering good books generally accessible and directing the reader's choice to them." "The value of works of art is of the same nature as that of books; but the laws of their production and possible modes of distribution are very different, and require separate examination" (§§ 19, 20). Does Mr. Hobson go beyond the mark when he says: "His full, final conception of political economy, as a science of human welfare, includes within its scope not merely the processes by which men gain a livelihood, but all human efforts and satisfactions" (ch. iii. § 11)? Logically, the words I have placed in italics are justified by Ruskin's language, and, in any case, they indicate well enough the idea behind his contention that the ordinary political economy was petty and base.

* Strange to say, this estimate is not consistent with the allusions to political economists in the lectures. There is no criticism of them there; on the contrary, he twice speaks of them as maintainers of one central point of his own teaching, namely, the responsibility of consumers, especially the rich, in determining the kind of work to be done by producers (§§ 48, 143).

Now, what would be the consequences of thus enlarging the scope of political economy? Clearly, this single subject would swallow up every other. It would appropriate to itself every branch of human knowledge and every department of instruction and action. It would make itself responsible for the spiritual bread of life as well as for the material. It would prescribe the beliefs and organisation of churches as well as the true principles of diet, agriculture, manufacture, commerce, and government. It is not surprising that Ruskin never got on with that "exhaustive treatise" on political economy which, he tells us, he at one time resolved to make "the central work of his life." To exhaust his political economy would have meant to gather up the conclusions of every science and of all branches of philosophy. His most obstinate hindrance was not ill-health or pre-occupation, but a vague consciousness of the infinite magnitude of his half-conceived plan. Unfortunately, this plan confused rather than clarified what he did write upon the subject. Probably no man of his time wrote more that was ostensibly devoted to political economy; but he constantly tantalised his readers by rambling. In "Time and Tide" and "Fors," especially, he displayed a strong reluctance to come to grips with real economic problems, and among the most genuine utterances of personal feeling were those in which he speaks of even his St. George's scheme as if it were a Frankenstein: "I would give anything to be quit of the whole business" ("Fors," Letter 61).

But a more serious, though less pathetic, consequence of Ruskin's idea of political economy was this, that it caused him to insist upon misleading definitions of the principal terms of the science, such as "wealth" and "value."

Take, for example, the famous definition of wealth in "Unto this Last": "There is no wealth but life. Life, including all its powers of love, of joy, and of admiration." What is the fault of this? The fault lies in its exclusiveness. There is, of course, a great truth in it, namely, the vanity of wealth, which does not promote life. But who denies this? Which of the economists whom Ruskin denounced denied it? It is the most familiar theme of moralists, and Adam Smith and J. S. Mill were both earnest moralists. In the succeeding sentences Ruskin clothes it with the eloquence of an inspired preacher, and these sentences are noble. But when he defines wealth exclusively as life, and admits no other meaning to the word, he flies in the face of usage and fact, and makes all scientific study of wealth impossible. He would not have done so but for his impetuous controversy with those who, for certain limited purposes, accepted a limited definition. He could not keep to his own definition, for he constantly, throughout his writings, uses the word wealth in its ordinary meaning.

That Ruskin was, for scientific purposes, on a false track, becomes still more evident when we consider his use of the word "value." But first let us notice that he himself regarded this as the keyword of the questions at issue between himself and the economists. The charge which he repeatedly brings is of the most extraordinary nature. Thus in the preface to "Munera Pulveris" he writes: "The modern political economists have been, without exception, incapable of apprehending the nature of intrinsic value at all." Again, in "Fors," we read: "You will find that the essence of the mis-teaching of your day, concerning wealth of any kind, is in this denial of intrinsic value. What anything is worth, or not worth, it cannot tell you: all that it can tell is the exchange value" (Letter 12). "My friends, the follies of modern Liberalism, many and great though they be, are practically summed in this denial or neglect of the quality and intrinsic value of things" (Letter 14). Now, what can be the meaning of all this? Of course, Ruskin saw many people about him who did not value things at their proper worth. In particular, he was moved by the lack of due appreciation of works of art and of the beauties of nature. And he would observe also that, even when people failed to appreciate things for their intrinsic qualities, they would be quick enough to note their money value in the market. It was natural that his sensitive and ardent mind should grieve or be indignant at this, and that he should be stirred to bring men to a keener realisation of the glory of the world and the nobleness of the best human achievement. In so far as he devoted his splendid powers to this end we owe him the profoundest gratitude. But why those sweeping accusations against the economists? Were they the most dull-headed and sordid of men? And were they responsible for the defects of others? Was every rustic for whom a primrose by the river's brim was a yellow primrose and nothing more, a product of their teaching? Did they mould the mind of every Miss Kilmansegg? It was quite untrue that all the economists failed to apprehend intrinsic value. Not one of them did so. They only said, We cannot measure it, and therefore we cannot formulate any general laws concerning it. With reference to intrinsic value or "value in use" they would have accepted Ruskin's statement that "the sum of wealth held by the nation, instead of being constant or calculable, varies hourly, nay, momentarily, with the number and character of its holders" ("Munera Pulveris," § 39). But they would have added: "The exchange value of wealth is not so inconstant, and even when inconstant it is measurable. Let us investigate the causes upon which this kind of value depends." This is the principle which prescribed the limits to their political economy—limits by which Ruskin refused to be bound.

Yet he had to face the necessity of measuring the value of things in some way. For we have continually to decide how much of one commodity is to be exchanged for a given quantity of another. How did Ruskin propose to solve this problem? Absolute equity in this matter, says he in "Unto this Last" (p. 82), "can only consist in giving time for time, strength for strength, and skill for skill." Mr. Hobson speaks of this principle as of "doubtful validity." But he might use stronger terms. It is easy to measure time against time; but equal times of different kinds of labour, balanced against one another, would not produce equity. Then how redress the balance by measurement of strength and skill? It is impossible.

We see, then, that Ruskin's attempt to improve the fundamental definitions of political economy are failures, and that he seriously misunderstood the economists whom he so bitterly criticises. Naturally, he falls into great errors in many other parts of economic science. But I desire to close this article in another tone than that of criticism, for Ruskin's very faults were at least partly due to his great qualities—his large ideas, his earnest sympathy, and his passionate enthusiasm. "Life" was his favourite word and idea; he wanted a philosophy of life, complete in its framework and full in its detail; and if he went, here and there, far wide of the mark, it was because he did not (as he warns us against doing) "prefer the perfectness of the lower nature to the imperfection of the higher." Therefore, let us "not set the meaner thing, in its narrow accomplishment, above the nobler thing in its mighty progress; nor esteem smooth minuteness above shattered majesty."

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

PERHAPS it would be rash to expect anything of first-rate importance in the autumn announcements. Great books usually come unheralded into the world. There are, however, a number of new claimants upon the hospitality of the library, and some of them will certainly deserve an ungrudging welcome. In the present issue we may confine ourselves to the books which deal directly with religion, or in the general scope of their interest touch the humanities on the religious side.

* * *

Messrs. Macmillan announce two further volumes from the papers of Lord Acton, "The History of Freedom and Other Essays," and "Historical Essays and Studies." The title and table of contents of the first volume arouse keen expectation. It will give us all that we can ever expect to have of his projected magnum opus on Liberty. The second volume consists, apparently, of occasional writings rescued from the reviews.

* * *

The same publishers announce another volume of more than ordinary interest in the "Letters of Martin Luther," translated by Margaret Anderson Currie. These letters are of considerable importance, and in this—the first English version—they have been arranged so as to form an autobiography. Melancthon, Erasmus, and Albrecht Dürer were among his correspondents.

* * *

Dr. Illingworth will publish, also with Messrs. Macmillan, a volume on the "Doctrine of the Trinity." "There are signs," he says in the preface, "that the doctrine of the Trinity is again likely to become the battleground that it has so often been before in Christian history—the battleground on which the contention for the faith will have, for the time, to be carried on." If we are to tread the well-worn ground again we cannot do it with a better guide than Dr. Illingworth. He is our ablest contemporary writer on the side of orthodox apologetic. The keen thought and spiritual insight of his books on Personality, Divine Immanence, and the Christian Character have made all Christians his debtors.

* * *

We are glad to welcome the promise of another book, to be called "Christus Futurus," by the anonymous author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia." He describes it as "only a series of successive efforts to think what the Gospel of Jesus really is. Each line of thought is unfinished, and there is much in what is said that, in a mature work, would be more carefully guarded from misconstruction. These fragments are only published in the hope that those who have greater opportunity may find in them something to refine and complete." Evidently this original writer wishes still to preserve his strict incognito.

Messrs. Williams & Norgate have a number of theological books in hand, original and translated. Mr. Campbell's New Theology sermons, which is announced to be ready on September 17, will appeal to a wide popular audience, though there are many signs that public excitement over the new heresy has rather spent its force. Two interesting volumes will be added to the Crown Theological Library. "The Sayings of Jesus," a translation of Harnack's "Die Sprüche und Reden Jesu" will be a companion volume to "Luke the Physician." "The Apologetic of the New Testament," by the Rev. E. F. Scott, who published a book on the Fourth Gospel lately, is an attempt to set forth the different apologetic motives underlying the various writings of the New Testament.

* * *

A volume of special interest to many readers of THE INQUIRER will be a selection of addresses and lectures by the late Herbert Rix. They are described as "the outcome of a large and liberal culture and of free and profound thought, the fruitage of a mind richly stored with knowledge, but never burdened or obsessed with it. They offer some of the finer results of long and careful brooding over the problems of religion, and philosophy, and social life."

* * *

The brilliant Oxford scholar Kirsopp Lake, now Professor of New Testament Exegesis at Leiden, has a volume ready which Messrs. Williams & Norgate will publish this month, entitled, "The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ." It is explained that the book is an investigation into history, and is concerned not with the spiritual evidence of religious experience, but with the testimony of early Christian literature.

The indefatigable maker of dictionaries, Dr. James Hastings, announces a new "Dictionary of the Bible," complete in one volume. For the busy man, who wants a book for easy reference, this will be a great boon, especially as it will be in no wise a compression of the five-volume dictionary. All the articles will be signed, and they have been written specially. In view of the very inferior quality of the smaller books of reference on the market this is a very welcome announcement. Messrs. T. & T. Clark will be the publishers. In form it will be a large volume of about 900 pages, and the price will be 20s. net.

CHILDREN'S FLOWER FUND.

MANY of our readers will be glad, we feel sure, to see the following report of the "Flower Fund" for the years 1905 and 1906:—

The number of schools or departments of schools supplied with flowers during the year 1905 was 70, and the number of boxes sent was 556; during 1906 the corresponding figures were 76 and 695, showing an increase of 6 schools and 139 boxes. It is satisfactory to note that the falling off in numbers, which was mentioned in the last report, is thus shown to have been only temporary, and that the improvement is more than maintained during the current year.

The following extracts from letters received from head teachers of London Elementary Schools will give a better idea than any words of ours of the work which the Fund is doing, and of the pleasure given by the flowers to the London school children,

"I am hoping earnestly that you will be able to add this school to the list of schools already on your bounty for flowers. It is a 'special difficulty' school. The children are wretchedly poor and dirty, and are always really grateful for a few flowers. I should be very thankful if you could let me have some, it is so difficult to get flowers for 500, and I am sure that flowers have a most humanising influence upon little children."

"If there is a possibility of adding another school to your list, may I ask that ours may be the one? We are situated in —, and I expect that name alone tells you something of the neighbourhood. The children are very fond of flowers, and frequently turn out the paper boxes in the playground, searching for faded flowers that may have been put in. We shall be very grateful if you are able to send us some occasionally."

"I was delighted to have your post card with the promise of flowers from Miss —. And now our rooms are looking so beautiful, for a box of lovely flowers came yesterday. The children are charmed with the violets, primroses, king cups, anemones, and wild cherry. We are able to have two vases in each of the six class rooms. It is indeed kind of the little girl to undertake the work."

"It is a great boon to our girls and boys to have these flowers, and I am sure the children will be better observers of nature on their next visit to the country."

"I feel I must write to tell you how much we value the work of the Children's Flower Fund in this infant's school. I really don't know how we should get on without it! The kind friends at — send us such generous supplies that our work is rendered delightfully interesting. This week we have hawthorn, buttercups, king cups and bluebells. Yesterday afternoon 60 boys of seven years of age had a nice piece of may and a small blackboard each, and they drew so earnestly and carefully each from his own specimen that I said to myself in involuntary gratitude, 'What should we do now without these lovely illustrations?'"

The statement of accounts shows a credit balance of £4 ls. 10d. In spite of this satisfactory state of things, we appeal to our friends for increased financial help for the future. Since the date to which this report refers the work has increased rapidly. Many country schools have joined us as flower-senders, and we have been able to add 26 new London schools to our list. But the additional postage expenses will be somewhat heavy, and we ask all who are interested in the work of the Fund to do their best to help us to obtain fresh subscriptions.

We wish to thank not only those subscribers whose names appear on the list, but also all those who have collected and sent off the boxes of flowers and who have, in many instances, defrayed all the postage expenses.

Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, London, N.W., will be glad to receive subscriptions, and also the names of any who are willing to undertake to send flowers. She will also be pleased to supply information as to the best method of packing the flowers, the times for sending, &c.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE ST. BERNARD DOG.

WHEN I was little there was a picture over our nursery mantelpiece of a poor man lost in the snow on the mountains.

You could see his pale face, with closed eyes, and a bit of his body only; all the rest was buried in deep white snow.

He was nearly dead, but was just being found by some great St. Bernard dogs, which had, perhaps, been looking for him all night. One dog had a little flask of brandy tied to his collar, and he was softly licking the man's hand with his warm tongue. The other dog had a cloak strapped round him, and he was lifting up his head and barking to call his master to the spot. You can imagine how his great deep bark would echo over the silent mountains, and how gladly his master would hurry to the spot as fast as the snow would let him. For he would know that his dogs had found the man who was lost in the snow, and were calling to him to come and help.

It is wonderful how God has put into the hearts of these great noble dogs the power to find and the wish to save those who are lost on the snow mountains.

If we were sinking lower and lower in the snow, all alone in the darkness, and frozen with cold, how thankful we should feel if one of these great warm friendly creatures bounded up to us, and licked our cold hands with his warm tongue, and called for help for us with his strong loud voice. We should know then that we were saved!

Where I am staying now, high up among the snow mountains in Switzerland, there is a grand St. Bernard dog named Prince. Sometimes, when we are having dinner, he comes and stands just outside the open door, and we go to him and give him the scraps off our meat plates. But he is so big he could easily eat a whole leg of mutton, I think!

I know of one St. Bernard dog who felt hungry when he was out walking in Southampton with his mistress, so he just took a leg of mutton from a butcher's shop and ate it up!

His mistress had to pay for the leg of mutton, and she was not pleased.

There are St. Bernard puppies for sale here. There is one big kennel with an open enclosure in front with two big St. Bernard dogs in it and ever so many puppies. Some of them have fluffy coats and some of them have straight coats; and the fluffy ones are thought the best, and cost the most money. One of these costs ten pounds.

They are such dear little things, and they press up against the palings of their prison and seem to beg people to buy them and take them away. When you go without letting them out, they cry and wail after you, and you wish you could buy them all. Many people do buy them and take them away to their homes.

They travel in little wooden boxes shaped like houses; there is a hinge on the top, so that half the roof will open to put the puppy in and take him out again at the end of his journey. They are quite nice little travelling boxes, with the boards of the roof put wide apart to let air in for the doggie to breathe.

One day I saw four puppies all close together in a very little cage looking—oh! so sad, poor little things—and outside stood three of these little wooden travelling houses, and a man was making a fourth, I felt so sorry for the little doggies shut up in the cage. But next time I came by, the cage was empty, and the wooden houses gone, and I was told that all the little doggies had found people to buy them and take them to their homes.

VIOLET SOLLY.

WILLIAM STRODE.

LOVERS of seventeenth century poetry will welcome to their libraries the volume of the works of William Strode, issued by Mr. Bertram Dobell. It is, we think, too much to say, with its editor and publisher, that the book will assure for the author "a permanent place beside Herrick, Carew, Randolph and Waller"; but this may be said—that its best pieces are distinct contributions to the literature of the period, and, as such, are not likely to be further neglected. Its seeming completeness vitiates, for it includes pieces which are quite trivial in most respects, with little compensatory merit in any particular of imaginativeness, expression, or technical skill; we have found them, in spite of their brevity, tedious, and cannot accept the suggestion that repeated reading enhances their interest. This said, lest any penurious verse should prejudice the reader against the general worth of Strode's exercises—a very large part of them are merely occasional pieces—we can recommend the poems as a whole as a valuable addition to the poetry of a period which has been strangely neglected, even by those who find in it some of their favourite reading. Hundreds of persons who affect a penchant for Herbert and Vaughan, for Herrick, and perhaps for Crashaw, unaccountably overlook at least half a dozen other writers who at their best have as good as these to give. The fact gives grace to the few, like Mr. Dobell, who are compelled to exaggerate the virtues of what they present in order to secure reasonable attention. The discovery—it was absolute—of Traherne was a fine feather for the cap of Mr. Dobell; that of Strode is another feather, but less fine, because it is partial and less important; and we trust he will accept this congratulation and criticism, and not exaggerate to himself the literary value of his last "find."

Of William Strode it is sufficient here to say that he was born probably late in the year 1600; was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, from 1617; took his degree in 1621; proceeded to holy orders in 1624; and in 1629 was chosen Public Orator of his University. He was regarded as "a pithy and sententious Preacher, an exquisite Orator, and eminent Poet," and would seem fully to have justified before his contemporaries at Oxford all those descriptions.

Most of the poems in this volume under our review have been printed before; but more significant, on the whole, are those which Mr. Dobell, from his exceptional store of original MSS., has herein printed for the first time. They comprise lyrics, elegies, epistles, and miscellaneous exercises of a religious and humorous nature, to say nothing of pieces of a more descriptive character. Best are the lyrics, although it is true that some of Strode's finest and most highly wrought work is in the elegiac manner, and probably most readers will account the second poem, on the death of Mistress Mary Prideaux, as unmistakably the most complete, for delicacy and intensity, of his achievements:—

"Sleepe pretty one: oh sleepe while I
Sing thee my latest Lullaby:
And may my song be but as shee,
Nere was sweeter Harmonie:
Thou wert all musicke . . .

For thou wert all obedience, and hadst
witt

To doe Heaven's will and not dispute with it."

Such lines catch up the best rhythm of the time, and it is worth while reading far to come upon them. They are more than characteristic, but they suggest both Strode's fine elegiac style and his power over the lyric structure when he cares to affect it. The latter is definitely shown in the first poem of the book, which opens:—

"When Orpheus sweetly did complayne
Upon his lute with heavy strayne
How his Eurydice was slayne,

The trees to heare

Obtain'd an eare,

Here and there are lines which reflect the manner of Herrick:—

"He tell you how the Rose did first grow
redde,

And whence the Lilly whitenesse borrowed:

You blusht, and then the Rose with redde was dight:

The Lillies kisse your hands, and so came white."

Now, this snatch is as good as anything of the kind in Herrick; but there is too little of the same quality to set Strode beside him. Did we appraise poets according to the excellency of their exceptional spurts, many a minor would run a dead heat with the greatest. It may not be: and Strode must remain lagging a good distance behind his contemporary.

We take the liberty of making a complete transcript of one of the shortest pieces, "On Jealousy"; it will serve to indicate much of the manner of the poet's moralisings:—

"There is a thing that nothing is,
A foolish wanton, sober wise;
It hath no wings, no eyes, no eares,
And yet it flies, it sees, it heares;
It lives by losse, it feeds on smart,
It joyes in woe, it liveth not;
Yet evermore this hungry elfe
Doth feed on nothing but itselfe."

The demerit of the piece as verse is obvious—it has not a single decent rhyme, its lines are weak; its merit, like that of many short poems of the metaphysical (falsely so called) school, lies, quite apart from structural considerations, in its directness.

Had we no other evidence of the wit of Strode, we should infer it from our consideration of the pieces which Mr. Dobell has classed as "Humourous Poems." We have been specially struck by one, quite exceptional to the time, a song in the Devonshire dialect. It should find a place in any future anthology of dialect poetry. In the longer poems are many exquisite passages. We make a brief abstract, to represent what is a fair average:—

"Looke how the russet morne exceeds the night,

How sleekest jett yields to the dimonds light,

So farr the glory of the gray-bright eye Out-vyes the black in lovely majesty.

A morning mantl'd with a fleece of gray Laughs from her brow and shewes a spotlesse day."

Mr. Dobell has included in this collection a number of "doubtful pieces." We consider them exceedingly doubtful. For his claim that the poem on "Melancholly," usually attributed to Fletcher, belongs to Strode, he makes out a fair case, but we cannot accept it as conclusive, and tradition is yet a dog that will die hard.

There are few things in the present volume more pleasant than the translation of Strada's "Nightingale." Mr. Dobell has done well in giving us the original in an appendix, and readers will find no little delight in comparing Strode's more literal version with those of Ford and Crashaw. It is a beautiful example of facile transliteration, and we would dispense with much to retain this alone.

The play, "The Floating Island," written for the entertainment and gratulation of Charles I. during his visit to Oxford in 1636, is, quite apart from the conditions it served and its political references, a distinctly able production. Truly, it becomes somewhat tenuous and inconsequential; but the first half of it appeals to us as being unmistakably effective, if not brilliant, in its characterisations. It is almost of the nature of a polished morality play. The verse, with no pretension to the powerful swing of the Elizabethan line, is adequate, and the dialogue is clean—it is dialogue, and not the dichotomy of passages. What better address does one want than this, in which Malevolo speaks?—

"Free Passions,

(So ye must be) we know your grievances. Brother Melancholy, discreet you are, But not expressive; unprefer'd you are Because precise; but say, would you with State

Infold your armes; look sad, and feele content;

Live careful over bags, retire your selfe To solemn grieffe in Temples of delight, Sigh in a Sister's bosom, and complain Of Persecution at a plenteous Feast."

It may be urged against this play that it would not satisfactorily lend itself to acting; but such an objection is really an indictment of our modern taste, and is no criticism of the intrinsic dramatic qualities of the piece. If personifications do not appeal to us as directly as persons, if we cannot grasp virtue without a hero, and villainy without a concrete villain, it is largely because our dramatic sense has been blunted by over-indulgence in present-day melodrama. But it is the paradox of some of the best plays that they are not readily adapted to stage purposes. The older dramas are neglected for two plain reasons: they are dramas, and not comic operas; they are out of touch with a time which is dramatically out of joint.

WILLIAM C. HALL.

LEEDS UNITARIANS AND DR. ROBERT COLLYER.

UNDER the above heading the Yorkshire Post of last Monday gives an interesting and appreciative account of Dr. Collyer's doings in Leeds, which we in part transcribe for the benefit of our readers:—

"Lord Airedale gave a garden party at Gledhow Hall, Leeds, on Saturday afternoon, in honour of the Rev. Dr. R. Collyer, the American preacher-poet, who is now on a visit to Yorkshire. The gathering was attended by members of the Unitarian body in Leeds, his Lordship being chairman of the trustees of Mill Hill Chapel, with which his family have long been connected. Dr. Collyer has a romantic history. Born in Wharfedale over 80 years ago, he served his apprenticeship to a local blacksmith, but as a young man went out to the United States, where he has earned fame as a preacher of great power. He is now on a visit to his relatives at Beeston Hill, Leeds, but in less than a month's time will return to the land of his adoption. Before that, however, the University of Leeds intend to confer upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters, while the authorities of Ilkley have invited him to open the new Free Library in that town.

"Dr. Collyer, who was accompanied by some of his relatives, was a picturesque figure on Saturday afternoon. Wearing a large 'wideawake' hat, and with white flowing locks and fine features, his form was easily recognised in the crowd of fashionable folk who were, with him, the guests of Lord Airedale. The visitors were free to ramble at will through the charming grounds and gardens of Gledhow Hall, and during the afternoon the band of the Leeds Rifles, under Mr. Renton Gardner, played selections of music. Tea was served in a large marquee in the course of the afternoon, Lord Airedale presiding.

"In the course of a short and happy speech Lord Airedale said that some three years ago he called upon Dr. Collyer in New York, and 'as old men,' they naturally drifted out to the subject of ages. Dr. Collyer said, 'But you are not 80 yet, are you?' and he had some difficulty in disabusing his mind of the idea that he was. At any rate, added his Lordship, as years rolled on his own warmth and devotion to the communion in which he had been brought up grew.

"Dr. Collyer, who was received with much enthusiasm, after remarking that this was the eighth time he had visited his Yorkshire friends, paid a well-deserved tribute to the singing at Mill Hill Chapel, adding that, to him, 'it was the best in all the world.' He remembered once a friend pointing out the old meeting-house to him, and saying, 'They are infidels in there.' When he (Dr. Collyer) entered the ranks of local preachers, an old shoemaker who had heard him preach for the first time said to him, 'Dost ta know what Ah think of thy preaching; lad?' He (Dr. Collyer) said he should like to know. 'Well,' came the rejoinder, 'tha will nivver mak' a preacher while tha lives. Th'rt too much given to finding a reason.' Speaking of Lord Airedale, Dr.

Collyer said if ever a man deserved a title his lordship did, and when he returned to America he should tell his friends that he had sat beside Lord Airedale, and talked to him 'just as if he had been nobbut a man.' In the old days at Ilkley, he recalled, there used to be an umbrella maker, who was once asked how much certain repairs would be. 'Well,' he replied, 'if you are a lady it will be 6d.; but if you are nobbut a woman it will be 3d.' 'She paid 6d.,' he said. Dr. Collyer added with much emotion that he would never forget the honour paid him, and the welcome given him, as long as he lived.

"At Mill Hill Chapel Dr. Collyer preached on Sunday morning, Sept. 15, to a congregation of over 800, filling all the sitting and standing room in the chapel. In the course of the service, which was partly taken by the Rev. C. Hargrove, one of Dr. Collyer's own hymns, 'Unto Thy temple, Lord, we come,' was sung. Dr. Collyer's address, which lasted over half an hour, was forceful and eloquent, and at times illuminated with a fine humour. His point was to show that we ought to make the best use of this life: in other words, he mused 'over the life that now is and that which is to come.' The touch of dismay with which men regarded the passing into the great beyond was natural. All the persons of supreme power and purpose had, however, been most abundantly loyal to what he described as 'the life that now is.' By people who, like himself, had had a long lease of life, death should not be thought of as a bane, but as a blessing, and not to die would be a bane. He believed in the solidarity of life here and hereafter."

A CONGREGATIONAL MINISTER'S ORDINATION.

FROM the Carmarthen Weekly Reporter of September 6 we take the following passage of a report of the ordination of Mr. Eric Davies, lately a student at Carmarthen College, as minister of the Laugharne Congregational Church.

On Tuesday morning, September 3, an address was given by Professor D. E. Jones, M.A., and there was a Welsh sermon by the Rev. W. Thomas, of Llanboidy. The ordination meeting was held in the afternoon, in the course of which the usual questions were then put by the Rev. W. Thomas. The following are the questions with the young minister's answers to them:—

What led you to think of being a preacher?

I was brought up under a Christian roof, and under the training of Christian parents. When young, not more than five years of age, I began to respond to the charm of the Gospel. From that time I determined to know what the Gospel was, and to become a preacher of it. As I grew up I came to realise that to know and do the will of God and rejoice in it is the high water mark of human life in the expression thereof. I also came to realise that men round about me, including myself, were wayward and not doing the will of God, which Will, in the expression thereof, means a life lived in terms of love, righteousness and joy, as far as man is concerned. I bethought myself—led, I believe, by God—that the best way in which I could express

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM HUGHES OF WIDCOMBE, ISLE OF WIGHT.

As the last sheaves of corn were brought home from the fields which he had farmed for so many years at Widcombe, in the Isle of Wight, William Hughes passed to his rest at the patriarchal age of 97. The veteran of Unitarianism in the island, Mr. Hughes came of a noteworthy ancestry who formed an uninterrupted line of ministers from the Act of Uniformity onwards. They were a South Wales family living on their own land at Llanelly, and are deserving of respectful record for their labours in the cause of truth and righteousness. Mr. Hughes's great-grandfather was a fellow of one of the colleges in Oxford, and in the reign of Queen Anne seceded from the Church. He was subsequently engaged along with his cousin Stephen in the translation of the Bible into Welsh. He was one of many Owens, the eldest sons in the family being always named "Owen," the second "David." This Owen Hughes had, with Stephen, been instrumental in promoting the cause of William III. in the Principality; but, being unambitious men, their own names never became prominent in public affairs. Stephen Hughes suffered imprisonment for conscience sake, at no little risk to his life, in Carmarthen gaol. Restrained by the hand of the law from preaching within a chapel, he became popular as an open-air preacher. A tree on the side of the Black Mountain served him as a pulpit, and the young men used to stand round armed to protect their minister from the officers of the Government.

Mr. Hughes's father was one of three brothers, all in the ministry. He came to Newport at the beginning of the last century, married and settled in the neighbourhood, and farmed his own estates of Youngwoods and Widcombe. At one time, when the pulpit of the Unitarian Chapel was vacant, he occupied it for a twelvemonth until a new minister was appointed. But except for this and occasional services he relinquished the pulpit. He was in the habit, however, of making a weekly visit to Portsmouth, summer and winter alike, to address the men in the dockyard, who became warmly attached to him. Like his son, he was a man of great physical strength, being able, it is said, to bend a horse-shoe in his hands.

William Hughes, his son, our late venerable friend, followed in his footsteps, a lover of good books and of the countryside, a sturdy and affectionate character, a strong politician, Tory, and Protectionist, a convinced Unitarian, and, in spite of his deafness, within the circle of his personal friends, a keen controversialist.

After being watched over with unremitting care by his wife and daughters during the latter months of weakness, his life closed peacefully on September 4. He was carried to his grave in the village churchyard at Gatcombe by farm labourers in their white smock-frocks.

I WILL govern my life and my thoughts as if the whole world were to see the one and read the other.—Seneca.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHIES.*

THE American Unitarian Association has recently been very active in the production of delightful little books of biography. We have already noticed more than one of the "True American Types" series, including the abridged edition of Robert Collyer's Life of A. H. Conant, and also, more recently, his "Father Taylor." "Cap'n Chadwick," by his son, the late J. W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, is a most welcome addition to the series. We honour the father, and love the memory of his son all the more for having read this story.

Mr. Seth Beach's volume of "Puritan Biographies" tells of Catharine Maria Sedgwick, Mary Ware, Lydia Maria Child, Dorothea Dix, Margaret Fuller, Mrs. Beecher Stowe, and Louisa M. Alcott, all lives that it is good to know about, and some of them long since well known to us.

President Eliot's little book contains four addresses given by him on various occasions, the first commemorating the two-hundredth anniversary of Benjamin Franklin, the second a birthday address on George Washington, the third on Dr. Channing, not, however, on the commemoration of his birth, as stated in the table of contents, but on the hundredth anniversary of the beginning of his ministry in Boston in 1803; and, finally, an address on the centenary of the birth of Emerson. These four addresses are well worthy of preservation in this pleasant form.

To these books issued by the Association we have added another, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., in Boston, and by Constable in this country, a memorial of the Longfellow centenary. Mr. Charles Eliot Norton writes with intimate knowledge of his friend, and in this sketch pictures with great skill the happy conditions of New England life amid which Longfellow grew up. Of the poet himself, when he had settled down at Cambridge, and was in the full work of his Harvard professorship, Mr. Norton says:—

"No living poet had now so wide a circle of readers, and his readers could not but entertain for him a sentiment more personal and affectionate than that which any other poet awakened. The spirit of humanity, of large hope, of cheerful confidence in good—this spirit into which he was born, and of which his own nature was one of the fairest outcomes—this spirit of the New England of the early nineteenth century—is embodied in his verse."

That is a very worthy tribute, beautifully expressed, and the whole brief sketch will be a most welcome memorial for the many lovers of Longfellow. The book contains two portraits, the first Healy's painting of 1842, the other a well-known photograph of 1879. Mr. Norton's sketch fills forty pages, the poems not quite twice as many, in fine large type.

the will of God would be by going to men to tell them what the will of God is, and moreover how to express that will. In other words, I decided to become a preacher of the Gospel, with the result that I stand here before you. Should you want to be told in a sentence why I decided to become a preacher I answer—Because I love God and my fellow men.

Why are you a Christian?

I am a Christian because I regard the Christian ideal of life as the most complete human expression of the Will of God. To me the Christian life means a life lived in terms of love and righteousness, and filial trust in relation to the Being who rules the universe, called by Jesus Christ the Father. Be it understood here that I do not confound Christianity with orthodoxy. Christianity, in my opinion, is a life, not a creed. I shall never labour to make men orthodox as that term is commonly understood. But it shall be the labour of my life to make men Christ-like in life.

To me the central truth of Christianity is the Fatherhood of God, which truth implies the essential sonship of all men of all hues, of all shapes, of all ages, and of all states and stations of life.

I believe Jesus Christ came to call the world to the Father's feet where He found His rest. I am determined to do likewise in the name of Jesus, in the name of all the great and illustrious souls who found the same rest, and in the name and at the command of my own short religious experience.

Why are you a Congregationalist?

I am a Congregationalist in the first place, because I was brought up with the Congregationalists. And because I have never thought it worth while to change my denomination. I am a Congregationalist in the second place because the denomination has no fixed creed to which its preachers are legally bound to subscribe. Also because there is freedom in matters ritualistic. I am a Congregationalist in the third place because the denomination recognises the continuation of Divine inspiration and allows prophecy—speaking in the name of the everworking, ever-revealing God. In other words, because there is room in the denomination's pulpit for the expression of as many experiences and as many theologies as there are of prophets and theologians. Because the denomination demands not the expression of a stereotyped creed, but of its preacher's souls. I take this advantage to say, as I said to this Church when it did me the honour of giving me a call to become its pastor, that I shall insist on the right to think my own thoughts, and to say them as long as I am here. Should the Church become tired of me or my preaching I shall expect them to ask me to resign so that I can respectfully do so, that we may peacefully avoid any possible unpleasantness. Though I am a Congregationalist I do not promise to labour one bit to make the men I shall meet Congregationalists. I shall devote my life towards the enriching of human life in general, to make men in the deepest sense of the term, to make them true to the deepest, the best, the Christ within them. I shall leave it with them to choose their own denomination.

The answers, says the report, made a very favourable impression on the meeting.

THE BOSTON INTERNATIONAL.

On the eve of the International Congress of Religious Liberals in Boston, Mass., the fourth gathering of the "International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers," we had hoped to have a full programme to lay before our readers, that they might have followed from day to day the proceedings of the large number of their friends who will be gathered at Boston. It appears, however, that the arrangements could not be completed in time for the promised bulletin to reach us by this date, and we must be content with the preliminary sketch of the Congress week, which has been before us for some time. This is quite enough to show how abundant is the hospitality awaiting members in Boston, and how full of interest and stimulus the coming week will be.

On Sunday morning many of the ministers from across the Atlantic are to preach in Boston pulpits, or in the immediate vicinity; there will be an afternoon organ recital in the First Church, and then in the evening the opening meeting of welcome to the Congress will be held in Symphony Hall. Monday morning and afternoon (September 23) is devoted to the meetings of the American National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, with an opening address by the President, the Hon. CARROLL D. WRIGHT, the report of the Council by the Chairman, the Rev. PAUL R. FROTHINGHAM, and addresses by President ELIOT and the Rev. GEORGE A. GORDON, of the Old South Congregational Church; and in the afternoon further addresses, the last being by the Rev. MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., of the Universalist Church, Minneapolis, on "A United Liberal Church."

On Monday evening a reception will be held in the Hotel Somerset to members of the International Congress.

Tuesday morning and afternoon will be devoted to regular meetings of the Congress, the address of the President, Dr. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, being given in the morning, and in the evening the Rev. JOHN HUNTER, D.D., of Trinity Church, Glasgow, is to preach the Congress sermon in Arlington-street Church. On Wednesday morning a further session of the Congress will be held in Tremont Temple, and in the afternoon the Governor of Massachusetts will hold a reception at the State House. In the evening there will be sessions in the Old South and the Second Churches. Thursday is Cambridge Day, with a morning session in Saunders Theatre, the afternoon being devoted to seeing Cambridge and Harvard University, while in the evening there is a banquet in the Hotel Somerset. Friday is to be devoted to an excursion to Plymouth, and on Saturday there is to be another excursion to Fairhaven and New Bedford, while there is also rumour of an after-meeting of the Congress at Chicago in the following week, which a few, at least, of the foreign delegates may be able to attend. During the International week in Boston there will be morning prayer each day in King's Chapel.

This programme differs in one or two points from that given in the second bulletin of the Congress, which was issued with THE INQUIRER of June 1, and other changes may have been made since our last information was received; but it gives a very fair idea of this week's proceedings, and we must wait for the report which will soon be making its way across the Atlantic, before we can know how things actually went. Next week we hope to begin the publication of some of the papers read at the Congress, and meanwhile, that friends in this country may be in touch during the actual time of meeting with some of the chief of our American brethren who will be active there, and have, indeed, long been active in preparing for the Congress, we have gathered together in this number of THE INQUIRER some recent characteristic utterances of theirs.

The President, the Rev. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, D.D., who is a son of President ELIOT, of Harvard, and himself President of the American Unitarian Association, will be very pleasantly remembered by those of our friends who attended the second International meeting in Amsterdam, while the Rev. CHARLES W. WENDTE, the enthusiastic and indefatigable hon. secretary, has been at all the meetings—at the formation of the International Council in Boston, on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, in 1900, then in London, 1901, Amsterdam, 1903, and Geneva, 1905. Dr. CROTHERS, also, is very far from a stranger to our people. It is always delightful to meet him, and we are glad to be reminded by him of what PHILLIPS BROOKS was to Boston. We may be sure that, if he had been still living, the Congress would have had his warm sympathy. If PHILLIPS

BROOKS has a successor in the religious life of Boston, it is, perhaps, no other than the Rev. GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D., of the New Old South Congregational Church, and we rejoice unfeignedly that the Congress has enjoyed his active co-operation. When the reports come in, it will be seen how inclusive and truly catholic has been the spirit of this great gathering. Meanwhile, we are glad to have this little conference of liberal minds on our own account.

THE EDUCATION OF RELIGIOUS PERSONALITY.*

BY THE REV. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, D.D.,
PRESIDENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

THE point I want to make in this address is that religious truth requires the medium of personality. I can learn of the facts of history or economics or biology from books, from verbal or written communications; but religious influence is the contact of life with life, of spirit with spirit. Like the potential force of the sunlight that is in all the air around us and which waits for the burning lens to gather the rays and kindle a flame, so religious truth lies helpless until some personal enthusiasm comes to concentrate it and transmit it as power upon life.

Said Philip Brooks, whose inspiring personality made me determine to be a minister of religion, and whose characteristic message I am repeating: "We often hear the cry, 'Principles, not men.' But to send out principles without men is to send an army of ghosts abroad, who would make all virtue and manliness as shadowy as themselves. It is principle brought to bear through the medium of manhood that draws and inspires." Let us realise that spiritual vitality is not a matter of spontaneous combustion. It is kindled by a spark from the burning heart of another. Feeling acts on feeling and mind on mind. Courage passes from strong to weak. Enthusiasm springs from eye to eye. We cannot explain just how these influences work. We cannot locate the wires of this invisible telegraphy, but of the fact of such communication and transmission there is not the slightest doubt. All the victorious religious faiths have had a personal origin. Christianity is not a matter of ecclesiastical politics or stately rituals or dogmatic creeds, it is just the self-perpetuating power of an example. Christianity is not a system of doctrines, it is the testimony of a life.

Let us not mistake religious machinery for religious power. The mere existence of sacred institutions, rites, and observances does not constitute religion. "Behold the appearance of wheels!" cried the prophet. But let us never forget that the source of power is "the spirit of the living creature that is in the wheels." Organisation waits on inspiration. God's way to men is through men. Let us lay down our tracks of progress, let us wisely devise the mechanism through which our thought and hope may speed; but let us remember that the usefulness of our institutions finally depends upon the amount of personal intelligence and devotion, pluck and patience, that goes into their operations.

I observe that the efficiency of a religious teacher cannot be safely predicted because of his scholarship or academic training or piety alone. These things are good; but, after all, the charm of body or mind or spirit that counts, the self-forgetting ardour that touches the heart, the ideals that inspire, are matters of individual temperament. The effective teacher, whether secular or religious, is not only a man who has that in him which will do people good if they take it from him: he is such a man that they can and will take it from him. The true prophet is he who, standing between the truth and the needs of men, transmits each to each, through the refining fire of his own personality.

Needless to say that the education of this mysterious quality of personality proceeds along very subtle lines. To analyse it is like trying to trace the edge of a wreath of mist, or like trying to separate tint from tint in the sunset sky. I can but hint at certain general methods of development which can be tested only in individual experience.

Religious personality demands first of all a conviction of reality. The effective religious teacher must deal with the things that are unseen and eternal as with matters of real experience. He must establish close communication with the permanent sources of power. He cannot be simply a looker-on at divine manifestations, watching them pass in parade before him. He must be himself in the marching line, obedient to the divine command. He needs the Psalmist's confidence in the immediate and omnipresent God. "If I ascend into heaven, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say surely the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me."

The peril of the religious teacher is that he shall get entangled in the machinery of religion; that he shall turn aside from the way of the personal and direct approach of the individual soul to its creator, and get lost in the mazes of theological controversies, ecclesiastical forms, or conventional observances. It happens that I live in a university town and in constant contact with alert, open-minded young men. What demand do such earnest young Americans make upon a minister of religion? It makes no difference to them what badge or title a minister wears or what communion he represents. What they want is that he shall ring true. They demand clear sincerity of thought and speech, an unobscured vision of truth, a virile leadership in the ways of duty and public serviceableness. What they want is to be set face to face with the truth that can be verified in experience, a truth that works in every-day life. The first dynamic of religious personality is the sense of divine reality.

Second, religious personality requires the historic sense. It must be one law which the effective religious teacher discerns, binding the past with the present in the unfolding of an infinite design. It will not do to mistake restlessness for progress, or revolution for reform, or the removal of our neighbour's landmarks for the enlargement of our own territory. The man who reaches for something before must hold securely to something behind. He must use, in creating a better future, the mighty impulse of the toiling generations behind him. Amid diversities of gift and operation the man of effective personality must discern the one spirit. Under the noise of debate his ear must detect the music of the universal religious consciousness. He must dare to believe that in the long run the unity of the spirit will bring together men now separated by the pride of dogma and the distractions of dispute. He must realise Theodore Parker's maxim, "Live upon the Past, in the Present, for the Future." Any form of faith that denies its ancestry is not likely to afflict the world with a posterity.

Third, religious personality can be educated only in and through liberty. By no law of constraint can a soul develop vitality. Imitation is simply limitation. Coercion only enfeebles individuality. Dictation produces a religious belief which is merely a quotation. Apologetics no longer convince. Freedom has its obvious perils; but the world has set up certain standards of intellectual sincerity which imply a spirit of fearless investigation, a spirit expectant, unfettered, and tireless. Unless religious teachers rise to that standard and practise that freedom of thought and speech, they cannot command or retain the respect of their fellow-citizens. They must use that liberty which is their birthright as the sons of God.

The sense of reality, the consciousness of unity and continuity, the use of liberty—I name these as the general principles upon which must proceed the development of the religious personality which is the only complete proof of spiritual verities. The one thing that makes men believe in religion is the sight and knowledge of a human life manifestly sustained of God.

I pass now to a brief consideration of some of the more specific ways by which we can forge and temper this weapon of personality by which the moral battles of our day are to be fought. The first thing to say is that personality is developed by action. Spiritual vitality, like physical health, depends largely upon exercise. Not by brooding, not by closet study, not by private argument, but by use are spiritual gifts increased. To win the promised blessing a man must be not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the word. He needs acquaintance with human joys and sorrows and perplexities and pains; he needs to set his untrained capacity for sympathy in the positions where he must speak and act or own himself a coward; he needs to feed his nascent enthusiasm for righteousness until it grows into the persistent passion of service; he needs to pour himself unreservedly into the lives of others. Love grows in only one way—by loving. It increases as it spends itself. The multiplying of the objects of your affection as your children grow around you does not diminish the proportion of your love for each, for your whole power of loving enlarges. There is the significant distinction between material and spiritual gifts. Material good is lost by giving. You give a man your coat, and you have one coat less. But you give a new idea or a new hope, and, while he gains something, you lose nothing. On the contrary, your own thought or hope is strengthened by the giving. By healthy, generous action are spiritual gifts increased.

Next, I mention, as an incentive to effective personality, moderation. That may strike you as a strange stimulant; but is not heat greatest when under restraint? The passion that is under control is the most genuine. I profoundly distrust the sensational religion which relaxes moral fibre and weakens mental vigour. I know that mere sensibility is not a test of vitality. Too often a quick excitability indicates a shallowness of soul. The flower may be beautiful; but it has no root, and soon withers. Sudden enthusiasms are apt to produce equally sudden reactions. Against the danger of extravagance set the better ally, self-control. It will confine the flame of ardour within just limits, and increase its power by concentration.

An effective religious personality needs, next, the sense of proportion. Every minister has opportunity to do twenty times as much as he is able to do well. The important thing is to know which twentieth to do. He must not squander the energies that should be devoted to a few things needful on a variety of things less needful. He must hold force in reserve. He must fortify his soul against needless regrets and profitless foreboding. He must not let the mistakes of one day spoil the work of the next day. His life is inevitably full of certain keen discouragements. The resources are often meagre, and the achievement far below his ambition or desire. He must not fail, however, in what Stevenson called "Our great task of happiness." A religious teacher works under high nervous tension, and he needs to know how to play and to enjoy simple and natural recreation. He must put worry aside and live cheerfully and serenely if he would make his personality the medium of a gospel of cheer.

Again, certain clear and definite convictions are essential to religious personality. An effective religious teacher must be an expert and a specialist in the things that relate to God, to duty, and to the eternal life. Our dependence in these days is too often on a spectacular or secularised religious teaching. Practical preaching is praised and doctrinal preaching decried. I know very well that theology is not religion, and that learning is not the measure of spiritual vitality. I know that theology must have an increasingly broad and inclusive definition. It must include the study of social ethics and civic reform as well as the study of opinions. It must include the literature of devotion, of poetic and artistic expression, as well as the literature of dogmatics. But theology thus broadly defined is the religious teacher's speciality. His office is the maintenance and transmission of inspiring convictions and spiritual life. No mistake could be greater than to suppose that theological proficiency means dull preachers. As one of the honoured officers of this Association has pointed out: "The simple fact is that the great preachers of the Christian Church have been its great theologians. Augustine, Anselm, Bernard, Luther, Calvin, Schleiermacher, Chalmers, Newman, Channing—these men at the same time revived the preaching of the Church and remoulded its theology. The one function did not exclude the other. On the contrary, ample learning permitted simplicity of speech. It is so with every preacher. He may sentimentalise or entertain or discuss as he will; but, unless he has a background of solid knowledge, he will not for any length of time mislead a community into the belief that he has a right to stand before them as the interpreter of the ways of a living God. "Behold," says many a minister, like the fishermen of Galilee, "we have toiled all night and taken nothing." And then the answer comes, "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught."

One other aid to the development of religious personality I must mention. I mean a consecration to the highest embodiment of character of which we have knowledge. After all, the thing that really kindles enthusiasm is enthusiasm, the force that really touches character is high example. Attraction is more potent than command. "Come" wins obedience quicker than "Go." Mere duty often repels, but loving goodness compels. For most of us it is a great admiration, a vision of an embodied ideal, that turns effort into power. When you come into contact with an eager soul, your own soul reflects that eagerness. From one man through many men, to all men, is the natural apostolic succession.

It is then, in loyalty to the spirit of Jesus Christ that most men of the Christian tradition find the highest development of their own efficiency. I know that scholars of equal reverence and learning are not agreed about many problems concerning the nature and work of Jesus. I know that not every soul responds to that impulse. But no intelligent man can help observing that the love of Christ is still the most compelling dynamic of the religious life of multitudes of souls. As you know, I myself believe in the pure humanity of Jesus Christ. That belief, far from diminishing the authority of Jesus, vastly increases it in the experience of many who would be his faithful disciples. It brings more closely to them the summons and inspiration of his heroic life and death. If they follow in his steps, they can become in some real though distant way like him. If they are filled with his spirit, they can live in his peace and work as he worked. The man who really takes to heart the story of the career of Jesus must burn with the desire to make the spirit of his life and teaching more real on earth to-day. If in his easy selfishness he remembers the brotherly love of Jesus, he will be not so much shamed out of his disregard of the rights of his fellow-men as drawn into the privilege of honouring and working for them. If in his idleness and aimlessness he catches something of the inspiration of the dauntless striving of Jesus towards the highest, forthwith his problem will become not to see how little work he can do, and then escape to some pleasant self-indulgence, but how much work he can do for all good causes. If in his despondency and disappointment he catches something of the meaning of that triumphant failure on the cross of Calvary, he will go up to his own martyrdom in confidence and trust. If we but yield ourselves to the attraction of the highest faith and love, we shall find obligation turned into inclination. We shall do our duty, not because we ought to, but because we want to. We shall pass from the control of the outward law of constraint into the control of the inward law of liberty, and find in service our perfect freedom.

Action, moderation, proportion, conviction, consecration—I name these, then, as the instruments by which may be shaped the "Sword of the Spirit" which makes a religious teacher a captain and a prophet. I began with a quotation from Phillips Brooks, and I close with another. In his Baccalaureate Sermon to my Harvard class, he said: "Before we can make people wise or happy, we must make them believe in us. . . . In every age we see cold, hard, unsympathetic wise men standing up aloof, like snowbanks on the hilltops, conscious of the locked-up fertility in them, and all the time wondering why their wisdom does not save the world. The snow must melt on the mountain and come down in the spring torrents before its richness can enrich the valleys." The mere amount of a man's intellectual power or the truth of a man's doctrine is, then, no complete test of his usefulness. The scholar may find truth, but remain so wrapped up in contemplation of it as never to find the people to whom to impart it. The man of warm-hearted temperament may find the men, but have no vision to declare to them. It is the faith that "combines a truth with an affection" that has immortal power. That quality of soul makes a man a mediator. Ever what a man is must stand between what he knows and what he does. To furnish truth for men and men for truth is the noblest office of manhood.

A LIBERAL IN RELIGION.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES W. WENDE, HON. SECRETARY OF THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

WHAT is it to be a liberal in religion?

(1) Certainly a man is not liberal simply because he holds advanced or radical opinions. Whether he is liberal or not will depend on the spirit in which he holds them. If that spirit is narrow, unsympathetic with others' thought, scornful, intolerant, and irreverent, such a man is not a liberal. He is a bigot, no matter how freely he has discarded the traditional creeds or how vehemently he denounces the authority of pope, council, church, or priesthood.

On the other hand, a man who still clings to these, who accepts the old dogmas and cherishes the traditional forms of piety, if he displays a broad and kindly temper towards those who differ from him in opinion, if he is ready to believe others' sincerity, and is charitable towards their views, if, in a word, he is "reverent towards others' reverence," that man is a liberal, no matter how orthodox his creed may be.

Herein lies the justification of the current term, "liberal orthodox." Strictly speaking, according to the correct use of language, to call a person liberal orthodox is as irrational as it would be to speak of him as free bound or rightly wrong. For orthodoxy implies a correct belief, it stands for infallible authority in matters of faith—the authority of church, creed, or scripture. It gives no countenance to any laxity of views, any individual independence of judgment. It permits no tolerance to dissent, no liberality towards heretics. But men's hearts are usually larger than their minds. They are not always logical in their conduct, whatever they may be in their theological opinion. Happily for themselves and the race, many who claim to be orthodox in their theology are truly, however inconsistently, liberal in their sympathies. They may occupy orthodox pulpits, but they are more truly to be reckoned broad-minded and liberal men than are many so-called free thinkers. For it is not the holding of this or that set of opinions, however advanced, but the spirit in which they are held, which marks the true liberal. It is a great misfortune for the cause of free thought in religion that this is not more generally recognised by the advocates of a rational faith. The mistaken notion widely prevails among them that a man is liberal simply because he is opposed to orthodox forms of belief. The man who vehemently denounces the inherited traditional creeds and institutions of Christendom, and ridicules and heaps scorn upon those that uphold them, usually justifies his course on the ground that he is liberal.

And yet, if my contention be true, he is simply a narrow, prejudiced, intolerant fanatic, only—a fanatic for free instead of conventional religion. Both types are equally unlovely and harmful to the cause of true religion. But the radical bigot is more hateful than the orthodox, because the logic of his principles ought to teach him to the contrary, and lead him to employ more sympathetic and gentle methods in religion. Orthodoxy, if consistently carried out, naturally leads to intolerance and persecution. But heterodoxy should prompt to the largest forbearance, charity, and kindness. The worst displays of illiberality to-day are to be found in the free thinkers' conventions and the columns of certain of their newspapers, while not a few professedly orthodox journals are weekly illustrations that men may profess the traditional views and yet display the most broad and reconciling temper.

(2) But now it should be added that, if zeal for advanced views in religion doesn't necessarily constitute a liberal neither does indifference to all religious views. Here we touch upon another mistaken notion current among free thinking people. Such will often tell you that a man's creed is of no importance. It is his conduct by which he must be judged. Indeed, it is almost a cant form of speech for such to say, "It doesn't matter what a man believes, so that his life is right." But this is a mere sophism by which we deceive ourselves. It will not do thus to underrate the importance of intellectual opinions in religion. What a man believes really has a great influence on his character and conduct. If you were about to employ a physician, you would not say that it didn't matter what school of medicine he belonged to, what theories of disease he held, or what he believed the therapeutic effect of his remedies to be. If you were seeking a farmer to take charge of your farm or orchard, you would not think that his opinions about soils and crops and methods of cultivation would make no difference in his conduct of your affairs.

*This article forms the greater part of a tract published by the American Unitarian Association, 25, Beacon-street, Boston, Mass. (No. 227), with the title, "What is it to be a Liberal in Religion?"

Why, then, should you suppose that a man's religious opinions will have no influence on his moral life?

It may not always be easy to trace this influence in the case of individuals. For, as has already been said, individual believers may hold their opinions very loosely and be a great deal broader than their avowed creeds. But even these, if we examine closely into the sources of their conduct, will be found to have certain interior convictions or principles of action which colour and shape their lives, and which are their true creed, whatever they may profess to believe.

On the larger plane of social and national life, however, it will be easy to show that true intellectual beliefs are of vast importance to mankind. The creed of a people largely determines the character of that people. The creed of the Hindoo that this material universe is an illusion, and that life is a vain and undesirable thing, is largely responsible for the nerveless, hopeless, apathetic character of their civilisation.

The Inquisitor in Spain believed, in common with his age, that God hated and punished everlastingly all heretics. This belief profoundly affected the acts of a Torquemada and his priestly colleagues. They thought they did right in torturing and destroying thousands of their fellow-men. Will any one claim, in the lurid light of such testimony, that it makes no difference what a man believes? How can his life be right if the interior convictions and principles of action which guide that life are not right? Our life, in a true sense, is only the expression of our beliefs.

Another illustration: A few summers since, in Switzerland, I observed, as others have observed, the great influence the creed of a people has upon the life of that people. As I passed from the Protestant to the Catholic cantons, I found a vast difference between them. It was not a difference in race or of antecedents or of social conditions or of government. They are the same people, to all appearances. The climate, scenery, material environment, industries, and pursuits are essentially alike. It is their mental attitude towards nature and life which is so wholly unlike, and alters their entire demeanour and outlook, so that they do not seem like the same people. This difference is seen in all the relations of their domestic, industrial, social and political life. Their dress, manners, conversation, and the general aspect of their farms, villages, and towns, display it. It is a difference grounded in diversity of creeds, conceptions of the universe, and of moral and religious duty. Thus Roman Catholic religion produces one type of character and civilisation, and Protestantism another type. The difference between an Englishman and a Frenchman, a German and an Italian, a citizen of Belfast and one of Tipperary, is not so much one of race or environment: it is one of religion.

The opinions we hold on these great questions are; therefore, of profound consequence to our personal and social life. The Scriptures say truly, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

To be liberal, therefore, is not to hold this or that set of opinions. It is not to antagonise other people's opinions. It is not, finally, to have no opinion at all. Liberalism is a temper, an attitude of the mind—a disposition of the heart towards truth. Liberalism is the supremacy of the spirit over the latter in religion. It is the mind in a state of growth, and is thus distinguished from orthodoxy, which is the type of a mind that has stopped growing, which accepts finalities in religion, and claims that its opinions are infallible.

Liberalism recognises that all opinions are more or less fluctuating; but it clings all the more firmly to the interior principles, the great central convictions which determine the character of individuals and people.

What are these principles? One of them is that we may trust the veracity of the human reason; that a divine thought rules the universe, and our human thought is its faithful reflection. Our reason does not, indeed, teach us everything; but, so far as it goes, it is trustworthy, and it goes far enough to give us a right interpretation of nature and an adequate philosophy for the ordering of our lives.

Liberalism furthermore affirms that all thought is free, that to attempt to cram it into dogmatic formulas, and thus arrest its growth, is a crime against nature and an impiety against God. The true liberal recognises that there should be progress in religion as in all else. He keeps his mind open to every influence that will increase his knowledge, enlarge his mind, and improve his character. He seeks to grow as the plant grows, as the tree adds layer to layer, as the whole creation develops the ever-increasing purpose of its Maker. In a word, the liberal thinker is an evolutionist in his philosophy. He believes with the poet,—

"Through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

The true liberal maintains, moreover, that, while belief profoundly affects conduct, yet conduct in turn is the true test of belief; that men's deeds reveal, and justify or condemn their creeds. He holds that thought is good, but life is better, and that he is most likely to lead a noble life who has the clearest vision of truth and is most faithful to his ideals.

Once more, liberalism believes in sincerity in matters of faith. It fearlessly utters its honest convictions. It abhors cowardice, it deprecates mental reserve, it despises hypocrisy. It speaks the truth fearlessly, but it speaks it in love. For love is the universal solvent which melts even the rigidity of dogma and tradition. No mind can be truly free which entertains a hateful, scornful spirit against another mind. The true liberal not only tolerates, but loves his fellow-men. He is charitable to their intellectual errors and sympathetic with their endeavours after truth. He reverences their reverences. He knows how gradual is the change from one set of opinions to another. Therefore, he is not impatient with error, if it be error held in the spirit of truth. The only unpardonable sin in his eyes is uncharity—a loveless heart, an intolerant mind.

This is our answer to the question, "What is it to be a liberal in religion?" These are the liberal things which the liberal deifies, and by which he shall stand. This is the true interior spirit of Christianity. "The hour is come when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." "The spirit of truth shall lead you into all truth." It is the teaching of Paul. "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." "Serve the Lord in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter." Finally, it is the prevailing temper and purpose of our Unitarian Church, which, in the language of the hymn we sing together so often, declares:—

"The seekers of the light are one,"

One in the freedom of the truth,
One in the joy of paths untrod,
One in the soul's perennial youth,
One in the larger thought of God,

The freer step, the fuller breath,
The wide horizon's grander view,
The sense of life that knows no death,
The life that maketh all things new,

THE RADICALISM OF PHILLIPS BROOKS.*

By S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

It is the fate of great men to be misunderstood in proportion as they are admired. Their admirers are not content with enumerating their positive virtues: they proceed to eliminate all those characteristics which seem to them to be inconsistent with their idea of perfection. The result is a colourless picture of commonplace virtue. In idealising the hero, he is conventionalised. We are familiar with this process in the case of Washington. Channing was a conspicuous victim of indiscriminating admiration. His immediate followers evolved a something called "Channing Unitarianism" which has effectually obscured the real Channing from those who do not take the trouble to go back to his own writings.

Only ten years have passed since the death of Phillips Brooks, but we can detect the same process going on with his memory. In the many tributes that have been given there is ample recognition of those virtues which the church has agreed to praise.

*This article appeared originally in the Christian Register of Feb. 5, 1903.

We are told of his undoubted piety, his genial sympathy, his loyalty to his friends, his fervent eloquence, his deep personal faith. It is the ideal of the churchman loyal to his own creed, but tolerant and sympathetic toward all men. All this is true; but is it all the truth? Was Phillips Brooks simply a representative of a very beautiful and tolerant churchmanship, or did he also have in him a possibility of iconoclasm? With all his piety and with all his evangelical temper, did he not have also a vein of transcendental radicalism which allied him with Theodore Parker, and which justified the fear which the conservative members of the church had of his influence?

The position of Phillips Brooks has often been obscured by the absurd claim that because he stood for liberalism he was therefore a Unitarian. The very centre of Brooks's faith lay in the incarnation. He was not interested in the controversy between Unitarians and Trinitarians. The point which I wish to make is that there were times when Phillips Brooks gave forth utterances which would have startled many a Unitarian convention by their radicalism. The principles, if carried to their logical conclusion, would overturn every form of ecclesiasticism that is based on creedal conformity. That Phillips Brooks himself did not push them to their practical conclusion is evident enough. But there his words lie, only awaiting some new reformer within the Church to make them watchwords in a struggle against religious conventionality.

There is a volume which is less known than it should be by the admirers of the great preacher. It is a collection of "Essays and Addresses," and contains an essay on "Orthodoxy," which seems to me one of the most thorough-going bits of "destructive criticism" that one can find in the literature of liberal religion. It exhibits Brooks in the rôle of an iconoclast. The idol which he is attacking is one which has many worshippers in his own church. It is the notion that the Church has in its custody a "deposit" of truth "fixed and limited" to which its members are to conform and by which they are to be judged. He does not discuss this or that orthodox doctrine, but fearlessly examines the fundamental assumption of all orthodoxy. Has the church anything to offer as a substitute for individual truth-seeking? He answers in the negative. Has the Church a right to set up any standards by which the results of individual truth-seeking may be judged? To this fundamental question he answers just as Theodore Parker would answer. Here is his description of orthodoxy. "Orthodoxy is in the Church very much what prejudice is in the single mind. It is the premature concert of certainty. It is the treatment of the imperfect as if it were the perfect." He is careful to explain that orthodoxy has its place. "And yet prejudice is not to be ruthlessly denounced. It is not only to be accepted as inevitable: it, or that for which it stands, is to be acknowledged as indispensable. If prejudice can only be kept open for revision and enlargement, if it can be always aware of its partialness and imperfection, then it becomes simply a point of departure for newer worlds of thought and action."

To one who knows anything of the temper of the ecclesiastical mind there is something delicious in this statement of the function of orthodoxy. Portia's statement of the conditions under which the pound of flesh might be obtained was not more tantalising. "Be as orthodox as you please," he said in effect to his brethren, "only treat your orthodoxy as a prejudice. You will find it an admirable point of departure." He expresses this attitude toward all standards of orthodoxy very frankly and fully. "It all, then, comes to this: that the idea of orthodoxy is a natural idea, and will always present itself and claim men's interest. But it must be compelled to know its very inferior importance, and to keep its very inferior place. It is an arrogant and pushing thing. It is always crowding itself into thrones where it has no right. So long as it simply represents the temporary and local coincidence of opinion, furnishing the general meeting ground of minds which have reached about the same degree of truth," and "so long as it joyfully recognises that there are regions of truth supremely true outside itself, and sees brave and devout spirits going forth into these regions and gives them cordial God-speed," he approves of it. "As soon as it tries to set bounds to renewed thought and speculation, it is bad; and by a noble law of their nature men will feel its badness, and it will lose its power over them."

Is not this but another way of saying that to a real truth-seeker the whole conception of orthodoxy loses interest. So he is willing to admit. "We cannot but believe that in the future the whole conception of orthodoxy is destined to grow less and less prominent. Less and less will men ask of any opinion, 'Is it orthodox?' More and more will they ask, 'Is it true?'" This is his conclusion: "Is not the sum of the whole matter this,—that orthodoxy, as a principle of action or a standard of belief, is obsolete and dead? It is not that the substance of orthodoxy has been altered, but that the very principle of orthodoxy has been essentially disowned. It is not conceivable that any council, however ecumenically constituted, should so pronounce on truth that its decrees should have any weight with thinking men save what might seem legitimately to belong to the character and wisdom of the persons who composed the council. Personal judgment is on the throne, and will remain there,—personal judgment, enlightened by all the wisdom, past and present, which it can summon to its aid, but forming finally its own conclusions, and standing by them in the sight of God, whether it stands in a great company or stands alone." This is the tone of a radical reformer. If this conception of a church in which private judgment is on the throne is realised, all the machinery for producing uniformity becomes worthless. No wonder that many men who believed that the church really had a "deposit" of final truth looked upon the man who was capable of making such utterances as a dangerous person.

He was capable, also, of "destructive criticism" in another direction; and now and then there is a flash of penetrating thought that reveals the weakness of the "new orthodoxy" as well as the old. One of the most characteristic phases of contemporary religion is seen in the effort to put the substance of modern thought into familiar forms of the past, and so to disguise the real change that has taken place. Phillips Brooks points out the futility of the effort: "The great conception of catholicity, which ought to be instinct with the spirit of freedom, is made a power of bondage. Personal search for truth disturbs what seems to be the unity of the Church. Possessed by this idea, much of the speculation of religious writers is always beset by a second consideration. Here is the essential limitation both of the interest and the importance of two much read and much talked of books. The authors of 'Lux Mundi,' and the writers of Progressive Orthodoxy alike are asking not simply what is absolutely true, but what can be reconciled to certain pre-established standards of unity outside of which they cannot go. This makes the unsatisfactoriness of both the books. They have no primary or intrinsic value. They are uninteresting except as considered in relation to the positions of their authors." I have reason to know that the conscience of more than one minister has been disturbed by the essay of Phillips Brooks on the Pulpit and Popular Scepticism. It is a plea for perfect frankness on the part of the minister in the statement of his doubts as well as of his faith. "How many men," he asks, "in the ministry to-day believe in the doctrine of verbal inspiration which our fathers held, and how many of us have frankly told the people that we do not believe it?"

No delineation of the character of Phillips Brooks can be adequate which does not include qualities which are not easily reconciled. I suppose the truth is that they were not really reconciled in him, but existed side by side in a temporary peace. No one can doubt but that he was perfectly sincere in the use which he made of the creeds of his own Church. It is apparent that his personal faith was singularly untouched by many of the destructive influences of the time. He found it easy to conform on points where other men had scruples. By emphasising these qualities and leaving out others, we may make a picture of an almost ideal churchman.

But the other side must be presented also, and emphasised, if the real Phillips Brooks is to be preserved. He was at heart a nonconformist. It was "the nonconformist conscience" which prompted him to say: "We find that the lower orders of the Church's workers, the mere runners of her machinery, have always been strictly and scrupulously orthodox, while all the Church's noblest servants, they who have opened to her new heavens of vision and new domains of work,—Paul, Origen, Tertullian, Dante, Abelard, Luther, Milton, Coleridge, Maurice, Swedenborg, Martineau,—have been persecuted for being what they truly were, unorthodox." He was quite capable of iconoclasm, and is not always respectful of "the timid psalm of the man who is thankful for the refuge of orthodoxy,—Thou hast set my feet in a small room."

Nevertheless, the union was not a permanent one. There are two antagonistic ideas of religion, its basis, its organisation, and its line of progress. One is based on authority—authority testified to by miracles and formulated and preserved by some priestly order. It involves necessarily some standard of orthodoxy. The other is based on the needs and aspirations of the individual. It is nourished in the atmosphere of freedom. It refuses to accept any formal creed. There is bound in time to come a conflict between the two ideals; one must then choose between them. It happened that the conflict did not come to Phillips Brooks in a form as acute as to many men of his generation. But the question which decides his place is, On what principle would he choose? What did he accept as the final authority in religion?

Here it is perfectly plain where he stood. He stood for ultimate Protestantism. He must be reckoned with among the revolutionary forces of our time. After reading again the essay on Orthodoxy, and being once more thrilled by its bold suggestions, I happened to read an article in a Boston newspaper mildly rebuking those who held to the opinion that Phillips Brooks "was almost heterodox." Almost heterodox! I rubbed my eyes, and said, "The myth-making process has begun." When people begin to speak of him as "orthodox" or "heterodox" it indicates that some of his boldest utterances have been forgotten. It is well, at this time, to recall them; for they were not lightly spoken, but give an insight into a side of his nature not fully revealed in his sermons.

COMMON INHERITANCES AND DUTIES OF CONGREGATIONALISTS.

AN ADDRESS BY THE REV. GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D.*

A BRAVE Catholic and a worthy Orangeman met on one occasion to deplore the divisions that exist among Irishmen. Catholics are Irishmen and Orangemen are Irishmen. Why should they not unite? Is there any growing symptom of the coming union of these two divisions of the same people? That was the question. And it was answered in this way. The Catholic proposed that the Orangeman should play on his bagpipe the tune "Boyne Water," and, if the two remained fast friends after that performance, the conclusion was held to be justifiable that the unification of the Irish race was assured.

We are here to-night, as I understand it in the interests of the union of a divided Congregationalism. The most significant fact of all is that we are here; and, if you observe the programme, you will see that we are to pipe and to listen by turns. And if we pipe in absolute freedom, and if we listen in absolute honesty, and at the same time grow in noble friendship, some kind of union is coming to our divided Congregational bodies.

Candour, patience, and sympathy are essential in all great enterprises; they are absolutely indispensable here. If there is, on the Unitarian side, any consciousness corresponding to that of the Orangeman, if there is any tune to be played that represents "Boyne Water," why, then, we, on our side, must listen to it with candour and with patience and with sympathy. And, if there is on our side any consciousness corresponding to that of the Orangeman, if the tune to be played means to our ears the notes of victory, then you must listen with candour, patience, and sympathy. That mood is prophetic of all good things.

The Bible is the preacher's book, and I am in the habit of looking into it when I desire to find a warrant for saying something, and I have been thinking of the story of Nehemiah as a parable of our situation this evening. Nehemiah resolved to rebuild the broken wall round his native city of Jerusalem. What were his motives? Sorrow, the sense of weakness, the unifying power of a great discipline, and a profound love in which were blended patriotism and religion in one absorbing passion. Now, something like that, I am persuaded is at work in the hearts of all genuine Congregationalists to-day. There is a sense of common sorrow. Think what the churches of our order were before the division. All the leading spirits, all the master minds, all the highest intelligence and character of the State and city, were in these churches, and the churches wielded this immense body of intellectual excellence and moral virtue and spiritual power upon the masses of the people. We desire, so far as we may, to restore that ancient renown. We desire, as far as we may, to recover and perpetuate the power of a past that is nothing short of an epic in the religious history of mankind. In the second place, there is the sense of weakness. Early in the thirties of the last century there loomed on the political horizon of this country the fearful spectre of division and disunion, and the great Massachusetts senator, who met and laid that spectre, for the next twenty years of his life preached the great gospel of American nationalism as indispensable to American strength and glory; and, when he laid down his august head in death, his true successor, Abraham Lincoln, said, "A house divided against itself cannot stand." Late in the sixties Bismarck found Germany a collection of petty states full of jealousy, full of envy, rank with the spirit of division, and weak and contemptible in Europe in consequence of that division. He took those weak states, and gathered them up into a mighty unity, and made Germany the power that she has been since that day. All strong things go in the same direction. Our science, our scholarship, and our philanthropy succeed only through association. We are coming to see that all weak things are simply isolated things, and that all strong things are strong in consequence of union with their various kinds. The migrating fishes go in schools, the migrating birds go in flocks. There verdure of the meadow is constituted by the combination into one of the multitudinous spears of living green. The stars at their best gather into constellations and galaxies, and the vast vault of blue is constituted by the communion of infinite points of light. We are coming to see this, that our division, our isolation from one another, is weakness; and we wish, so far as may be, to remove it, and to get the power that comes from union.

We are subject, in the present time, to a great discipline, a common discipline. In the first place, the nation is back of us all, with its history, its traditions, its ideas, its hopes. We are one in that we are all Americans. That has a religious value: it has a denominational value.

Then behind us are the great colleges and universities of the land. Their spirit is largely identical. They seek truth with unbiassed judgment and with a pure heart, and they seek it in order to find it and employ it for the common weal. There is a large sense in which our world is the same. Our science, our art, and our philosophy are largely the same. The same old sea rolls to our door, the same sky is over our heads. We are lighted by the same sun and moon and stars. A world homogeneous in spirit is shaping us all into a rich and noble unity.

Finally, there is the religious need, the profoundest need of all. The most significant thing in our life to-day is the cry among our best people for a profounder religious experience. We are weak and poor and miserable, of little worth to ourselves, and of less to the community because of our superficiality. That is more and more recognised among all our serious people. Stand by your individual thought. Stand by your individual feeling. Stand by your individual purpose, but at the same time open the depths of your moral being to the sovereign presence of God. All lasting unity finds its source there. The space that is below is a divided space. It is divided by streets, by houses, by fences, by rivers, and by seas. The space that is above is undivided, continuous, entire. The earthly mind is the fountain of our division, our strife, our prejudice, our isolation. The heavenly mind is the great mother of union and power.

Horace Bushnell said that Unitarians and Trinitarians must think themselves together before there can be a lasting union between them. That is true, and this process has been going on. There is not a Unitarian to-day who is altogether like the Unitarian of the days gone by. There is not a Trinitarian who is altogether like the Trinitarians of a generation ago. That is not your victory: it is not our victory. It is the work of the Eternal Spirit. Let us add, however, to the unification that comes through ideas, the unification that comes through work, and, higher still, the unification that comes through prayer. Laymen here and there are rising up in their might, and reminding us that the central thing in all religion is a man's speech to God, his dealing with the Infinite, his sense of the return upon his soul of the tide from the Infinite.

I belong to a club which unites men of six different denominations. We carry our knives with us all the time, and have them sharp. Our club is not founded on compromise or compliment. Every man fights for his life; but there is one thing, the most significant in the life of this club. When we are led by some great devout soul in prayer, ending, as we always do, with the Lord's Prayer, we leave all our differences in the court of the Gentiles, and are one in the holy place where we present our souls together to God.

* Dr. Gordon is minister of the New Old South Church in Boston, Mass., the chief representative of Liberal Orthodoxy in the city. The address here reproduced was given four years ago and published in the Christian Register of May 28, 1903. Dr. Gordon has joined the committee that is organising the International Congress at Boston.

Jesus did many things, but, so far as I remember, he never attempted to unite his disciples in dogmatic belief by lecturing them into it. The one instance where his great passion for unity expresses itself is in that sublime prayer, recorded in the seventeenth chapter of the Gospel of John, in which he gathered up all his disciples then living, and in imagination all those who should believe in him to the end of that age, and invoked the spirit of Almighty God to make them one.

Brethren, this is a serious hour for the churches of our order on your side and on ours. They are waiting for some one to speak the word that shall bring them into union, and every man who recognises God as the Author of all concord and all communion, will look to this highest source of power for the fulfilment of the desire that has brought us together this evening.

THE VAN MISSION.

THE notes this week are compiled from very scanty material in the case of Vans Nos. 1 and 2, of which only reports of one meeting from each are to hand. No. 1 Van has been to Rotherham, where the minister of our Church has presided over the meeting. The missionary was the Rev. S. Redfern, of Leigh, Lancs. Mr. Barnes remarks that they had a splendid meeting on the first night, and made a good impression. The maximum attendance was 400, and the minimum 150—very gratifying indeed. Three parts of an hour were spent in dealing with questions arising out of the addresses.

With Mr. R. J. Hall, B.A., as Lay Missioner, and the Rev. J. Morley Mills as Visiting Missioner, No. 2 Van was the centre of a huge gathering in Johnstone, Renfrewshire: No fewer than 1,200 was estimated as having been present as a maximum, which never fell below 700. Both gentlemen gave lengthy addresses, the former on the "Miraculous in Christianity," and the latter on "Forgiveness," the audience questioning them for half an hour afterwards. Mr. Hall's memorandum on his report gives an idea of the interest aroused. He writes, "Several persistent interrupters were in evidence, especially during my address, which was Biblical, and laid me open to the accusation of tearing the Bible to pieces." Mr. Mill's address was earnestly listened to by an audience which continued to increase until the close. There was opposition at the close, one man attempting vainly to raise the hymn "I do believe," while another attempted to address the audience from the van to controvert our positions.

On the last night of our visit to Greenwich, a man circulated among our company handbills bearing the following words:—"Beware of Unitarianism, because it denies the great saving truths of the Bible, the all-atoning power of the precious blood of Christ. 'A word to the wise is enough.' Beware!" Mr. Hugh C. Stannus spoke after Rev. J. Hipperson. Several persons interrupted Mr. Stannus and refused pamphlets, interjecting audibly, "Damnable Heresy," and "Rank Blasphemy." However, the bulk of the company was quite sympathetic and well behaved, as is usually the case. Three days were then spent at Hither Green, with the Rev. J. Hipperson again as missioner. The site was but a poor one. Mr. John Harrison was in the chair on the first night, and the Rev. Geo. Carter also gave an address on two nights. On each occasion a number of our Lewisham congregation were present, and rendered help in many ways, Mr. Humphrey speaking from the platform. A fanatic gave us much trouble on the second night, dancing about in front of the van and loudly denouncing us as false prophets. He met with some support from a small section, but came on the last night and behaved himself. No little interest was displayed, as evidenced by large groups remaining long after the van had removed, a score of men discussing in the best spirit with the Lay Missioner till 11.45. Maximum attendance was 250 on the last evening. The Rev. Herbert McLachlan, M.A., B.D., joined the van at Well Hall, Eltham. Again the site was not a promising one, although the company attracted was of a better class than usual from the intellectual point of view. On both nights the attention was admirable, and the behaviour without reproach. Fifty was the full attendance on the first night, and 96 on the second, but several hundreds stayed for a short time before passing on their way home from work. Mr. McLachlan, desiring to return to Leeds to do honour to Dr. Collyer, Rev. Jenkin Jones, our minister at Plumstead, in whose parish we were, kindly consented to coming over and delivering the addresses on Saturday and Sunday. He met with a good reception, although the company never exceeded 90 on the first night, when he spoke for well over an hour on salvation, no one venturing to question him when invited. On Sunday the meeting had to be on another site near by, owing to the practice of the Baptists holding meetings on the other place. When their meeting was through, the minister arrived at ours, and supported by his flock, quickly made his presence known by interrupting Mr. Jones, controverting his statement that Paul had never seen Jesus. This led to one of those "regrettable incidents" which happen now and then, and which although they increase the number of the company do not make for that friendly tone and disposition which is so desirable. Nearly 200 were present when the ministers crossed swords, never less than 60 present.

The Rev. H. Fisher Short has been missioning at Ashton-in-Makerfield, where he created so good an impression last year. Splendidly attended meetings have been held, the reports show the gross maximum number during the three meetings amounting to 1,250. A hundred Unitarians are said to have been present each night, which speaks well for them, and is a great contrast to those who showed up last year. The local minister, the Rev. J. B. Higham has presided each night, and Mr. Wright again rendered valuable assistance. An unusually large number of books have been sold also. The last meeting is particularly styled "glorious." Questions were put in public each evening, on one occasion an hour and three-quarters being occupied in dealing with them. Reports are to hand of four meetings at West-houghton, the Rev. Geo. A. Payne being the Missioner, Mr. Isaac Barrow, of Brantwood presiding three times, assisting splendidly in other ways. Other speakers have been Mr. Harwood, of Bolton, and Mr. Barker, the Lay Missioner. The maximum attendance is 300, and the combined maximum for the four meetings 875. Regret at the shortness of the visit was expressed, some saying that we have had the best meetings held on the Market Square. A good number of Unitarians have been present also, on one occasion reaching 60.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—Harvest Thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last, when the Rev. P. Holt preached to good congregations. The chapel was tastefully decorated, and special hymns and anthems were sung. The collections were an advance on former years. A well-attended fruit banquet and social was held on Monday evening.

Cardiff.—There was a good attendance, afternoon and evening, at West Grove Unitarian Church, on Monday, Sept. 9, on the occasion of the recognition services of the Rev. F. Blount Mott, the new minister. In the afternoon a sermon was preached by the Rev. John Page Hopps, of London. Tea was afterwards provided in the schoolroom. In the evening Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson presided over a public meeting, at which addresses welcoming the new minister, who comes to Cardiff from Southport, were delivered by the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., and the Rev. John Page Hopps, the latter of whom expressed the view that Unitarians were too exclusive in their work. They had, he urged, a message for the world without, and he spoke strongly in favour of missionary work by the aid of a van. Addresses were also given by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, Mr. John Lewis, Pontypridd, and Mr. Pritchard, Newport, and Mr. J. Parke Davies. Subsequently the Rev. F. Blount Mott returned thanks, and delivered an address.

Carlisle (Appointment).—The Rev. Henry Cross has accepted an invitation to the ministry of the Viaduct Church, and will commence his duties on October 6.

Horsham: Free Christian Church.—On Thursday, Sept. 5, the annual business meeting was held, when the reports and accounts for the year were presented by the officers. A year of good and steady work was chronicled in all directions: Sunday-school, clothing club, museum society, library, sewing circles, winter evening lectures, choir, and gymnasium all had done fairly well, and some excellently. A vote of thanks to all helpers was proposed by Mr. J. B. Price, and carried unanimously. The officers were re-elected. The report refers, among other things, to the renovation of the interior of the church, at a cost of over £50, and the re-lettering of the memorial tablets by different members of the church. Mr. Tarring proposed "That our hearty thanks are due, and are hereby given to our minister and his wife for all the many services they have loved to give, and we to receive, in the year that has gone by; and, 'gratitude being a lively sense of benefits to follow,' that we hope to continue to accept in years to come." This was heartily endorsed by the meeting (an exceptionally large one), the members and friends having gathered in force to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Martin back after their holiday. Tea had been arranged by the sewing circle, and a programme of music preceded the business meeting.

Oldbury.—On the invitation of the Rev. W. G. and Mrs. Topping, about 200 guests assembled at the Free School on Thursday evening. The Sunday-school teachers had laid a new floor to the room, and in the after proceedings it was very much appreciated. After Mr. and Mrs. Topping had received the guests, Miss Laura Yeomans, of Brierley Hill, contributed two songs, Mrs. Topping accompanying on the piano. Several of the young people gave a sketch, "The New Aladdin." Mr. Alfred Burgess (the Meeting House secretary) then presented Mr. and Mrs. Topping, on behalf of the Sunday-school teachers, congregation, and friends, with a water colour, painted by Mrs. Morgan, and handsomely framed, and also a purse of money. Mr. Burgess spoke of the pleasant relations which existed between pastor and congregation, and wished Mr. and Mrs. Topping long life and happiness. Mr. Topping thanked all for the kindly feeling which had prompted the gift, which he should value very much. The picture would remind him in years to come of that very pleasant gathering. Refreshments were then served, and afterwards dancing commenced. Mr. Fred Hall (the organist of the chapel) kindly officiating at the piano.

Trowbridge.—The congregation worshipping in the Conigre Chapel have in hand a movement for placing in a suitable spot a brass memorial, by way of celebrating the Jubilee of the present handsome gothic structure in which they carry on their Sunday services. It was through the untiring labours of the late Rev. Samuel Martin, who gathered in most of the money, so that the then old chapel should be replaced by a modern and more graceful building, and the erection of the present beautiful structure was the result. It was opened on October 1, 1857, by the Rev. William James, of Bristol. Twenty years afterwards Mr. Martin died, and the granite monumental stone at the cemetery, and the marble tablet in the chapel, testify to the universal esteem in which he was held. The committee think that it would be a worthy act to place a brass plate in the chapel with suitable inscription making public the fact that it was he who took the initiative in so important an undertaking. Special services will be held on Sunday, October 6, and in the evening the sermon will be preached by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., of Bristol, who will at the same service unveil the memorial plate. The Rev. J. Wain will preach at the morning service, which will combine the Jubilee commemoration with the Harvest Thanksgiving. There will be a public tea and meeting on the following Wednesday. It is also proposed to make this event especially remembered by the Sunday-school scholars by the presentation to each scholar of some permanent token of the present chapel and school buildings. The stonework of the interior is to be cleaned, and, if possible, something will be done with parts of the outside of the chapel which have suffered from time and the weather. We feel sure there are a large number of people in our various churches who have some very dear memories of Mr. Martin and some portion of his fifty years pastorate of the Conigre Chapel, and who would like to contribute to this event. If so, contributions will be most gratefully received by the treasurer, Mr. Albert Taylor, Ivy Lodge, Ashton-street, or of the secretary, Mr. Ebenezer Taylor, 75, Ashton-street, Trowbridge.

AFTER long years of independence the miners of Northumberland have decided by a large majority to come into the Miners' Federation of Great Britain, and accept that body's programme of a miner's Eight Hours Day. The Northumberland Union has a membership of 24,000, of whom two-thirds have voted for joining the National Federation. The difficulty in the past has, we believe, been due to a determination on the part of the men to resist the enforcement of an eight hours day, not for themselves, but for the lads employed in the mines. The Durham miners seem to be still standing out; but it may be hoped they also will soon come into line.

LONDON SWIMMING COMPETITIONS.—On the occasion of the visit of the Laymen's Club to Essex Church a suggestion was made to hold a competition in swimming and diving among lads associated with the London churches, missions, and schools. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence generously presented a handsome shield for annual competition among the senior lads, and, owing to the kindness of Mr. C. Fellowes Pearson and Mr. W. Stanton Preston, another fine shield was provided for the juniors. There were twelve teams entered for the Senior League, of which nine competed, and eight for the Junior League. After a number of preliminary contests in different parts of London (consisting of team races and diving) the competitions were brought to a successful conclusion last week at the Holborn Baths. The Senior teams that reached the final stage were from Bermondsey, Mansford-street, and Essex Church; while among the Juniors, Limehouse, St. George's-row, Highgate, and Essex Church were successful. Ultimately the Senior Shield was won by the Mansford-street team, who obtained the highest marks both in swimming and diving, Bermondsey being second; and the Junior Shield was won by the Essex Church team, George's-row being second.

THE final competitions, at which a large number of friends attended, were varied by exhibitions of graceful diving by Mr. Ronald Jones and Mr. G. Melville Clark, the amateur diving champion, who acted as a judge on the last evening.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE should like to call attention to the notice in our advertisement columns of the induction of Rev. J. C. Ballantyne as minister of Stamford-street Chapel on Friday next, October 4, at 8 p.m. Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, and Rev. P. H. Wicksteed have both promised to take part in the service. Mr. Ballantyne was an active and successful worker at Stamford-street before he went to college. He now returns to the scene of his former labours, having prepared himself by faithful and devoted study, and he will enter on his work with the best wishes and affectionate confidence of all who know him. It is to be hoped that ministers and laymen from other churches will make a special effort to be present.

IF Dr. Collyer had not appeared in a London pulpit on this his eighth visit, the disappointment would have indeed been great. But he preached at Essex Church on Sunday morning last to a crowded audience, and much enjoyed meeting the admiring friends who looked up into his dear old face. Hearers from many of our London churches had come various distances to listen to his words. It was most inspiring to join in the devout and hearty singing, favourite hymns and tunes having been chosen, including his own hymn "Unto Thy temple, Lord, we come."

The Rev. Frank K. Freeston conducted the service, and then introduced the preacher with the words, "A very great joy is ours to-day. Yet once more on his eighth visit over, we very warmly welcome here Dr. Collyer, of America. We think of him rather, and speak of him more, as our old friend and English brother Robert Collyer, of Yorkshire. And it is surely very appropriate, as he is the first to admit, that he will now again be addressing the congregation founded by a faithful Yorkshire clergyman, Theophilus Lindsey, of Catterick, who came out for conscience' sake."

Dr. Collyer then preached very impressively from the texts "For this mortal must put on immortality," and "Having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."

At the close of the service he passed down the aisle through close lines of eager friends pressing forward to shake his hands.

The sermon will be found in another portion of our columns.

DR. COLLYER's health has, unfortunately, made it necessary for him to shorten his London stay. It had been hoped by members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and other friends that an afternoon reception to meet their honoured guest at Essex Hall might have been held. Arrangements to carry this out were already in progress when the news came to hand that Dr. Collyer was obliged to return to Leeds on Monday last. His many London friends can now, therefore, only send after him their affectionate remembrances and good wishes for a happy home return.

WE are glad to note that Rev. Edgar I. Fripp, of Clifton, intends publishing one sermon a month under the general title of "The Spade and the Sickle." The first sermon of the series is in our hands, and is entitled "Why go to Church?" It is a very suggestive and strong sermon dealing with an important subject. The growing tendency of non-attendance at public worship must have a serious influence upon the moral and spiritual life of our time.

A YEAR'S subscription costs 1s. 6d., in return for which a copy will be sent each month by post. They may be ordered from Mr. Fripp, 36, Manor-park, Redland, Bristol. We could wish that more of our ministers would see their way to follow the example long set by Mr. Hargrove and now by Mr. Fripp. The Christian World Pulpit is seldom available for our ministers, and it is not desirable for the columns of THE INQUIRER or Christian Life to be largely filled by sermons. It is good for a congregation to have the opportunity occasionally of reconsidering one of their minister's sermons. It is still better that they should have something which they could show to outsiders or casual attendants as an example of the kind of teaching which is to be found in their chapel. Further, it would make for closer unity and understanding among our scattered congregations if it were possible to know what our ministers were saying to their congregations in various parts of the country.

MR. DIGGLE, Bishop of Carlisle, is severely reproved in this week's Church Guardian for giving "an account of the modern history and present position of the Church, which, if it came from a combatant Nonconformist politician, would be called malicious." The Bishop had ventured to say that the Church is becoming so denationalised that it is being reduced to the narrow conditions of a sect." He pointed to the attitude of a House of Commons preponderatingly Nonconformist, compared with the churchly tone of the popular Chamber forty years ago, to the overwhelming vote on the Trades' Union Congress for secular education, and to the passing of the Deceased Wife's Sister Act, with regard to which the feeling of the Church and the feeling of the nation stands, he believes, in opposition.

It is a bad sign in any community when it cannot bear outspoken criticism from one of its own leaders. Bishops are the very men who ought to speak out about the Church. There can be no question that such a man as the Bishop of Carlisle speaks the truth as he sees it in love, and not in malice. A nation or a Church which does not object to external criticism, but violently resents criticism from those of its own household, is in imminent danger of that sectarian narrowness which it disclaims.

THE United Methodist gives the following statistics of the three united denominations:—Enrolled membership, full and probationary, 194,147; Sunday scholars, 337,311; teachers, 44,043; ministers, 906; local preachers, 6,251; churches and preaching rooms, 2,377; sittings, 714,793; cost of estates, £4,394,377; debt, £756,993; two theological training colleges, accommodating 39 students; three public high schools, with places for 164 scholars; a Deaconess Institute with 40 trained ladies; mission stations in three Chinese provinces, in East and West Africa, Jamaica and Central America; book rooms and a printing establishment, and considerable funds for church building, extension, and the support of work among the young, and for aged ministers and lay preachers.

THE Rev. Edward Boaden, first President of the United Methodist Church, is eighty-two years of age. He is of Cornish birth, and inherits the Methodist fire of his native county. Entering the ministry in 1849 at Gosport, he subsequently proceeded to London, Liverpool, and Manchester, and other great centres. In 1864 he was made secretary of the Chapel and Superannuation Funds. For many years he has devoted himself to the cause of union, the consummation of which he has happily lived to see. His early legal training has been of great practical value in his official life, and to it the carefully framed United Methodist Church Act owes much. He is a hymn-writer and a gifted preacher. His presidential address was a model of charity and conciseness, and was fraught with a special charm in that part where he touched on the mutual attraction and affinity which had brought the three denominations into one. "There has been a mighty power of grace and goodness and love bringing us into union. We are here because we could not keep apart. The forces of Divine love have brought us, and we are here to get perfect in that love which unites."

PERHAPS the most significant feature of this union of Methodists is its determination not to be held down by the dead hand. Not only does the Act of Union leave room for the inclusion later on of other bodies, but it omits altogether theological subscriptions. These are dealt with in a separate Foundation Deed Poll. The United Methodist Church herein makes its confession of faith. But it is a confession of the Church of to-day. The Church of to-morrow is likely to have moved on to higher ground and a broader horizon. With commendable wisdom the new church has reserved the right to revise from time to time its own theological standards, for which purpose the Annual Conference is the recognised and final authority. So admirable a provision marks an epoch in the annals of religious liberty.

LANCASHIRE is to be favoured with the Autumnal Assemblies of both the Baptists and the Congregationalists. The former meet at Liverpool, where the Rev. F. B. Meyer opens the programme by preaching at Hugh Stowell Brown's old chapel to-morrow morning. The Lord Mayor will receive the ministers and delegates on Monday evening. The President (Principal W. J. Henderson) will deliver his address on Tuesday. A resolution is to be moved on "Systematic Giving"; Professor T. H. Robinson, of Cambridge, is to open a conference on "The Study of the Gospels"; and there is to be a special public meeting for the "Exposition and Enforcement of Free Church Principles"; at which Dr. Clifford will speak. The Congregationalists assemble at Blackpool on October 13. The Rev. J. H. Jowett and Dr. Horton will speak on the deepening of the spiritual life. And here too, there is to be a public meeting devoted to the exposition of Free Church principles. Seeing that little more than a gossamer thread divides these two denominations, may it not now be asked, When will the Baptists and the Congregationalists hold their First United Assembly? Dr. Maclaren has spoken favourably of union. Other leaders, on both sides, look kindly on it. The latest act of Methodism is prophetic for these two great denominations. They too must become a unity when they have discovered that they can keep no longer apart.

IN The Tribune of the 21st and 23rd there appeared two articles of Leo Tolstoy's "Thou Shalt Kill No One," in which, returning to his favourite theme, the great Russian writer once again expounds the gospel of non-resistance with undiminished vigour. His argument, in its latest form, is, briefly, this: The only basis for social or political union is community of purpose. But the old common ground, found in the acceptance of Catholic Christianity and the divine right of governments, is lost, and we are now subsisting upon a purely transitional basis of "the inertia of power." In Russia, especially, "in the midst of our absurd and horrible revolution," the need for some new principle of association becomes daily more and more clearly evident to a great body of earnest people. This, Tolstoy would have us to believe, is only to be secured by accepting as the fundamental axiom of the new order of society the absolute sacredness of the individual human life. That is to be the new charter of liberty. "In every human body there dwells one and the same Divine Spirit, and therefore no man, and no body of men, can have any right to violate that union of the Divine Spirit with the human body by depriving a man of his life." He regards this as the essential teaching of Jesus, and describes its practice as the "non-resistance to evil by evil"—a very different thing from mere unqualified non-resistance.

A CONFERENCE of members of municipal bodies was held at Letchworth last week, under the chairmanship of the Lord Mayor. Dr. Macnamara improved the occasion by delivering an important statement as to the intentions of the Government with reference to housing. Mr. Burns and he were making the most serious study of the recommendations of Sir John Dickson-Poynder's Select Committee with a view to legislative and administrative action. This would be directed towards securing better sanitary conditions in rural areas, and the compulsory purchase of land for housing in the same; towards the improvement of the conditions under which loans could be granted for housing schemes, and towards more provident town planning.

It may be recollected that the principal recommendations of the Select Committee included the formation of a special department of the Local Government Board for the express purpose of carrying out the duties of defaulting County Councils. This is, perhaps, the most necessary of the changes recommended, if any real reform is to be effected. A useful résumé of the recommendations appeared in Monday's Tribune.

CREMONA was the meeting-place of the seventh annual congress of the International Co-operative Alliance in the early part of this week. One of the principal subjects discussed was the National Organisation of Agriculture on a co-operative basis, introduced by the Danish Minister of State and the President of the Union of Italian Agricultural Co-operative Societies. On the Continent co-operation has gone far ahead of anything achieved in England in the organisation of dairy and other agricultural industries, while in England its main advance has been in the distribution of commodities through the retail stores, and their manufacture by the "whole-sale" societies under good conditions of labour which, however, are not at all fully co-operative or profit-sharing. Co-operative banking is a large achievement on the Continent. Delegates to Cremona were invited to view, among others, the Banca Popolare of Milan, which has 22,000 members, and turns over more than £16,000,000 a year. In Reggio and elsewhere workmen in Italy have combined to become their own employers in large undertakings; one of them is now carrying out a contract to build a railway from Reggio to Ciano.

DR. MACNAMARA, speaking at a conference at Letchworth Garden City, has foreshadowed some of the provisions of the bill promised by the Government dealing with the housing problem. He hoped that they would give to the central executive authority power to enforce reform in cases where there was evidence of abnormal unhealthiness. Compulsory acquisition of land for housing purposes, especially in rural areas, with a land valuation scheme securing a basis for just valuation, a re-arrangement of the terms of loans making the immediate cost of housing schemes less heavy, and provisions for appropriate town planning so as to avoid for the future many of the evils that are to-day so heavy a charge on the national health and exchequer, were among the reforms indicated.

THE RELIGIOUS CRISIS IN FRANCE AND ITALY.

By PAUL SABATIER.

FOR many years, now, people have been speaking of the religious crisis, yet all that has been said of its generality and intensity falls far within the reality.

Rightly to study it, indeed, requires a consideration not only of the manifest uneasiness within the Church, but also of the trend of thought in the minds and consciences of men outside its borders.

Systematic investigations into the situation have been pursued in recent years in many quarters, with the result of discovering, through a vast majority of voices, that, after all, we are tending not towards a religious dissolution, but towards an evolution. But let us be clear as to the meaning of these statements. If by religion is meant a congeries of rites to which an absolute and eternal value is credited, and miraculous effects akin to those which savages attribute to the practices of their sorcerers; or if, again, we are to understand by religion adhesion to a certain number of beliefs in contradiction to the data of the individual conscience and experience, then it is evident that religion so understood is daily losing ground. But is it not equally evident that the ground lost by these rude beliefs is not abandoned to become a wilderness, but that it is straightway occupied by new generations, who, perhaps, will proclaim their unbelief in relation to the past, and who yet will be more religious than their predecessors, inasmuch as they will exert a more conscious effort towards truth and justice. Let us not, therefore, be misled by words, nor permit charlatans to tell us that we scorn medicine whenever we decline to accept their quack medicine and panaceas. It is precisely because we cherish so high a respect for the genuine thing that we give them a wide berth.

In the judgment of men who are equally observant, competent, and disinterested, we are witnessing the prologue to a religious revolution, surpassing in importance that of the sixteenth century. Nothing can be more interesting in this respect than one of the investigations to which I have just alluded, which was made by Dr. Marcel Riffaux and published in a volume entitled "The Conditions of the Return to Catholicism."*

In every institution in which there is life there is a permanent struggle between the elements of the past and those of the future. The Church is a living body which strives to assimilate to itself the new generations. Now the efforts required for this purpose cannot be exerted without pain. And for many years now these efforts have been becoming exceedingly laborious. What is impending? I have no desire to play the part of a prophet, but, since within the Roman Church Conservatives and Modernists—I only employ these words as a makeshift and for lack of better—seem like two opposing armies, it is allowable to study them, and we shall be led, perfectly naturally, from a review of the relative state of the troops, of their moral attitude, and of their force, to form some idea of the result of the struggle.

What strikes one, first of all, in considering the attitude of the Conservative party in the Church, is its tendency to tyranny and coercion. The idea of acting otherwise than by the brute force of authority does not even seem to occur to it. In every other domain authority has gradually assumed a provisional and pedagogic character. It tries its best to be dispensed with. Whereas in the Church it tends to monopolise everything. She does not take her stand by her children's side merely to help them to see, to act, and to understand; she considers them as so much the more perfect, the more they are lacking in brains altogether, and the more she is besought to think and act for them.

Many representatives of ecclesiastical authority suffer from defective vision. Now, it is a great misfortune to be blind, but it is a much greater misfortune to possess visual troubles of which we are unconscious; to believe that we see, to describe perversely the things we look at, and to found on these erroneous judgments important decisions. This is exactly, alas! the sad case that has befallen the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition in its new Syllabus. It has extracted from the books of Loisy, in particular, a great number of theses so as to condemn them. The most learned Conservative theologians have applied themselves to this task. Those of Rome not sufficing, they sought reinforcements right away in Ireland. Cardinals and Consulters laboured, discussed, conferred. They are all specialists on these questions, men whose good faith and good will are perfect, and yet the worst has befallen them that could have befallen them. They have reproduced the prohibited propositions in such a fashion as to give the reproduction all the appearance of a caricature. They have evidently thought they were copying, and have evidently wanted to copy, but in these brains organised by scholasticism the ideas of the historians and of the modern thinkers undergo a species of constriction, and assume a doctrinal aspect which completely distorts them.

Messrs. Loisy, Le Roy, and others have, then, been aimed at by the Syllabus—we may say that they have not been hit. What has been hit is the interpretation of their thought put forth by Father Pie de Langogne or the Cardinal Vivès. No doubt certain people will exclaim that the interpretation is perfectly adequate; they will even naively add that many things which they had not comprehended in the original texts have been revealed to them by the decree of the Holy Office, and that the latter expresses the thought of Messrs. Loisy, Le Roy, and the others better than they could have expressed it themselves. These kinds of blindness are much in evidence, and in vain one seeks to cure them.

Of these sixty-five propositions there are some which have never been maintained by anybody. There are some, even, which do not constitute errors, but are simple stupidities. It was useless to condemn them and to bewail them. A passing smile was all their due. The Sacred Congregation has thus gone wrong on the body even of modernist teaching, on its trend and on its spirit. It has not seen that these philosophers, these exegetes, and these historians have never dreamt of posing as Doctors proclaiming final results, and that they have not for a moment ceased to be modest labourers who are perfectly aware of the provisional and relative nature of their work.*

The famous decree, if it were observed, would have, as a consequence, not only to prevent the Catholics from repeating the condemned propositions, but it would lead fatally to the abandonment of the domain of the scientific study of dogmas or of the Bible; for the very idea of study and toil admits the liberty of error. There is no savant without scientific apprenticeship, and there is no apprenticeship without errors and false moves.

Not only, therefore, does the Conservative party, which at present is in power, not understand what the youngest and most living elements of the Church think and wish, but it has reached that degree of authoritarianism where commands are given without any chance or any possibility of being obeyed. It is leading Catholicism into an impasse. It is needless to say that I hope and believe with all my heart that the Church will emerge from this trial triumphant and renewed; but she is on the eve of experiencing a singularly difficult moment.

Two years ago, wishing to prove to authority that it would be called upon more and more to proclaim a sort of state of intellectual siege, and practically to forbid the clergy the use of printers' ink, I called attention to a very fine work of the Abbé Dimnet, entitled "Catholic Thought in Contemporary England." I pointed out that a war on the new ideas was senseless, since they had penetrated everywhere, and that the pretensions of conservatism are nothing but those of a dangerous minority, incurable because of its obstinacy, powerful because of its material resources and its alliance with political and social interests, but doomed to become at no distant date a mere sect. The work of M. Dimnet, completely penetrated with modernism, had appeared, chapter by chapter, in the "Revue du Clergé Français," where it had had a great success, proving how much the methods of our priests are already in harmony with the new ideas. Finally the Archbishopric of Paris, on July 6, 1905, granted it its imprimatur. On July 26, 1907, it was placed on the Index!

It is certainly not flattering to the Archbishopric of Paris, but what is one to think either of the intelligence or of the efficiency of an authority that takes two years to perceive the venom of a book, and only condemns it after it has taken time

* The political, intellectual, and scientific difficulties in the midst of which the Church is struggling at the present time are set forth luminously by the collaborators of M. Riffaux. But there is one aspect of the crisis over which they have passed too rapidly, viz., that of moral deficiencies; and here I refer not alone to the Roman Church, but to all the churches. What exposes them to peril is not the attacks from without; it is the impossibility they experience of furnishing to our generation the moral ideal of which it stands in need. When we ask of them bread, it cannot be said that they offer us serpents, for what they offer us is really bread, but under the pretext that it was excellent in the time of St. Paul or of the Crusades, they assert that it has been tested and ought to feed humanity to the end of time.

leisurely to poison the minds of thousands of the faithful? Intellectual terrorism is always hateful, but when it arrives with such tardiness it becomes ludicrous.

The Sacred Congregation will be well advised, if it does not wish to expose itself to still more comical feats, to increase the number of its members and to invite them to be more on their guard. Cardinal Steinhuber, its Prefect, who is a Jesuit, ought in particular to keep a strict watch over his confrères, for in the Society of Jesus itself traditions are waning and modernism is finding an entrance. From its midst has appeared one of the masterpieces of the new tendency, "Les Légendes Hagiographiques" of the Rev. Father Delehaye, a work which was published three years ago at Brussels and translated since then into almost all languages. I know no book more adapted to teach its readers historical criticism and to dispose their minds to modernism.

Authoritarianism is groping along in the impasse into which it has flung itself so light-heartedly. It is uttering loud cries, it is making wild gestures, and striking out blindly on all sides. It makes one think of those monarchs to whom national piety has left the insignia of royalty without the reality of power. They reign, but do not govern. Authoritarianism has thus led the Catholics who are the least disposed to revolt to bow low before it on principle, and, as a matter of fact, to take no account of its behests. In its August number the "Revue du Clergé Français," for instance, published the famous Syllabus, without any change being perceived in the subsequent number, or any effort being made to bring itself into harmony with its most evident indications. This does not betray any ill-will; it is simply a proof that if the Sacred Congregation ignores the Catholic writers, the latter maintain their profound respect, but do not ignore her any the less.

Will Pius X. not perceive the immense labour which is being accomplished in the Church? Will he see the impossibility in which authority finds itself, of finding any agents to struggle against the invasion of modernism? Has he not yet thought with melancholy of the extraordinary number of French Bishops dead since he assumed the tiara? Have they been poisoned by the Freemasons? Or is it not, rather, that Monseigneur Le Camus is not the only one made to drink of bitterness by the Holy See?

Already, now, the Pope has reported facts showing that it is not with impunity that men struggle against certain currents. Not long since he sent to France quite a group of Bishops, the first-fruits of a new Episcopate. How many instances of disillusionment has not this purified Episcopate furnished? I do not refer to the two who out of the fourteen were forthwith considered tainted with modernism; I am referring to the twelve others. I will mention no more than one. He was chosen as being at once as gentle as a lamb and as fierce as a watch-dog. On St. Peter's Day of this year he went and preached in the town of his great seminary, and thundered so loudly against modernism that the young scholars were far more amused by it than convinced.

A few days afterwards he published a charge. Being too pressed with engagements, he had been obliged to seek the collaboration of a priest of the diocese, and had inserted, without alteration, the pages that had been furnished, so worthy had they appeared to him of becoming Episcopal prose. It was only, unfortunately, modernist prose, and he had not noticed anything wrong!

If their Eminences the Prefects of the Index or of the Holy Office do me the honour of asking me for the name of this Bishop, it will give me much pleasure to give it them and to publish it afterwards with some new details.

Many more facts still could be related as to the way in which authority is exercised nowadays. They all would show doings as strange as those which have been revealed by the papers of Montagnini of mournful memory. The party in power acts as if authority existed by itself and for itself, independently of the faithful. According to this whimsical conception, it is the shepherds who constitute by themselves the flock. Now the shepherds of the day have become woefully distrustful. It is enough, even, if the sheep say one thing, for them to believe the contrary. It has become a kind of obsession with them. When the Petition of a group of French Catholics appeared in the pamphlet entitled "Quello che vogliamo" of a group of Italian priests, the Curia spread the rumour that these manifestations were probably not the work of Catholics, and that they were only, in any case, the act of an isolated individuality. On the other hand, when M. E. Le Roy published his famous "Dogma and Criticism," of which he assumed responsibility before the whole world, Authority shook its head anew with a sceptical air, and then proceeded to an investigation! The work of M. Le Roy must have been, according to it, the product of a vast collaboration; and a whole string of ecclesiastics, whom M. Le Roy does not know even by name, were suspected and even accused of having laboured at it. Do the venerable Inquisitors realise the element of burlesque that enters into such missions!

In reality, however, they are right, and much more so than they believe. A book like that of Le Roy and like those of Loisy is never the work of one person alone; they are the result of a growth, the work of a generation and of an epoch.

* * * * *

I should have liked, after having shown the attitude of Conservatism, triumphant to-day, to set forth the attitude of modernism, the victor of to-morrow. But I do not wish to weary the patience of my readers. What gives me assurance of its success is not merely the youth of its adherents, their number, their intelligence, or the scientific rigour of their labours, but the intensity of their religious life—in a word, their power of love. To the ferocious unintelligence with which they are attacked, and to the sad insinuations by which it is sought to discredit them,* their

ATTEMPTS AT THE CHURCH CATHOLIC.

THE great thought of The Church Catholic is again to the front. Its hope has always lain quiet and deep in the truly devout heart, but of late it has been daring to speak out. The earnest appeals of two recent little volumes, more than one able article in the Hibbert Journal, and the widely reported utterances of Mr. Campbell, have found many readers and gained many friends. The spiritual quickening in all the Churches is arousing broader sympathies, and is doing something at least toward preparing the way for a realised catholicity.

For if the desire be there, it must seek its fulfilment in some outward shape. And many terms, many plans, make their claim in turn as offering a solution of the question. Comprehension, Free Communion, Non-Subscription, Federation, Reunion, Undenominationalism, Interdenominationalism—each has put forth its project for the true Church Catholic, and made its attempt at the first step. That they have so far met with failure need not move us to despair.

There is, however, another side to the picture which the adverse critic will not let us overlook. Each successive plea for a realised catholicity raises a controversy in which the opponents have most to say, and so seem to gain the day. In a Free Trust Chapel on a recent Sunday morning the preacher declared his emphatic conviction that there could be no common worship without common belief, and that, therefore, the only way to catholic unity lay through theological unanimity. When does he expect that will be! This is the old ecclesiastical idea in a new and unexpected quarter.

Then, again, the amalgamation of hitherto sundered Churches on a common dogmatic basis, as in the Free Churches of Scotland and the three Methodist sects, is in no sense, alas! a step towards the true Church Catholic, but, instead, a more emphatic ratification of the original mistake. Although no one can forecast the form which the catholic idea will assume, the one thing certain is that it will not rest on a dogmatic basis. Real catholicity makes an entirely different plea; it believes in the possibility of spiritual unity amid doctrinal diversity, the only living unity which is not uniformity.

There have been various attempts, at different times and places, to realise in foretaste this unity of the spirit amidst difference of belief. It is instructive to glance backwards at their sanguine endeavours. The one which attracted most upon those who created them. He himself has not felt able to reject so ready a weapon, and in the Encyclical Pieni Van'mo of July 23, 1906, against the modernists, he accused them not only with harbouring "open contempt for all authority," but also "with the most degrading corruption of morals."

notice was, perhaps, the Leicester Conference.

Thirty years ago the Congregational Union, which was holding in Leicester its autumn session, was ruffled much by the notice that at Wycliffe Chapel would take place "a Public Conference, open to all who value spiritual religion, and who are in sympathy with the principle that religious communion is not dependent on agreement in theological, critical, or historical opinion." The project took its origin from a private and informal gathering held in London in the previous spring, and consisting of some fifty men, chiefly Congregationalist ministers and laymen.

The Conference began with a devotional service conducted by the Rev. John Hunter, of York. The Rev. Mark Wilkes, of Holloway, then took the chair, and pleaded in earnest tone, not for any new organisation, but for more open conference and discussion on matters pertaining to spiritual religion, and for a relaxation of the strict terms affecting Religious Communion. Papers were next read by the Rev. Allanson Picton, of Hackney, on "Some Relations of Theology to Religion," and by the Rev. T. Gasquoine, of Oswestry, on "Freedom in Theological Thought and the Spiritual Life." The subsequent discussion revealed dissent in the meeting. A speaker asked at once for precise definitions of the terms in the convening notice—viz., "theological," "critical," "historical," and "communion." Dr. Simon and Dr. Allon spoke in disagreement with the Conference platform; the Revs. Jos. Wood, John Page Hopps, and Benjamin Waugh spoke with power in its favour.

The principles of this Leicester Conference caused much disturbance both in the religious Press and in the Congregationalist churches. So gravely was this the case that the Union at its next meeting passed the following resolution:—

"That in view of the uneasiness produced in the churches of the Congregational Order by the proceedings of the recent Conference at Leicester on the terms of Religious Communion, the Assembly feels called upon to reaffirm that the primary object of the Congregational Union is, according to the terms of its own constitution, to uphold and extend Evangelical Religion.

"That the Assembly appeals to the history of the Congregational Churches generally, as evidence that Congregationalists have always regarded the acceptance of the Facts and Doctrines of the Evangelical Faith revealed in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as an essential condition of Religious Communion in Congregational Churches.

"That the Congregational Union was established on the basis of those Facts and Doctrines is, in the judgment of the Assembly, made evident by the Declaration of Faith and Order adopted at the Annual Meeting in 1833; and the Assembly believes that the Churches represented in the Union hold these Facts and Doctrines in their integrity to this day."

With this Declaration of Faith and Order we are all familiar. It was described by a Congregationalist himself as "a helpless theological document," and by the late Charles Beard as "a contemptible piece of theological tailoring, a thing of shreds and patches." But it was supposed to save the situation, and to silence the Leicester Conference on the Terms of Religious Communion.

In the meantime, between the two meetings of the Congregational Union, a second Conference was held in the Cannon-street Hotel, London, on May 7, 1878, with Mr. Beavis Brindley in the chair. The Rev. J. Byles conducted a devotional service, after which the Rev. P. T. Forsyth read a long paper on "A Larger Comprehension the Remedy for the Decay of Theology." One rubs one's eyes in amaze on reading its fine, broad sentiments when contrasted with the same author's recent strictures on certain Liberal Religious Teachers. A further paper on "The Unity of the Faith" was read by the Rev. W. Miall. Mark Wilkes, Edward Clodd, and Allanson Picton also addressed the meeting.

A further meeting for prayer and fellowship was held at St. Thomas's-square Chapel, Hackney. The Rev. John Rodgers, Vicar of St. Thomas, Charterhouse, presided, and gave an address. Addresses were also given by the Revs. Charles Beard, S. A. Tipple, and W. C. Walters. It was a helpful and memorable occasion, and there was a very large attendance.

So, as was remarked very truly, "While the Congregational Union was fulminating its decree against the possibility of religious communion between men who differed in theological opinion, men who differed in theological opinion widely enough met and communed."

The result was the formation of an "Association for Promoting Religious Communion," and its object was specifically stated to be "The promotion of Religious Communion in worship and work amongst those who, while retaining their individual beliefs, agree in recognising the existence of spiritual life outside the limits of their own theological creed." Amongst the ministers on its committee of thirty were Charles Beard, Silas Farrington, John Hunter, Allanson Picton, Herbert Rix, and S. A. Tipple. Its Chairman was Mark Wilkes and its Secretary Joseph Wood. It would, indeed, be of interest to all INQUIRER readers if Mr. Wood could be persuaded to give us his personal impressions and memories of the Leicester Conference, and this Association for Promoting Religious Communion. It was a genuine attempt at catholicity, made, perchance, before the time was ready. Was this why it fell away?

F. K. F.

SIR CHARLES MACLAREN, M.P., Chairman of the Metropolitan Railway Company, has spoken out frankly in favour of the fullest recognition of Trade Unionism among railway workers. Speaking at Coalville, on Saturday, he asserted his belief that the organisation of labour was for the benefit of all parties.

CHRISTIANITY wants nothing so much in the world as sunny people; and the old are hungrier for love than for bread; and the oil of joy is very cheap; and if you can help the poor on with a garment of praise, it will be better for them than blankets.—Henry Drummond.

JOHN RUSKIN'S ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL TEACHING.

III.—THE VALUE OF HIS INFLUENCE.

IN Letter 19 of Fors Ruskin slyly remarked, for the benefit of those who praised his eloquence but scouted his economics:—"My forte is really not description but political economy." His forte was, however, appreciation of art, and it was this, raised to moral passion by a deep sense of the importance of art for human life, that determined his attitude to economic and social questions. He was led up to these questions through his art studies; his special point of view, rather than wide and deep knowledge of political economy and kindred subjects, gave him a title to be heard; and if he had not weakened that title by dogmatism and exaggeration, his mastery in his own field and his splendid powers of utterance would have won for his views more general and more respectful attention than they received. In this concluding paper, I shall dwell upon some points in his teaching which are most worthy of such attention.

"In my first series of lectures at Oxford," he writes, "I stated (and cannot too often or too firmly state) that no great arts were practicable by any people, unless they were living contented lives; in pure air, out of the way of unsightly objects, and emancipated from unnecessary mechanical occupation. It is simply one part of the practical work I have to do in Art-teaching, to bring, somewhere, such conditions into existence, and to show the working of them. I know also, assuredly, that the conditions necessary for the arts of men are the best for their souls and bodies" (Fors, Letter 9). That is a very lucid summary of the ideas and feelings which impelled Ruskin to devote himself to economic and social questions. And to realise how strongly he was impelled by them, we have only to read such a passage as the following from Letter 45: "I feel the separation between me and the people round me, so bitterly, in the world of my own which they cannot enter; and I see their entrance to it now barred so absolutely by their own resolves (they having deliberately and self-congratulatingly chosen for themselves the Manchester Cotton Mill instead of the Titian) that it becomes every moment more urged upon me that I shall have to leave—not father and mother, for they have left me; nor children, nor lands, for I have none, but at least this spiritual land and fair domain of human art and natural peace, because I am a man of unclean lips, and dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips, and therefore am undone, because mine eyes have seen the king, the Lord of Hosts." This was written at Lucca where he was making a drawing of the statue of Ilaria di Coretto, which, he says, had thirty years previously turned him from the study of landscape to that of life. It was a perpetual pain to him to feel that, in his reverence for such works, he stood so much alone, and that the opinion of the spectator, to which he had referred in a previous letter, must be regarded as representative—"If we must choose between a Titian and a Lancashire cotton mill, in the name of manhood and morality, give us the cotton mill." The cotton mill, thus spoken of, was for Ruskin a symbol of all the devastating and demoralising influences of modern industry, and it was against these that he waged strenuous and unceasing war.

In justice, it should be pointed out that Ruskin was not so alone in this crusade as he supposed, and that even some of the men whom he attacked as if they were throwing all their force on the other side, were not doing so. Take for example, the question of railways and the destruction of scenery. As Bain points out in his little book on J. S. Mill, "He (Mill) was very much concerned (and so was his father) at the possible havoc that the railways might make in the beauties of our rural districts." So early as 1836 (when Ruskin was only seventeen years of age) J. S. Mill wrote: "It is far from desirable that this island, the most beautiful portion perhaps of the earth's surface for its size, should be levelled and torn up in a hundred unnecessary directions by these deformities." And he proceeded to denounce in particular Stephenson's route for the line to Brighton through the Vale of Norbury, "a spot unrivalled in the world for the exquisiteness combined with the accessibility of its natural scenery. Yet into the head of hardly one member of Parliament does it appear to have come, that this consideration ought to weigh one feather." The whole passage is entirely in Ruskin's spirit, and it ends with a judgment in his sweeping style. "The truth is that in this country the sense of beauty, as a national characteristic, scarcely exists. What is mistaken for it is the taste for costliness, and for whatever has a costly appearance." Probably Ruskin never read these words, but he did read some other words of Mill's upon scenery, and in Unto This Last he alludes to them in a singular fashion. With reference to the chapter in the Political Economy on "The Probable Future of the Labouring Classes," he writes:—"That chapter and the preceding one differ from the common writing of political economists in admitting some value in the aspect of nature, and expressing regret at the probability of the destruction of natural scenery. But we may spare our anxieties on this head. . . . Nor need our more sentimental economists fear the too wide spread of the formalities of a mechanical agriculture." The reasons given for these optimistic conclusions are that town populations will always require food from large areas of country, and that all men will require wild nature for their spiritual nourishment. Happily, however, it was only on the rare occasions when Ruskin found a "sentimental economist" speaking strongly about the preservation of scenery and wholesome rural life, that he was willing to trust implicitly to the automatic pressure of human needs; and we certainly owe to his stern denunciations and persuasive pleadings much of that awakening which has occurred as regards this matter. We may also attribute much to his influence in the kindred matter of providing parks and open spaces in large towns. The importance he attached to this is forcibly illustrated by his reply to a correspondent who asked, what could men do whose fate seemed to have fixed them in the groove of town life. "Buy," said he, "ever so small a bit of ground, in the midst of the worst back deserts of our manufacturing towns; six feet square, if no more can be had—nay, the size of a grave, if you will, but buy it freehold, and make a garden of it by hand-labour; a garden visible to all men, and cultivated for all men of that place. If absolutely nothing will grow in it, then have herbs carried there in pots. Force the ground into order, cleanliness, green or coloured aspect. What difficulties you will have in doing this are your best subjects of thought; the good you will do in doing this, the best in your present power" (Fors, Letter 44).

And we must give a still greater proportion of credit to Ruskin for the establishment of public Art Galleries in the large towns. This is one of the most palpable proofs of the immense stimulus he gave to the art-interests of the people. In A Joy for Ever he repeatedly lays stress upon the point, and it is interesting to notice how sound his political economy was, so long as he was on this line. He so frequently and so bitterly attacked political economists for attaching importance to the accumulation of wealth, that one might conclude that he attached no importance to it. Not so, however. He only wanted the right kinds of wealth accumulated with the right kind of motive. He even went so far as to say (thus consciously or unconsciously justifying the economist's method), "It is one question, how to get plenty of a thing; and another whether plenty of it will be good for us. Consider these two matters separately; never confuse yourself by interweaving one with the other" (Section 38). And the very title of the second lecture in the book is "The Accumulation and Distribution of Art." Here he was on his own ground and wrote with convincing power. And the pity is that, as time went on, he seemed to lose the perception, that, new and valuable as his work was, it was an application rather than contradiction of principles already maintained by economists.

But works of art, in order to be accumulated, must be produced; and Ruskin's studies upon the artistic productions of past times, especially in foreign countries, forced upon him the question—"Why does the England of to-day produce so little good art?" Sending to the Sheffield Museum a photograph of one of the capitals of the Ducal Palace in Venice, he asks the people of the Yorkshire town—"Why haven't you a Ducal Palace of your own without need to have the beauties of one far away explained to you? . . . Public buildings you have—but do you take any pleasure in them? and are you never the least ashamed that what little good there may be in them, every flourish of their cast iron, every bead moulding on a shop front, is borrowed from Greece or Venice;—and that if you got all your best brains in Sheffield, and best hands to work, with that sole object, you couldn't carve such another capital as this!" (Fors, Letter 78). He had dealt with this kind of question long before in that wonderful chapter on "The Nature of Gothic" in The Stones of Venice. He had taught that there are two standards of excellence—the excellence of varied invention and great design, and the excellence of mathematical precision and perfect finish. He had shown the superiority of the former, and condemned the modern preference for the latter. He had denounced the tyranny of machinery and division of labour by which that preference is stimulated and gratified.

"Men were not intended to work with the accuracy of tools, to be precise and perfect in all their actions. If you will have that precision out of them, and make their fingers measure degrees like cogwheels, and their arms strike curves like compasses, you must unhumanise them. All the energy of their spirits must be given to make cogs and compasses of themselves. All their attention and strength must go to the accomplishment of the mean act. The eye of the soul must be bent upon the finger point, and the soul's force must fill all the invisible nerves that guide it, ten hours a day, that it may not err from its steely precision, and so soul and sight be worn away and the whole human being be lost at last. . . . If you will make a man of the working creature, you cannot make a tool. Let him but begin to imagine, to think, to try to do anything worth doing; and the engine-turned precision is lost at once. Out come all his roughness, all his dulness, all his incapability; shame upon shame, failure upon failure, pause after pause; but out comes the whole majesty of him also."

And then the English reader is bidden to look round his room and "examine again all those accurate mouldings and perfect polishings, and unerring adjustments of the seasoned wood and tempered steel"; and to realise that "if read rightly, these perfectnesses are signs of a slavery in our England a thousand times more bitter and degrading than that of the scourged African, or helot Greek." This kind of thing had been said by Adam Smith, and hardly less strongly. But Ruskin enforced it in page after page of such abounding eloquence and such varied illustration, he brought to the discussion so full a knowledge of the contrast between original and mechanical work, that his plea for the humanisation and ennobling of industry had quite a new power. And he saw clearly that a better state of things can be brought about only by a change in the mind of both consumer and producer. The consumer must refrain from demanding things without regard to the mental qualities which their production brings into play—he must beware of estimating things by quantity or cheapness; and the producer must beware of making profit his sole concern—he should aim at a high standard of excellence for the sake both of his customers and his workpeople. To sum up Ruskin's teachings in such truisms seems tame. But it would have been well if he himself had written more tamely. He commenced Letter 80 of Fors with these words—"I never sat down to write my Fors, or indeed to write anything, in so broken and puzzled a state of mind." He wrote from the home of the Mayor of Birmingham, who had made a gift of land to St. George's Company, had invited Ruskin to come and see it, and had invited some Birmingham business men to come and see him. "They have taught me much," he writes. "The one great fact which I have been most clearly impressed by, here," continues the letter, "is the right-mindedness of these men, so far as they see what they are doing. There is no equivocation with their consciences, no silencing of their thoughts in any wilful manner; nor, under the conditions apparent to them, do I believe it possible for them to act more wisely or faithfully." Yet such were the men whom he had long been fiercely denouncing. Of Manchester he wrote, in Letter 76, that it "is in every business act of it in mortal sin," and Birmingham would have done as well. No wonder he was somewhat non-plussed and abashed, when he found himself being taught by honourable men instead of fighting with wicked ones. Here we come upon Ruskin's greatest error—his denunciation of men in the abstract, his habit of founding the most sweeping and terrible charges upon the most slender knowledge. It was a great fault. But, on the other hand, what man of modern times has set a more splendid example of free, generous, unwearied self-dedication to the service of his fellows? His social writings will not lose but gain in wholesome influence from frank but sympathetic criticism. It seems as though the strongest natures, when turned to social reform, are peculiarly liable to extravagance; when a Lamennais writes his "Words of a Believer," it is as though his genius were both an ennobling and a self-destroying fate—equally irresistible in both its functions. Ruskin's social writings were also "Words of a Believer," and in his case as in that of Lamennais, while some of the "words" are self-destructive in their violence, the "Believer" will never cease to inspire human hearts.

HENRY RAWLINGS.

OBITUARY.

MR. CHARLES WRIGHT, J.P.

SPAIN LANE CHAPEL, Boston, has suffered a severe loss by the death of its oldest member and trustee. At the ripe age of ninety-four, Mr. Charles Wright passed quietly away from this earthly life on Thursday morning, September 19. Although, from his patriarchal age, his departure might have been expected at any time, yet death came suddenly. He had of late felt the infirmities of the flesh, but his mind was clear, and he was active and vigorous up to the very eve of his death.

Like his father, who was also a trustee of Spain Lane Chapel, and bore the same Christian name, he was a firm believer in the principles of the Unitarian Faith. He was educated by Unitarian ministers, first by Rev. David William Jones, minister of Spain Lane Chapel, and later by Rev. Edward Higginson, who held a similar charge at Friar Gate, Derby.

He took a great interest in the success of the Unitarian cause in Boston, and he was a very regular attendant at the chapel until deafness rendered it impossible for him to follow the service.

In politics he was an ardent Liberal, though he separated from the party on the Home Rule question, and came back on that of Free Trade. He took a very active part in the affairs of his native town; was for nine years a member of the Town Council; held many important positions of trust; and was a Justice of the Peace.

His eldest son—also Mr. Charles Wright—is a trustee of the Unitarian Chapel, and we hope a fourth generation of the family will follow in the footsteps of their grandfather and great-grandfather, and maintain the cause which stands for religious freedom, reverent inquiry, and spiritual faith, the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

WOLF! WOLF!

ONCE upon a time four little children lived in a nursery high up on the top story of a big London house. Their names were Lina, Fred, Arthur, and Jennie.

There were bars to their nursery window, but they could look out over them and see the great dome of St. Paul's in the distance. Sometimes it was quite clear, and sometimes hazy with the soft London mist. They could see a great many church towers and spires too, and one great tower that they looked at with awe, because it was a prison.

It is not a prison now, because since then a law has been passed that all children must go to school (unless they have governesses at home to teach them) and so people have grown up better than they used to do, and there are not so many to be put in prisons, and not so many prisons needed. You see, it is good to have to do lessons, although we don't always like it!

Lina, Fred, Arthur, and Jennie had a tender, loving mother, who used to sit sewing downstairs, but always heard if there was any trouble in the nursery and came running up to see what was the matter.

The children knew this, so little Arthur used sometimes to lie with his mouth close to the chink under the door and howl (when he wasn't really crying), just to bring his mummy up, and be petted and made much of. The other children did not like this, but of course they would not "tell tales."

But it gave Lina an idea. Being the eldest, Lina generally had the ideas and led the others, and sometimes, it is to be feared, she led them into mischief.

"I'll tell you what," said she one evening; "let's all lie down on the floor and pretend to cry, and when mother comes up we'll all laugh and say it was a joke. It will be such fun!"

"So we will!" said Fred.

"Jolly!" cried Arthur.

"Tuch fun!" murmured little Jennie.

Down on the floor in a row they lay, and soon a woeful weeping and howling was heard. Next came quick steps hurrying up the steep flights of stairs, and their mother entered, breathless and anxious.

"What is the matter, dear children?" she cried, as soon as she could get breath to speak.

Then they all rose up and said, laughing, "Nothing, mother; we were only pretending!"

Then their mother's face changed. "You have done very wrong," she said; "you have deceived me. You must never, never deceive any one."

"I will tell you a story."

"Once upon a time there was a shepherd boy who had to mind the flocks on the hills at night. Wolves prowled about in those regions, and sometimes killed the sheep and the shepherds too. This shepherd boy was fond of what he called his joke, and sometimes in the middle of the night he would cry out 'Wolves! Wolves!' Then all the people would scramble out of bed and hurry up to the hills to help him, and when he saw them come he would laugh at them and say, 'There are no wolves, it is only a joke!'

"One night the wolves really did come, and the boy shouted 'Wolves! Wolves!' with all his might, but no one believed him, and no one came to help him, and the wolves killed him and all his flock."

"That shows you the consequence of deceiving people: when you are in earnest, you will not be believed."

The mother, having spoken, went away leaving four little people feeling sorry and ashamed.

But they took the lesson to heart, and I don't think they ever tried to deceive anybody again, either in "fun" or earnest.

VIOLET SOLLY.

WOMEN ON TOWN COUNCILS.

SIR,—There seems to be some misapprehension as to what women are eligible for town councils under the "Qualification of Women Act (County and Borough Councils), 1907," which came into force on August 28. As candidates for town councils in England and Wales, only electors are eligible. Hence those single women and widows whose names are on the burgess roll are eligible, but no married woman is eligible, for no married woman has a vote for a town council.

In the Committee stage of the Bill in the House of Commons, in which general concern was expressed that married women would be unable to serve under the provisions of the Bill, Dr. Shipman stated that, if the Government did not in another session bring in a measure to remove the anomalies referred to, he himself would do so, so that there should in the future be no difficulty in married women being able to serve on county and borough councils. Dr. Shipman pointed out that the great value of the Act is that it secures for women direct election. It is certainly misleading for the general public that many newspapers have raised the foolish question of what title should be given to the husband of a woman who might occupy the position of mayor, when the fact is that, as no one can be chosen as a mayor who is not eligible as a councillor, no married woman can, as the law stands, be a mayor.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

ANNIE LEIGH BROWNE,

Hon. Sec. Women's Local Government Society, 17, Tothill-street, Westminster, September 20, 1907.

A MAN may think he is doing God's work when he is not even doing God's will. And a man may be doing God's work and God's will quite as much by hewing stones or sweeping streets as by preaching or praying. So the question means just this: Are we working out our common everyday life on the great lines of God's will?—Henry Drummond.

RACIAL PREJUDICES AND CHRISTIANITY.

THERE has been another outbreak against Japanese immigration in Canada. It cannot be thought unjustifiable for a religious journal to ask its readers to consider what bearing Christian principles have upon the present tendency of white men in all parts of the world to exclude the yellow and dark races from equal rights. Christian principles may or may not be hopelessly impracticable, but at least they ought not to be wholly ignored.

The motives at work seem to be merely selfish ones, and the arguments employed to justify them are not concerned with anything higher than expediency.

There are two arguments generally employed. The first is that the cheap labour offered by coloured races interferes with the organisation and success of the labour unions. The second is that Canada, Australia, and the Cape are white men's countries, and that the yellow races and the Hindoos must not be allowed to share with the whites in the enjoyment and use of them. Such papers as the Times and the Spectator have no sympathy with the first argument; they see very clearly the narrowness of class prejudices, especially when that class is the labour class, and when it interferes with the Japanese, who on imperial grounds must not be offended. We must all recognise sadly the tendency to think only of their own interests which is a danger for all trade unions both of rich or poor. It is of course in flagrant opposition to such teachings as "Love your neighbour as yourself" and "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." Even from the point of view of practical politics, class conflicts and class prejudices are opposed to the highest welfare of the State. Professor HENRY JONES has some wise and striking words on this deep-seated delusion, "that when every class presses for its own claims, justice will arrive to all as a result of their collision. It is not true. The just equipoise of rights never comes in this way. Mere class legislation is never right. . . . What will arrive by such methods is care for the strong and neglect of the weak, the conversion of the state into a warring arena, and the ultimate triumph of the strong. It is not the strife of interests that maintains the equipoise of the state or the city, but its just men." These are golden words, in harmony with the fundamental teachings of Christianity. It is impossible to justify class selfishness or trades union particularism, either by Christianity or by what Professor JONES would have us feel is the same thing—the highest and most permanent interests of the human race.

But it is too often forgotten that nationalism, while it is a union of a more august and wider kind, is yet as much subject to temptations of selfishness and permanent preoccupation with its own interests as any trades union. Even if we spread our sympathies yet further, and embrace all white men in our union, we are still leaving out a large proportion of the human race. Why should Canada and Australia and the Cape be in perpetuity ear-marked for the white races? What right have we, on the principle that all men are brethren, to say to the Japanese or Chinese or Hindoos, You shall have no part or lot with us as free men and independent workmen in the life of these enormous undeveloped tracts of country? We will admit white men on equal terms, but you shall be for ever excluded. On the first page of some lay sermons by Professor CAIRD, late Master of Balliol, is a description of Christianity. It "was a principle that bound all men to each other, and made them members one of another, as no previous religion had ever attempted to do. It broke down all the walls of division that had hitherto separated individuals, families, and nations from each other; it cast aside and utterly repudiated all the prejudice of rank and caste, of race and custom, and bade men, as simply men, recognise each other as brethren." What a mockery these words sound in relation to the action of our Colonies and of the U.S.A. towards coloured peoples!

There is, indeed, one argument, and one argument alone, so far as we can see, which would justify white men in excluding coloured races from sharing in the development of our Colonies. It is the argument that living side by side in common work and daily life is not advantageous for either the white or the coloured races. It is stated that the children of mixed marriages are of a lower character than either of the parents. In the case of Eurasians this seems unfortunately to be true. But if this is so serious and unavoidable an evil as to prevent our admitting Hindoos to settle in South Africa, it ought also to require for the sake of India that all Europeans should leave that country as soon as possible. We are by no means in favour of the immediate abandonment of India by England. If Eurasians are so degraded a type it ought to be possible by law, and yet more by public sentiment, to make unions between whites and Hindoos far less general than they are. In the case of mixed marriages with Japanese and Chinese it does not seem to be so clearly proved that the results entailed upon the children are so deplorable. If they were, and if it were absolutely impossible to prevent such unions becoming ever more common, the exclusionists would have something to say for themselves on Christian principles. Nothing but clear proof that white and coloured races cannot occupy the same country without reciprocal deterioration would justify us in trying to confine our Colonies to white men alone. This is not proved at present. It is to be earnestly hoped that it cannot be proved. If it were, it would mean that the white and yellow races must be constantly fighting for the exclusive possession of the earth, instead of working side by side in free and healthy competition. We find it difficult to believe that the laws of God make fighting imperative and association impossible.

LOOKING TOWARD SUNSET.*

I THINK it is no wonder that, as the years come and go, and we fare on towards the sunset of the life that now is, the heart in us should feel a touch of dismay now and then when we try to imagine ourselves out of the body, but the same man or woman; away from the world we live in, yet still in a home which will be homelike and welcome, and of a day when the seasons will be no more what they have been, or the sun and stars, the streets on which we walk, or the homes in which we dwell.

A time when we can clasp hands with friends no more in the good familiar fashion, or bid them good morning or good even. Sit no more at the table and join in the cheerful talk, go to our work in the morning, and, when the day's stint is done, go home, take some book we love best to read, turn the familiar pages with an ever new delight, and then go to sleep through the silent shadowy hours to wake again in the morning and find that God has made all things new.

And I think this touch of dismay may well be of all things natural, and therefore right, because we are in this body, and find that in the measure of our life is our loyalty to the things we can touch and see. For in the thin shadow of the man I met one day, far up among the nineties, this loyalty to the world he lives in, lingering like a frosted apple on the tree in January, was no more than an instinct to hold on; but to those who are still hale and strong it is a loyalty for which they can give good reason.

They love to watch the spring open, and find her fragrance fill them with the old delight, the summer flood the world with her fruits and flowers, and are glad for the golden treasures of the autumn, the white glory of the winter, and the tumultuous privacy of the storms that lure the summer again indoors, and set them laughing by sea-coal or hard wood fires.

This is all so dear to us, and so human, that it comes a little hard now and then for the bravest and best in this simple human sense to think of a time when all this can be no more what it is here and now; and so it ought to be, and, if the option was open to a great many of us, while the tides of life run deep and full, to exchange the life we are living for the splendours of the celestial city the seer saw in his vision—to give up the steady fight for bread and garments, a roof and a fire, with all the hurly-burly of the days, for the white robes, the harps and crowns, in a world as free from contentions as the great deeps of the Atlantic are free from the storms, very few of us who are in the midst of life would hesitate to say we love this best after all, and do not want to give it up, no matter what may be waiting in the blessed life to come.

That may be, and, indeed, must be all right, while we think not seldom this is all wrong; but this is so close to us and so familiar, so blended in the woof and warp of our being that we cannot give it up. The gravitation of our being binds us to our planet, and we cannot cry, "Oh, that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest."

Nor can I think this trouble is met by the teaching, far more urgent in my youth than it is now, that we should think of this human life, which is our gift from God, as if it were in quarantine, and this world a place to have done with the sooner the better, so that we may win our way to the immortal life to come.

Some such conclusion may come, I know, through our brooding over the meanness and poverty of the best we can hope for down here, if we take that turn; or it may come to those who have had to fight sore battles with the world, or who have drained their life of all its pleasantness, bartering joy for enjoyment, and then would toss it away like the skin of an orange.

But those I hold this moment in my mind are always able to make out this clear truth, that the men who have talked in this strain were out of sorts with this world and its wholesome life, or else they were men who did not practice what they preached. Men like my good Matthew Henry, to whose chapel in Chester I went on pilgrimage. My good Matthew is for ever talking in this strain, through his vast and capital commentary; and yet his portrait reveals one of the most comfortable divines you would want to see in the last times of the old Puritan life in England. This is the man who tells me to sit lightly to my life, as a bird on the spray, while you can see quite easily that the men who have made the best mark and the deepest, of whose works in this world you can say, "Now here is something primal and pregnant, something which holds in its heart a seed of worth which has grown with the world's growth, and must live and be resown to noble harvests." These, as a rule, are the men of an abounding human life; men, as we say, who were all there, with no special turn for lentils and herbs, or hair-cloth next to the skin, when they could compass fair white linen. They were men who had a strong grip on this world which was their home, and while they were on their way to a place among the saints—if this lay in their election—they could go out hunting with St. Augustine, or play sweet tunes on the violin, or sing old ballads with Luther. They were men who, while their life stood well above zero, could feel it was good to be here, and wanted no new tabernacles so long as the old ones served them so well.

This truth holds good again with those we know of that have no special claim to a place among the saints. The grand builders and inventors, the great artists and musicians, the poets and authors whose books we read with perpetual delight.

These, as a rule, lived very close to our life, and loved it with all their heart. Loved their own land, like our good Sir Walter Scott. Loved the waters, and to go afishing with dear old Izaak Walton; and with Paley, who tells a friend in one of his letters that he cannot think of writing another word in his once famous book of the "Evidences" until fly fishing was over—loved the splendid movement of great cities with Johnson, Charles Lamb, and Thackeray, or the kindly humours of the common life with Charles Dickens—and more beside than I can name loved the shadows of the woods, the sunshine on the meres, and the crowned splendours of the fells with Wordsworth. So I say the men of most worth to this world were deepest in our life, and did not love to brood over a day when they must leave us, and the place which knew them would know them no more, when they would see the Hudson no more, or the Tweed or Concord river, or the Charles—leave Fleet-street for ever and the Strand, Broadway, or Boston Common, the haunts of living, loving men, their neighbours and friends.

So "I do not want to die," sturdy Samuel Johnson said; or, "to drop like mellow fruit," Charles Lamb wrote to his friend. They were well suited, and this was one condition of their love and loyalty, that they were children of the light and of the day, therefore the light and the day abides in what they have done.

This, indeed, is all so true that, when you bring the truth home to the teaching which has gone dead against it, time out of mind, it is to find that the men of a supreme power and purpose in the pulpit, men like Beecher and Bellows and Bishop Brookes, to speak only of the great dead we have known, were the most abundantly gifted with this love and loyalty to our life.

Nor is this touch of trouble met and mastered by the thought that there may be—will be—must be—infinite blessing through our passing into the infinite, losing our own personal identity, and becoming one with that life, as the raindrops become one with the ocean, or as the mist, floating in the rainbow above Niagara is swept down to become one again with the water floods below.

No one thing in this universe can be of a deeper moment to a whole and sound man than his own proper personal life. You may talk with him from this to doomsday about being lost in the infinite, he will still cling to himself as the true factor, and say with a very noble man I knew, who has gone out of the body to God: "I should prefer hell to annihilation." The angels are well enough, but he would not be an angel. Angels have had no mothers to croon over them, by what he can make out; or fathers to romp with them and play games. They never fell in love when their time came, wondering over their rare fortune, or made homes where the children clung about their knees, or fought strong battles for the truth and the right, or wept over graves; angels, then, must be poor, where such a man is rich, or rich in some way he cannot as yet understand. He has solved the problem so far of his own personal identity, and would not have it re-solved into the grandest presence that ever trod the earth; these years with their clustering memories are his own years, they stand out clear and reveal to the man his own life. "A poor thing," he may say, "but mine own"; full of mistakes, but mine own. I want to keep track of myself; send me where you will, but let me be sure that I am still the man who is now living this human life as those are who have lived human lives with me. "The kind, the true, the brave, the sweet, who walk with us no more," they will be there in the life to come, not unclothed, but clothed upon; and then I shall rest in hope, for—

It is the dear belief

That on some solemn shore

Beyond the reach of grief

We find our own once more.

Beyond the sphere of time,

And sense and fate's control;

Serene in changeless prime,

Dwells the immortal soul.

This faith I fain would keep,

This hope would not forego.

Eternal be the sleep,

If not to waken so.

There must be another life to round this out and clothe it with perfection. The tree in my garden loses nine blossoms where it ripens one globe of fruit, but that does not trouble my tree. The wild things let their young go forth and they are presently forgotten. The flocks and herds are kith and kin, but one is taken and another left, and to-morrow it is all the same. They do not regret their mistakes or sorrow for their sins as I must, their life rounds itself out, and is complete when they die. The insect of an afternoon, the creature of a hundred years, they have no hauntings of a life before, or visions of a life hereafter. But the blossoms fall from the trees of my life, the yearlings die out of my flock, old friends are taken and I am left, those dear to me as my life, or dearer, and I cannot prevent this longing after them, because they are part of myself, and I am only as shards and shreds of the whole fair circle my soul demands, if being mine here, they are not mine hereafter.

And in looking into my own life, I can see where I have missed my way and want to try again. I am only a learner, I want still to learn, and turn my lesson to some noble use, so what can this incompleteness mean which haunts me but the intimation of completeness? This claim, as it seems to me, is founded in fair reason, and we hold the right to see the account come out fair and true on this ground, if on no other. These searching sorrows and regrets are the vouchers for it, and their long enduring is the promise that they will hold good. While this pure love for the life we live down here, great and noble in a true proportion of its worth to the world, with the unslain desire, that what we gain in this life shall not be lost when we have done with these bodies—what is all this, though there were no surer word about it, but the hold of the human soul on her own, now and for ever?

May I not say once more that the years, as they come and go, should bring the heart to understand that this we call death should not be thought of—and especially by those who, like myself, have had a long lease of life—as a bane but a blessing—and not to die would be the bane no man could bear; while so surely would this world be the loser by our staying, that those who love us most dearly would pray that we might be set free from the burden of the over many years.

For it would make no matter to the creatures of the lower creation we have glanced at, if their life could run on for ever in the old kindly grooves, because they must measure their life by their instincts, and the present moment is the perfect sphere; they want no better, as they fear no worse, and take no thought for the morrow, but the thing, the squirrel his nuts, and the bee his honey, and so through all the spheres of their life.

For as Chaucer's birds sang while his pilgrims rode to Canterbury, so they were singing when I walked with my friend a few years ago over the same grass-grown road by Guildford; and the swallows that built their nests then on the coigns of the grand cathedral had built that spring by the altars of the Lord; while the brood of last year was forgotten, the brood of this year was their first-born, and there are no grand-children for them in the woods, or the meadows, or golden or silver weddings. Therefore it would be no trouble to them if their life could go on through the ages, as it goes through their brief span.

But here lies the distinction between our life and theirs: where they have instincts, we have memories; where they have habits, we have outlooks and inlooks, anticipations and reflections, and our manhood, on the line to which we have risen, holds in its heart our cross and our crown.

The glamour of youth is mine no more, when the years have told their tale; yet I may remember the May days with a most tender regret, and long for my spring as I sit on the snow line. Yet I know, or ought to know, that this I long for could not be the May I remember, because memory would rob me of her choicest charm, and the succession of sameness would blight the blossoms before they could set the fruit; and so on this ground I can be aware in some dim fashion why the eternal love should give me the blessed boon of death, when I have drunk my fill at the fountains of life down here, and it is time to cross the bar.

And then I must take this truth home to my heart, that, by the time I have had enough of life, the world I live in now may have had enough of me, so that I must not only get out of the world, but out of the way, so that the new man may have room for the work he must do, free from my jeremiads, that the new time cannot hold a candle to the time when I was young.

Because I take this to be the truth with a few noble exceptions, that the elder world does not take over kindly to the younger, with its swift onward movement, and so the time comes when we may say with a wise and good man of the last age, "I am receptive no more as I was in my youth to the new life all about me or the new thought; I have hardened down slowly to the man I must be now to the end of the chapter."

So the time comes to the most of us, when we begin to trace the truth of the new time by the lines of longitude and forget the lines of latitude; we do not believe in the new man from the Lord, but want the old man and manhood that will be true to our line of measurement.

So Morse held the string of the kite which fell from Franklin's hand, but I have to wonder whether even that great domed brain would have given a warm welcome, if he could have lived, to the man of the new time, and good old Sir Humphrey Davy would have fellowship with young Michael Faraday, or any physician in England over forty years of age accept Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood?

I knew a very noble old man in the ministry, whose son also became a minister, and whose soul was taken captive by the truth born of the new time. Well, he loved the lad as he loved his own life, but the best the old man could say, when he found the young man was drifting, was "I do not believe in his teaching, but I believe in him." He could not believe in the lines of latitude, only in those of longitude. He wanted his boy to be, what we call "a chip off the old block." He would have the old wine in the old bottles, and the more cobwebs on them the better the wine, and yet forty or fifty years before, he himself was a pioneer of the ever new truth.

So I think the time comes for the most of us, when we cease to learn and begin to forget how it was with us so long ago, when, it may be, we stood well to the front as he did, the good old man, and can believe in or welcome no more the incoming truth and life fresh from on high, until we go hence and drink of the new wine of the kingdom.

And, again, is not this true, that as we grow old the knowledge of the evil which is in the world begins to lie like lead on us, while the knowledge of the good can hardly hold its own?

I may deal with nine men who are honest and true as the day, but the tenth man may take me in. Well, I lose more grace by that one man than I gain by the nine, think more of the bitter than the sweet, brood over the cruelty and forget the mercy, write the word rogue with a pen of iron on the rock of my memory, and let the others go down the wind. Grow, it may be, a little harder and alert to suspect rather than to believe in my human kind, lose track of the generous and the trustful heart, and call the thing which has usurped its place "wisdom."

And so, if this could go on and on, where should we land? So well might the good Bishop Hugo say 700 years ago, when one bemoaned his death as an evil, "An evil, sayest thou? nay, but I warrant thee, it would be a greater evil to live."

Therefore, as the years steal on, I love to muse over this mystery of the life that now is and of that which is to come; to thank God for this we have, so full of worth if we are worthy; and then, as I wonder over that which is to come, I turn to my gospels and listen to the master and divine seer who held it all in his heart.

And while I must say, with the great apostle, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," I would hold on well to the faith that I shall be myself when I pass from the shadows of the seen and temporal into the light of the unseen and eternal.

I shall pass out of one room in the many mansions into another, and what treasure in the heavens was mine here, will be mine there, while that which is to come will not seem so much another life as the ripeness and perfecting of this life that now is.

"Free from the fickle and the frail,

With gathered powers yet the same." Even as that which befalls the corn of wheat, which "except it die abideth alone, but if it die bringeth forth much fruit," is not annihilation but transfiguration, in Paul's happy figure.

A wise man says, "To lose faith in the immortal life is to paralyse the life that now is, and to sap the springs of our deepest love;" but this is my faith that the passing, over which I may brood with a touch of dismay while the springs of life run strong and full, will not wrest me, will not wrest you, out of ourselves and land us strangers in a life in no wise of kin to this.

We may say we know nothing about the mystery of the life beyond, but this is not true if we believe in him who brought life and immortality to light.

We know enough to keep the heart from trouble, and this is what we need to know, for it was the heart's love which brought us here, that nursed us forth, bore with us, believed in us, hoped for us, and never failed, and that death cannot slay.

Let me sit down with some white patriarch, whose sun is setting, and whose life has fallen to the lowest ebb of the tide, and I will tell you what I should expect to find. I should expect to find the good old head was giving way, but not the heart. Has he done his day's work? he is tired now and has sat down to rest. Has he speculated, as we do, over the wonders and mysteries? he speculates no more, he is resting. Did passion clutch him once, and appetite? they are as the white ashes of burnt embers. Did he nourish some one ambition? it is no more to him now than when he began "to learn the use of I and me." Here where the head has been the main factor, it may be he is silent, there is no communion, but I turn and touch the heart strings and these vibrate and give forth the music.

"Do you remember the old home and the mother when you were a boy? And when you lost your heart to the one maiden in all the world? And how you made a home together and held it sacred through the years to your golden wedding, and those little graves? Are all these forgotten?"

No, no, the dim old eyes light up with the sweet and the bitter-sweet recollections. They are all there, peopling the silent chambers, and he forgets that he is weary as he sits there telling me what a royal life that was when the world was young, so many years ago!

And so I love to believe in—what shall I call it?—the solidarity of life here and hereafter. That I am to be myself whatever befalls—the myself I long to be, released from the body of this death, and to bear with me all that is best worth God's saving in my life down here. And not a flower has bloomed or a well sprung up for my blessing, or a bird sung, or a dear friend clasped hands with mine, or tears fallen or laughter rippled out of a pure joy—to be forgotten. I would be myself, and myself is this soul which has stored up the essence of all that shall be of an immortal worth since I lay a babe in the cradle so far away in time and space.

Jerome Carden going over into England more than 300 years ago says "The English seem to have no fear of death, but with kisses and salutations parents and children part. The dying say they depart into the immortal life, and there they shall await those they leave behind them, while each exhorts the other to hold him in memory, so cheerfully and without blenching they meet death. So should we, so would I with the faith in my heart of my dear old friend who sang:—

The ship may sink,
And I may drink
A hasty death in the bitter sea;
But all I leave
In the ocean grave
Can be clipped and spared and no loss to me.
What care I
Though falls the sky
And the shrivelling earth to a cinder turn,
The fires of doom
Can never consume
What never was made nor meant to burn.
Let go the breath,
There is no death
To the living soul, nor loss, nor harm;
Not of the clod
Is the life of God,
Let it mount as it will from form to form.

LETTERS FROM THE WEST. THE CANADIAN CHURCHES.

THIS letter is written from Niagara, about which let him write who can. A party of six of us arrived here yesterday (Sept. 9), and the most glorious weather imaginable showed off to perfection the most glorious of spectacles I can ever hope to see. But this is eminently a case for silence. Simpler matter for correspondence consists in the record of the visitation of our Canadian churches by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, Christopher J. Street, and myself, as representatives of the B. & F. U. A. Our method of working includes a joint meeting at each of the five available churches in the Dominion, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, and London, with separation for Sunday services. Thus we are all to see something of all, though we can individually only preach at a selection of the churches. The "mission," if I may call it such, began on September 1, when Mr. Bowie held the service at Toronto, and Mr. Street at Ottawa. (The writer was at Fairhaven, Mass., on that date, and at Toronto, September 8.) The attendance was about 80 at Ottawa, and more than double that number on each occasion at Toronto. On Wednesday, the 4th inst., we all met in a social way, at Toronto, a goodly company being present. Our addresses on, "Unitarianism in the Old Country," the "World-movement in Religion," and "What is left when Science and Criticism have done their Work," were attentively received, as they have been at the other places we have visited. The building at Toronto (in Jarvis-street) is commodious if not very conspicuous to the passer-by. The young minister, the Rev. R. J. Hutcheon, is evidently a scholar and a preacher, and the movement undoubtedly seems to be thriving now, after a period of trial some years ago. The Rev. J. T. Sunderland did excellent work, I believe, in helping the congregation out of its former difficulties, and Mr. Hutcheon is carrying forward the work very well indeed.

At Hamilton, the "Sheffield" (or is it the Birmingham?) of Canada, the church building is small, but new and usefully appointed, and here also we found a body of active people, including some with names very familiar at home. The congregation is clearly more of an industrial type than that at Toronto, but it seems to have great possibilities in this busy and ever growing centre. The minister is the Rev. W. Delos Smith, formerly (like the ministers at London, Ontario, and Ottawa) of the Methodist body; Toronto got its minister from the Presbyterians, and Montreal alone has a leader of Unitarian origin. At Hamilton our meeting (September 5) was reported in several papers, but the results of the pressman's efforts were more comic, I fear, than impressive. Mr. Street held two services here on Sunday (September 8), the church being well filled in the evening.

The London of Ontario, where Mr. Bowie preached last Sunday to about 80 persons, is a place of some forty to fifty thousand inhabitants, and we found here a congregation which, like the town itself, is far from being fully grown up. The Rev. Victor J. Gilpin came here about three years ago, and after much private seed-sowing on his part, organised services began in 1905. The congregation now meets in a spacious "Chapter House," originally intended to be part of a "Church of England" cathedral. Owing to change of plan the building, which has convenient rooms attached, came into the market, and property which cost £6,000 was acquired for a fifth of the sum by the American Unitarian Association, and is now held subject to repayment of the purchase money in fifteen annual instalments. Mr. Gilpin is a young man of striking physique and original mind, and appears to be supported by some vigorously intelligent friends. We were impressed with the look of the audience at Friday's meeting here, many present being sturdy colonists of long standing, who had worked their way out of orthodoxy by no small mental effort, probably with sacrifice.

For it is in Canada, as in the old country, very much. He who breaks away from the traditional way of thought and worship pays a price for his liberty. Presbyterians, of the Scotch type, abound, manifesting the stalwart and stern traits known to those who have lived, for instance, in Belfast. But Methodism appears to be the popular form of faith; while, as in the States, the Anglicans, self-styled "The Church," draw in many of those who would be somebody. Of course, the Roman Catholic element prevails more largely in Lower Canada, a region beyond our sphere of action. Unitarians, without being so much cold-shouldered, are as evidently beyond the pale here as in the motherland; and our churches mostly consist of those few who dare to be in religion, as well as in social and political life, pioneers of a new age.

It is very interesting, amid the countless tokens of kindly feeling, to note the many men and women, old and young, who crowd up to us after our addresses or sermons, to have a handshake and to inquire after one place or another at "home," as they affectionately call it. Eyes glisten and voices tremble a little at times as they tell where they met one of us, or some other minister there before; and we are charged with messages to friends across the ocean. The links that bind Canada to Great Britain are stronger than were ever drawn up on parchment. But this theme, like Niagara, is too big for a gossiping record like this.

Our party, which includes Mrs. and Miss Bowie, and Mr. H. B. Lawford, will be touching at Toronto, that fine city, again, for the last time, to-morrow (September 11), on our way down Lake Ontario, to Ottawa and Montreal, where meetings and services are to be held in due course. These will conclude our little tour, little in comparison with the whole of this marvellous country, but larger in its mileage than the length of Great Britain could easily afford. We can but hope, and we have some encouragement to believe, that brief as our visits have been or must be, they will prove of lasting interest to our brethren here. To us this interest is profound, and we are glad to know that a considerable number of our brother ministers will visit some of the cities on our plan, and will share the stimulus of contact with these founders of a Greater Britain, and a greater Unitarianism, beyond sea.

THE DOCTRINE OF MORAL FREEDOM.

SIR,—I wonder if it is good for us to argue so gravely about these little human wills of ours. And I wonder if there is so wide a gulf between Professor Upton and me as our letters seem to imply. If we both do really believe that the world is one and not a jumble of disconnected atoms or wills or creatures, we ought to be able to reach a hand to each other across that little borderland where freedom and fate seem to be at strife. But I suppose that sentence about the "whole force of the cosmic process" suggests a heresy which cannot be forgiven. Yet it was meant only to indicate what, in the ultimate analysis of thought, the idea of unity does seem to include; and was not proposed as a working hypothesis for the man who wished to live a moral life in the midst of temptation! Professor Upton belabours that unhappy sentence without mercy; and yet he has not shown how it is possible to sever any one finite act or choice from the whole cosmic process without breaking the unity. I think his doctrine is as much open to the charge of inconsistency as mine; only I am willing to admit the (apparent) inconsistency, and he, perhaps, is not. I am content to accept the full significance of faith in the unity of the whole, and yet acknowledge that in practical life we must act under a sense of freedom and moral responsibility. I admit the paradox, but I perceive that, to the finite intelligence, many problems of life and thought must, in their ultimate significance, lead up to a paradox which the intellect cannot solve. The only solution is in feeling, as I tried to indicate in the last paragraph of my former letter. Professor Upton thinks his view consistent, involving no paradox. To me it suggests something very like dualism. It places God within the human soul, and then sets up a conflict there—a conflict between God and the human creature at the centre of whose being He dwells! Surely if God is not on both sides of that conflict the unity is broken.

William James, to whom Professor Upton refers with approval, frankly gives up the unity, and plunges, not merely into dualism, but into pluralism. This is consistent, but, for me at least, it is impossible. It lands one in a world-chaos from which no rational idea of life can emerge.

After all, whatever our individual wills may be, and whatever the extent or the limits of their freedom, the poet was right: "Our wills are ours to make them Thine," and the still greater poet: "In His will is our peace." To that I believe we all must come, and do come, in the end.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AND RELIGIOUS LIBERALISM.

SIR,—The account of the ordination of Mr. Eric Davies, lately a student at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, as minister of Langharne Congregational Church, which in your last issue you extracted from one of the Welsh papers, is deserving of more than passing consideration on the part of your readers. It indicates an attitude of mind with which thousands of thoughtful people in this country are in accord, and which I am convinced is going to be that which will distinguish the Liberal Churches of the future from those that stand for dogmatism either of the orthodox or heterodox type. "Be it understood here," declared Mr. Davies, "that I do not confound Christianity with orthodoxy. Christianity, in my opinion, is a life, not a creed. I shall insist," he added, "on the right to think my own thoughts, and to say them as long as I am here. Though I am a Congregationalist I do not promise to labour one bit to make the men I shall meet Congregationalists. I shall devote myself to the enriching of human life in general, to making men men in the deepest sense of the term, and I shall leave it with them to choose their own denomination." Years ago, some few of us were trying our best to recommend this position to the members of another group of churches, whose trust-deeds were free, and out of whose midst we fondly imagined that a truly liberal religious movement might arise which would be capable of gathering to itself men and women of every shade of opinion who claimed the right to think and reflect for themselves upon theological matters. So far as that group of churches is concerned, my former hope is well-nigh quenched. I have come more and more to realise the profound truth of Dr. Martineau's statement that "the shifting of the centre, of gravity, during the last hundred years, from the Catholic principle to the Unitarian has been a reactionary movement, simply substituting a new orthodoxy for an old one." And I have come more and more to the persuasion that that "new orthodoxy" is gradually strangling the expression of the "Catholic principle" which once, in those churches, was predominant. Loud professions of religious liberalism on the one hand and hot zeal for sectarian propaganda on the other fill one with despair as week by week the wearisome story is repeated. But Mr. Eric Davies's bold stand, met, as we are informed it was, by the sympathetic response of his hearers, indicates how great an opportunity is opening out for the Congregational Churches, if they, or any considerable number of them, will but rise to the occasion. The Congregationalist Church, so Mr. Davies informs us, has "no fixed creed" to which its preachers are bound to subscribe, and there is room, he assures us, in its pulpits for "the expression of as many experiences and as many theologies as there are of prophets and theologians." It occupies, in that case, an unique position, and may yet do what apparently no other community in Christendom can do,—lead the way towards the realisation of that ideal which Dr. Martineau years ago taught us to cherish and inspired us to work for.

HELP FOR BERMONDSEY.

SIR,—May I be allowed to make an appeal for literature for our school and Institutional Church at Bermondsey, though your columns? I am anxious to form two clubs here—one for our senior scholars and one for the juniors. At present I am in need of up-to-date, illustrated magazines. These are essential for the purpose, and I shall be glad to receive large or small gifts of periodicals or magazines to place upon the tables, suitable for scholars of all ages. Our library also needs restocking, and gifts of new or second-hand books will be thankfully received.—Yours faithfully,

JESSE HIPPERSON.

I am not bound to make the world go round
But only to discover and to do,
With cheerful heart, the work that God

THE VAN MISSION.

AFTER leaving Rotherham, where No. 1 Van had a successful series of meetings, chronicled in these columns of last week, the next pitch was at Swinton. Here the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Oldham Road, Manchester, was Missioner, and four meetings were conducted by him. On each evening the maximum attendance was slightly above or slightly below 100, and on each occasion the best part of an hour was consumed in answering questions after the addresses. The Sunday meeting is reported as the most successful, a good impression evidently being left. Following Swinton, three meetings were held in the market place, Mexboro', Dr. Griffiths again being in charge of the proceedings. The attendance was similar to that at Swinton, nothing very great but quite enough to be worth while addressing. Numbers are really no indication of success, and it often happens that a comparatively small meeting is eminently satisfactory in the impression left.

Last week's report left No. 2 Van at Johnstone, Renfrewshire. The people readily responded to the invitation, and big crowds gave audience. The maximum attendance on the last evening reached 1,000, while the lowest number present was estimated at 500. It is pleasing to note that several of the sixpenny reprints were sold. The Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle, spoke for an hour and a half on the Future Life, and Mr. R. J. Hall, the Lay Missioner, occupied 40 minutes with explaining the Unitarian Affirmations. He reports that he heard on all sides of the stirring up of thought in the town, and he is confident that the meetings were successful. The next stopping place was the village of Barrhead, where three meetings were conducted. Mr. Mills gave addresses on our view of the Bible and Jesus, and Mr. Hall took as his theme the motto which emblazons the sides of all our Vans, "Truth, Liberty, and Religion," the Miraculous in Christianity, and Old Doctrines versus New Criticism. As many as 1,100 people were reached, and the interest shown was evidently very great. On the second night the Missioner came in for some heckling questions regarding forgiveness of sins and the nature of Jesus. Five reports of meetings at Paisley are to hand. The Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Norwich, was the Missioner. He had the satisfaction of conducting splendid meetings, five accounting for 3,600 persons. The site in the County Square was a good one. Each evening questions were freely put, on one occasion nearly an hour and a half being spent in replying to many inquiries. A party of friends from Ross-street, Glasgow, was present, and good singing has been the result. Great eagerness to obtain pamphlets was shown, and it was evident that the addresses struck home. Mr. R. J. Hall records his conviction that had the Van not to be removed nightly, there would have been still larger meetings. The questions came from Presbyterians, Agnostics, and Roman Catholics. Mr. J. Hall found that, as in England, there are three classes of men who need the help which we can give: (1) those who think that Christianity has been a failure, and is of no use to them; (2) those who cannot see beyond a few isolated verses of the Bible; and (3) those who, having left orthodoxy, are blindly groping after a religious faith.

No. 3 Van has been to Sidecup, Kent, where four meetings in perfect weather have been held at the corner of two of the streets, permission having been refused to stand on the village green, although the Clarion Van had recently been there. The Rev. Herbert McLachlan, M.A., B.D., of Leeds, was the missionary, and gave the principal addresses. The people were shy, standing afar off, the explanation of some being that it would be dangerous to their interests to be seen too near to heresy, the Church influence being considerable and bigoted. However, Mr. McLachlan's ringing voice travelled well, and reached all who came anywhere near. The attendance never reached 100, but there was always an intelligent audience of 50 present, and we had to be satisfied with small things where we expected great things. Lee did not disappoint us, for little was expected, we having again to try our luck at a street corner, which proved worse than Sidecup. Mr. Hugh Stannus kindly filled the breach caused by the illness of the minister who had promised to come on the first night, and Mr. E. W. Smith, of Twickenham, came over on the second and third night. The company was very small: in fact, never more than 45, and sometimes not more than 15 adults were present.

Leigh has been favoured with a visit from Van No. 4, four meetings taking place in the market, the Rev. R. S. Redfern, our local minister, undertaking the office of chairman on three occasions. The missionary for the first three nights was the Rev. Geo. A. Payne, of Knutsford, and in addition to the Chairman, the lay missionary, Mr. Charles Barker, delivered short addresses on each evening. The largest number present at any one time was 550 at the last meeting, 400 being the smallest maximum at any. Questions were put on every occasion. The local Unitarians have contributed well to the collection boxes, which is by no means a universal practice. The reports of the Clarion Van tell us that over £10 was collected in one week by Socialist sympathisers. If every Unitarian who came to the Van remembered to drop a penny into our boxes, the sum total gathered throughout the tour would compare very favourably with the actual sum contributed at present. The Rev. J. M. Whiteman very kindly came in response to a telegram. He had a splendid reception at Leigh, and answered the questions brilliantly, to use the word of Mr. Barker's report. On the 20th the Van moved to the market place, Tyldesley, where two meetings have been held, the first with the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, and the second with the Rev. W. McMullen as missionary. On each occasion upwards of 300 were present, and the audience never fell below 150. No meeting took place on the 22nd, it being impossible to get a speaker.

Owing to the same difficulty, the London Van will hold its last meeting this year on Saturday next at Bromley.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Blackpool.—We quote the following tribute to a man well known to many of our readers from the Blackpool Gazette News:—A great and deserved honour was paid to Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, J.P., of South Shore, on Saturday night, when a bronze bust of himself was presented to the Corporation by admirers and friends. The presentation, appropriately, took place in the Art Gallery, an institution in which Mr. Grundy has always shown deep interest, as testified by his handsome gift of a number of valuable pictures to form the nucleus of a permanent collection. This generosity has earned for him the warm appreciation and regard of the whole town. It is largely due to his encouragement also that the Blackpool Sketching Club is still in existence. In philanthropy, again, Mr. Grundy has displayed a kind heart, and by his unostentatious actions has done much to relieve the distress among the poor in our town. He is a subject worthy of honour. The bust, which is to be kept in the Art Gallery, is the work of a clever young artist, named Millard. It was exhibited at the Royal Academy exhibition this year, and has been spoken of very highly by eminent critics. The movement for securing the bust was initiated some time ago by Mr. Lawson Booth, an artist whose pictures are at present on exhibition in the Blackpool Gallery; and the ready response of admirers to the subscription list spoke eloquently of the esteem in which Mr. Grundy is held, not only in Blackpool, but in other parts of the country. There was a large gathering of people present when the bronze was handed over to the Mayor.

Chorley.—The harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last, with satisfactory results, both in attendance and also in collections. The congregation has decided to hold a sale of work at the end of October in order to clear off the debt on the schoolroom.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school anniversary was combined with the harvest festival on Sunday last. The singing was bright, and the chapel decorations were beautiful. The Rev. Jeffery Worthington preached at the morning and evening services; and Miss Emily Stewart, of Exeter, conducted that in the afternoon. A congregational tea party was held on Monday evening. All the proceedings were very successful.

Derby: Friar Gate Chapel.—In connection with this place of worship, harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, and proved extremely successful. The chapel had been tastefully decorated for the occasion, and presented a very pleasing appearance. The Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, pastor, preached morning and evening to large congregations. Special music, under the direction of Mr. S. Neville Cox, was rendered by the choir in an admirable manner. A children's service was held in the afternoon, the address being given by Mr. Greatorex. On Monday, a congregational reunion and social evening took place in the lower school-room under the presidency of the minister. There was a capital attendance of members and friends, and the evening's entertainment was acknowledged to be one of the most enjoyable that had taken place for some time past. An excellent programme of vocal and instrumental music had been arranged by Mr. Henry Jones, and gave general satisfaction. During the evening the opportunity was taken by the honorary treasurer of the chapel, Mr. W. D. Fritchley, to present a report and a financial statement in respect to the fund recently established for obtaining the requisite amount to liquidate a debt incurred a short time since in carrying out very necessary sanitary improvements &c., in connection with the chapel and schools. The sum required was something like £220, and, thanks to the generosity of members and friends, Mr. Fritchley was able to announce that the whole of the amount had been raised and the debt paid off, a substantial balance being carried forward. It should be mentioned that Mr. Charles Wiberley, who is now on a visit from South Africa, and shortly returns there, and Miss Piper, of Evesham, both very old members of the congregation, each subscribed £50, whilst the British and Foreign Unitarian Association made a grant of £20 to the fund. A hearty vote of thanks was, on the proposition of Mr. Buckland, seconded by Mr. G. Kitching, chairman of the trustees, and supported by Mr. J. Larratt passed to those who had so readily responded to the appeal for funds, and assisted in any way in raising the requisite amount, and this was carried with acclamation. Mr. Wiberley responded on behalf of the donors in an interesting speech, pointing out how delighted he was to be once more amongst his old and new friends at Friar Gate Chapel, and that his sympathy and support might always be counted upon for carrying on the work which so many present had at heart. The singing of the National Anthem brought a pleasant and enjoyable evening to a close.

Essex Church.—A Guild service for members, friends, and all well-wishers will take place to-morrow (Sunday) evening at Essex Church, when the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, President of the National Conference Guilds' Union, will speak of the help and object of the Guild movement.

Hale (Resignation).—The Rev. A. Leslie Smith, B.A., has resigned the ministry of Hale Chapel, to the general regret of the congregation and other friends.

Newport, Mon.—The recognition meetings in connection with the induction of the Rev. Arthur Golland, M.A., were held in the church on Monday last, the 23rd inst., the proceedings being of a most inspiring character throughout. In the afternoon a devotional service was held, conducted by the Rev. S. Burrows, who, for six months had charge of the work at Newport. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church, Kensington, with whom Mr. Golland has worked during the past two years. After tea, at which ladies of the congregation presided, a well-attended public meeting was held. Mr. W. Pritchard occupied the chair, and extended to the Rev. Arthur Golland a very cordial welcome on behalf of the congregation, and an assurance of their determination to support his efforts to extend the church's sphere of usefulness. The Rev. Geo. Critchley, B.A., then delivered a finely impressive address, and was followed by the Revs. S. Burrows (Hastings), F. Blount Mott (Cardiff), F. K. Freeston (London), M. Evans (Aberdare), J. Park Davies, B.D., and Mr. John Lewis, secretary of the South-east Wales Unitarian Society. The Rev. Arthur Golland, in replying, said that, although he knew they would not see eye to eye with all the churches in the town, he hoped they would not live by controversy. He trusted that all the churches in Newport would try sympathetically to understand one another. He recognised the weight of the responsibility which he had taken upon himself in becoming their pastor, and knew that it was no light task that lay before him, but he rejoiced in the prospect of working with his people. Two most gratifying features were the presence at the meetings of three ministers belonging to other denominations in the town, and the kindness of a large contingent from the Cardiff Church, who came over to show their goodwill. The meetings were marked by great earnestness and enthusiasm, and will long remain an inspiration to all who took part in them.

Plumstead.—The Unitarian Hall, Plumstead Common, presented a pretty appearance on Sunday last, decorated for the harvest festival. Services were held morning, afternoon, and evening. In the evening a cantata called "Seed-time and Harvest," by Myles Birkett Foster, was rendered very well by the choir, under the conductorship of Mr. J. P. Hicks, the choir-master. The choruses and solos were highly appreciated by the congregation, which was as large a one as had been seen in the church for many years, the hall being filled to overflowing. On the Monday following a very pleasant social meeting was held in the evening, instrumental and vocal music enlivening the spirit of fraternity that prevailed.

Poole.—The formal recognition of the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A., formerly of Bridport, as the minister of the Poole Unitarian Church, took place on Wednesday, September 18. The proceedings opened with a luncheon in the Temperance Hall at half-past one p.m. Mr. Bernard Belben presided over an attendance of about 40, the visitors including the Mayor (Alderman G. Curtis, J.P.), the Town Clerk

(Mr. C. Lisby), the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, B.A. (Bristol), Philip Wicksteed, M.A. (Reading), Edgar Fripp, B.A. (Clifton), T. R. Skemp (Southampton), C. E. Reed (Ringwood), C. C. Coe (Bournemouth), W. J. Coates, B.D. (Skinner-street Congregational), G. H. White (Congregational), Messrs. W. H. Scott (Bournemouth), P. D. Cleaver, Mrs. Conway (Ringwood), and Mrs. Donkin (Bournemouth). After the usual loyal toast had been honoured the Chairman briefly submitted that of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World Over." The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, whose name was coupled with the toast, responded. He thought that in all gatherings of the Southern Unitarian Association it was peculiarly fitting that that sentiment should meet with loyal acceptance. (Applause.) "The Health of the Visitors" was toasted from the chair, and Mr. Belben remarked that the presence of so many representatives of other denominations showed that prejudice was passing away, and their church was receiving the recognition it deserved. Mr. Belben also alluded with gratification to the presence of the Mayor and Town Clerk. The Mayor, in his response, expressed himself very pleased indeed to be there to join in welcoming Mr. Solly to Poole. He could not, he said, allow the opportunity to pass for the reason that he had known Mr. Solly for many years, had been upon the same committee educationally, and, like himself, Mr. Solly was a great temperance man; and therefore those two points alone would draw him (the Mayor) to meet him in a function like that or any other. (Applause.) He heartily joined in welcoming him to the old town of Poole. He wished Mr. Solly happiness and success in his ministry. Religiously, they were not quite eye to eye, but nevertheless he (the Mayor) gave to every man that liberty of conscience he took for himself. (Applause.) He might be considered to belong to the very old religious school, because he believed that every word in the Bible, from the first word in Genesis to the "Amen" in Revelation, was the inspired word of God, but he knew that some people did not go so far as that. Mr. Lisby and Revs. W. J. Coates and G. H. White also spoke. At three o'clock a recognition service was held in the Unitarian Church. The devotional part was conducted by the Revs. T. R. Skemp, C. C. Coe, C. E. Reed, and E. J. Wilkins, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford. This was followed by a tea in the Temperance Hall. A public meeting was held in the church at half-past six p.m. Alderman C. Carter, J.P., presided over a good attendance, amongst whom were the Mayor and Mayoress (Alderman and Mrs. G. Curtis). The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, expressed his gladness at the large attendance, and said he wanted Mr. Solly, after that meeting, to feel thoroughly at home and feel that he had done the right thing to come to Poole. He was glad to see the Mayor and Mayoress with them. His Worship, at the luncheon, said he could not see eye to eye with them, and, Alderman Carter continued, his presence there that night showed all the more his broad-mindedness and liberality of feeling. (Applause.) After a regretful reference to the absence of Mrs. Solly, who was unwell, Alderman Carter extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Solly. He had been told they were very fortunate to have Mr. Solly for their minister; that he would do very useful work, not only amongst the congregation, but in the town; and that he had been a tower of strength to them at Bridport in educational and temperance matters, and in everything that was calculated to improve the condition of the people. Mr. Solly, the Chairman continued, had come there at their unanimous invitation, and he was perfectly sure he might say on behalf of the congregation that they were determined to give him their unanimous support. And he did hope his coming there might be a blessing to that church and also to the town.—The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, who is brother-in-law to Mr. Solly, followed with an interesting address on "Personal Religion and Social Problems," and at the outset of his remarks testified to a knowledge of the Christian character of the new minister and of his great earnestness in religious and social work.—The Rev. C. C. Coe, president of the Southern Unitarian Association, then extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Solly, and spoke in high terms of his personality. Mr. Solly came there as a good scholar, a kindly friend, and a genial gentleman, one who for many years had done honourable work both

as a Christian minister and as a philanthropist. He congratulated him on having succeeded a long line of able ministers, and, before concluding, paid a warm tribute to the qualities of the former minister, the Rev. J. Burton, as to whom there were in that church kindly memories, greater and deeper than he (Mr. Burton) thought.—The Rev. H. Shaen Solly expressed deep thankfulness to all for the kindness shown him in so many ways. He spoke of the regret his wife felt at not being present that night, and warned his hearers that her indifferent health would probably prevent her from taking a very active part in the work. Proceeding, the Rev. gentleman outlined his ideal church, and spoke of what he hoped to do, and urged his congregation to do all in their power to build up that ideal.—An address on "The Leadership of Christ" was delivered by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, and the Rev. E. I. Fripp read a thoughtful and impressive paper answering the question, "Why go to Church?"

Ringwood.—The harvest festival services were held last Sunday. The chapel was very tastefully decorated, and presented a pretty appearance. A children's service was held in the afternoon, conducted by Rev. C. E. Reed. The lesson was read by Mrs. Cogan Conway, and an excellent address on "Weeds" was given by Miss Polden. The collections, which amounted to £2, were in aid of the Ringwood Nursing Home.

West Bromwich: Lodge road.—On Sunday last the choir festival was held in connection with the above church. In the afternoon a sacred concert was given, the feature of which was a number of organ and piano duets, played by Mr. C. W. Perkins (Birmingham City Organist) and Mr. Arthur Cooke (organist of Lodge-road Church). This was a somewhat novel departure from the usual routine of Sunday afternoon concerts, and that it was keenly appreciated was shown by the crowded state of the church. The performance of the duets was characterised by perfect technique on the part of both performers, and, in fact, the performance could scarcely be equalled and certainly not excelled. Mr. Perkins' organ solo was given in his customary masterly manner, but he was rather handicapped by the unsatisfactory instrument at his disposal, the soft passages being marred by the noisy action of the instrument. Mr. Arthur Cooke's rendering of the Liszt concerto was a specially brilliant performance, while Miss Amy Cooke sang delightfully the Bach Cantata for the first time in West Bromwich. The choir sang well, as they usually do, particularly distinguishing themselves in the morning and evening services by their spirited performance of Mr. Cooke's latest anthem, "The God of Abraham praise."

York: St. Saviourgate Chapel.—On Sunday, September 15, a congregational meeting was held here to consider the position. The Rev. Robert Henry Greaves, formerly of Highgate, has been with us nearly two years by mutual agreement, and it has become necessary to settle our future relations with him. This was soon done as, without discussion, and by an almost unanimous vote, his permanent appointment was made to the pulpit of our chapel. Mr. Greaves, who is nothing if not enthusiastic, is now working hard on the lines of Socialism and Independent Labour Partyism, and we are looking hopefully forward to the time when we can borrow money without paying interest, and when competition—now understood to be the death of trade and very objectionable to bad workmen—will be finally abolished. Meanwhile the chapel services are flourishing.

A READABLE WEEKLY.

"'PUBLIC OPINION' was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read," said Dr. W. R. Nicoll in the 'British Weekly.'"

PUBLIC OPINION.

Twopence Weekly.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

"PUBLIC OPINION" is eminently a readable paper. There is no padding in it. It is a paper which exists to put on record the ideas which men are thinking, and especially the ideas which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress as these are recorded in the world's books, papers, and magazines.

It is a paper specially suited for those who exert public influence—for "PUBLIC OPINION" does not reflect one side of life only—it seeks to cover all sides of thought and opinion.

It is the bare truth to say that there is no other paper published in Great Britain which every week contains such stimulus to thought, or such a vast amount of real information presented lucidly and in a readable type.

"PUBLIC OPINION" is published every Friday, and its price is Twopence. It has been in existence 47 years.

"PUBLIC OPINION" can be obtained from any newsagent or bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d. and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Boston Conference is now past, and accounts of most successful, interesting meetings are beginning to arrive from many friends. To those who are not well acquainted with the origin and work of this Conference we would commend Mr. Wendte's report, which, in spite of its length, we have felt it right to print nearly in full. We hope to print in a few weeks the papers read to the Conference by Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Rev. C. J. Street, and Rev. W. C. Bowie, but the amount of other Conference matter in our hands prevents their inclusion at present.

WE would draw the attention of our London readers to the welcome meeting to Rev. R. P. Farley, advertised in our columns for Tuesday evening next, at 8.15, in the Bell-street Mission, Edgware-road. Mr. Farley has done good work for the Liverpool District Association since he left Manchester College four years ago. He is a keen student of social problems, and he will be, it is confidently believed, a true friend and minister to the poor. Subscribers and friends of the London Domestic Mission Society are cordially invited to the meeting.

THE Martineau Memorial, Norwich, is rapidly approaching completion, and the date of opening has been fixed for November 14, when Sir John Brunner has kindly consented to preside. A statement as to the fund and particulars as to the opening will be given next week. In the meantime those friends who intend to be present are asked to note the date.

THE Church Congress has been holding its meetings this week at Yarmouth under the Presidency of the Bishop of Norwich. The Congress sermon was preached by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and dealt especially with two dangers in modern religious life, both of which he described as "taking the name of the Lord thy God in vain." The first danger is, under the guise of liberal sentiment, not standing firmly for what we feel to be God's will, and the second danger is that of identifying God's will with our own, and, under the guise of religious zeal, exalting our own likes and dislikes into eternal principles. The action of so many Churchmen in treating marriage with a deceased wife's sister as a matter of tremendous moral importance is a striking illustration of this danger of identifying our own opinions of what is undesirable with God's laws. Needless to say, the Archbishop did not use this illustration.

THE Bishop of Norwich dealt in his Presidential address with the question of Disestablishment. From the point of view of the Church he seemed to think that on the whole it might have a beneficial effect, but he deprecated it as a bad thing for the nation. Sir Edward Russell followed with a very vigorous and able plea for Disestablishment, on the ground that "the Church is becoming more and more a sect." Self-government would bring new strength and hope, and would save her from capture by the High Church Party. He condemned the utterly inadequate training of Anglican curates, and compared it with that given by Roman Catholics and Nonconformists. Of Anglican colleges he said, "if laymen may judge them by their fruits, they are much more productive of sacerdotal silliness than of competent theological or clerical acquirements." It is very much to the credit of the Church Congress that it allows such outspoken criticism. It is curious that Disestablishment should have become so live an issue within the Church, while amongst Nonconformists it seems less talked of and desired than it was forty years ago.

THE Bishop of Liverpool received an ovation from the Baptist Union on his appearance at the Autumnal Assembly on Tuesday. He said he was there because it had been represented to him that his presence among them on that occasion might be a gain to their common Christianity. He was there to try to show the existence of a common love. They had their differences, but in the fundamentals of religion he believed they were one. The education controversy had been thought to prove the non-existence of a common Christian agreement, but none the less he believed it existed. He had had much to do with other communions, and he had always rejoiced to know how much they had in common. The points on which they disagreed might be great, but those on which they agreed were far greater.

A REMARKABLE scene was then enacted. On the invitation of the President, the Assembly rose and recited the Apostles' Creed after the Bishop. We notice that the Church Congress also opened its proceedings by a recitation of the same creed; but, though the local President of the National Free Church Council was present, he was not invited to lead it.

THE President of the Baptist Union (Principal W. J. Henderson) took for his Address the subject, "Personal Value and Personal Ministry." It was just what a leader's address should be, a rallying cry to the rank and file to buckle on their armour and prove themselves worthy of their cause. He showed them from what a little beginning they had grown. Days there were when they were poor and despised, and a king had threatened to harry them out of the land. A very small fleet of Mayflowers could have conveyed them from these shores. But those days were gone. They had come to count in the councils of the nation. They had grown strong in numbers, and even in material wealth, though, as the President remarked amid laughter, their contribution to the ranks of paupers, prisoners, and peers was remarkably small. Of course they had had leakages, but, said the President, "pitiable is the rich man who goes over from us to the Establishment without apparent change of conviction, and without distress of heart." He emphasised the need for every man to contribute something to the common store, and insisted that every wealthy person ought to earn his keep, and, if the keep were luxurious, a service to match it should be rendered to the community.

IN his inaugural address at Bradford, the new Principal of Yorkshire Independent College, the Rev. E. Griffith-Jones, made some shrewd and vigorous remarks. Taking as his subject, "College Training and the Ministry of To-day," he spoke of the hearer which the modern preacher had to face as distracted, pre-occupied, and hurried, who came to church physically and mentally fatigued. As for the preachers, they needed to be of the best material. But some of the best men were kept back from entering the ministry. Why? One reason he assigned was this: "The shameful way in which many ministers are treated by some churches acts as a deterrent. Young men of gifts, and even of goodness, seeing these things, often quail from the possibility of being similarly treated, and they prefer to serve God in a secular calling to being bullied by pious ignoramuses, or starved by purse-proud seatholders, or silenced by wealthy hearers whose vested interests are interlocked with some social evil, and who will not suffer these evils to be denounced." As to the theology which they were to teach, he did not believe either in a school of new theology or of old theology. They must send out men who would think for themselves, evolving their own systems.

THE West London Mission, founded twenty years ago by the late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, is not to be allowed to languish. An enthusiastic welcome has been given to the new superintendent, the Rev. J. Ernest Rattenbury, late of Nottingham. Since leaving St. James's Hall the Mission has led a somewhat chequered existence, having been successively domiciled at Exeter Hall, Hengler's Circus, and Craven Hall. It is now settled at Kingsway Hall, and the trustees have secured a valuable site, involving an expenditure of £40,000, in order to develop the property in such a manner as to make it a great central institution for religious work. Sir John Bamford Slack presided at Mr. Rattenbury's welcome, and was supported by Dr. Waller, Dr. Pope, and other prominent Methodists and Free Churchmen. Mr. Rattenbury, in his reply, expressed his great indebtedness to the late Hugh Price Hughes, who had been so powerful an inspiration to him. He also avowed himself a Socialist, expressed strong sympathy with the labour movement, and identified the Gospel of Jesus Christ with the amelioration of the lot of the common people.

THE Rev. Dr. W. J. Townsend, who is seventy-two years of age, has been elected President of next year's United Methodist Conference. Inasmuch as no one has worked more persistently than Dr. Townsend in the cause of Methodist Union, the honour is well placed. He is a minister of what was, until recently, known as the Methodist New Connexion, of whose conference he was President in 1884. Dr. Townsend is also a past-president of the National Free Church Council, in which connection, it is interesting to record, that the president for next year is also a member of the United Methodist Church—Dr. Brook, of Southport, having been nominated in place of the late Dr. John Watson.

WESLEYAN Methodists are again deploring that figures do not point as favourably as they could wish in the direction of progress. According to the Methodist Times the year's Sunday-school statistics are puzzling and unsatisfactory. Everywhere are signs of decrease. "There are 12,572 fewer scholars in our schools now than this time last year; 7,701 less attend the afternoon school, and 2,656 fewer attend the morning school. The same dismal story is told of the teachers; there are 623 fewer teachers. It is noteworthy that the great shrinkage among the scholars is among those between seven and fifteen, who supply considerably more than half the total decrease. This is the first time for six years that a decrease has been reported; but when we consider that last year the number of Sunday-schools increased by nineteen, and that during the last six years a very large addition to our Sunday-school premises has been made, it is not reassuring to find that only 35,762 more scholars have been obtained during that period." The report, however, announces some compensation in the increase of Brotherhood and P.S.A. attendance. Adult Bible classes show a shrinkage.

THE financial results of provincial municipal trading are tabulated in a Blue Book recently issued by the Local Government Board. In England and Wales, excluding London, £898,742 was transferred from the profits of municipal undertakings to the relief of the local rates in 1904-05. On the other hand, a loss of £242,472 was made during the same period in certain districts. The gains, therefore, were £656,270 more than the losses. The greater part of the losses were incurred over waterworks, and a plentiful supply of good water is of such essential importance to health that this branch of municipal activity is not usually undertaken with a definite view to profit. The losses on waterworks amount to £153,998. They include several expensive, perhaps extravagantly expensive, undertakings planned with a view to providing for the increasing needs of a growing population. The Birmingham Corporation alone shows a loss of £45,000. Together with the money profit to the ratepayer from municipal ownership of gas and electric light works, tramways, &c., there has usually been increased efficiency, lower charges, and more satisfactory terms for employees.

LETCHWORTH Garden City is the home of experiment in the improvement of social life. One of the latest projects which is likely to be realised there is an effort to reduce the servant difficulty by providing meals in common or from a common kitchen for a group of houses. Mr. Ebenezer Howard and Mr. H. Clapham Lauder, A.R.I.B.A., are the originators of this scheme of "co-operative house-keeping." They propose that houses should be built on three sides of a square and part of a fourth, like a college quadrangle, together with a common dining-hall and sleeping accommodation for the domestic staff in a building which shall be connected with the houses by a small cloister or verandah. Each house is to be separate from the others. Meals might be served in the separate houses for a small extra payment, and other services obtainable through the administrative department at a small charge by the hour. Four types of houses are to be built, varying in rental from £20 to £45 a year.

THE promoters of the scheme, which is to be carried out by a limited liability company on a co-operative basis, consider that they will not only relieve mistresses of troubles in regard to servants, but will make domestic service more popular, as by such an organisation of their work as is proposed they will mostly be free in the evening, and take turns in attending to such duties as require attention at that time. Also, they will be less lonely. They will have companionship such as now makes employment in hotels and boarding-houses more attractive to them than that of the maid-of-all-work in a small household, but under better conditions than are usually obtainable. The attempt to reduce household cares without adding to expense or abolishing the separate home will certainly be watched with interest by many.

WHILE housing reformers are hopefully looking forward to the Government measure which is promised, giving power to local authorities to plan out the districts into which suburbs are extending, and to require conformity with their plans on the part of builders and landowners, voluntary associations are doing much to show what is the gain of such a method. Co-partnership Tenants Societies are actively at work in no less than nine towns and districts developing estates more or less on Garden City lines, and a tenth is being formed at Warrington. The root idea of the Tenants Companies is, however, the ownership of the houses by the tenants collectively and their sharing in the management of the estate as shareholders. The tenant does not own his own house, but obtains an increasing number of shares in the whole estate. Capital is obtained to begin with in the form of Loan Stock bearing fixed interest at 4 per cent. and shares with a maximum dividend of 5 per cent. Beyond this all profits are divided among the tenants in the form of interest-bearing shares, which can be transferred if the tenant should leave the estate. The residents, therefore, have much in common, and there is every incentive to take care of the property, and to develop it and maintain it for the good of those who dwell upon it. Co-partnership Tenants (Ltd.), 6, Bloomsbury-square, London, has been formed and registered to further the practical development of schemes on these lines throughout the country.

THE general anxiety which has arisen, in view of the strained relations between the English railway companies and their men, gives special piquancy to some of the facts disclosed in a recent Blue Book on Irish Railways. It appears that in 1844, an Act of Parliament was passed providing for the State acquisition of railways built after that date. After 21 years, the State was empowered to acquire any railway, on 3 months' notice, at twenty-five years' purchase of the annual divisible profits, provided that, if the dividend were less than 10 per cent., the price should be fixed by arbitration. Mr. W. Field, M.P., has shown in his evidence that State ownership in Ireland was contemplated from the first. The pioneer railway was opened in 1836, and two years later a Commission reported in favour of State-construction in the future, and its report was adopted by resolution the following year in the House of Commons. Irish railways are now partially controlled by the Great English companies, but Mr. Field believes that the time has arrived for their nationalisation, a belief apparently shared by Lord Brassey.

THE International Peace Congress was held this year at Munich, the total number of delegates being about 320, only a few of whom appear to have belonged to the category of "public persons." According to the report of its proceedings in last week's Friend, it appears to have been largely occupied in considering and commenting upon the work of the second Hague Conference. There was a general feeling of disappointment that its labours had so far been largely devoted to the impossible task of "humanising and regulating" war, instead of attempting its suppression; and a letter to this effect was forwarded to the delegates at the Hague, representing to them the very grave responsibility that must attach to their Governments, if the Conference should not "reach decisive results," in harmony with the present demands of "humanity and universal conscience." The letter further spoke of the desire that a "general permanent treaty of arbitration as complete as possible" might result from the Conference, to be supplemented by such a scheme of mediation, for matters falling outside the field of obligatory arbitration, as would necessarily commend itself to disputing parties.

AN important resolution was adopted on the proposition of M. Jacques Dumas, intended to support the motion of Sir Edward Fry at the Hague, by appointing an international committee to seek the most practical method of the limitation of armaments, and to popularise such method when found. The Congress dissociated itself by an almost unanimous vote from the anti-militarist movement in France and elsewhere, declaring that "pacifism"—the policy of the Peace Congress—is entirely independent of the anti-patriotic movement, and is opposed to the class-war. It seeks "the means of suppressing war, establishing an era without violence and settling all international difficulties by just methods par le droit." Other resolutions were adopted favouring the protection of "minor" populations, and against the European conquest of Morocco.

THE new Folketshus, or People's Palace, of Christiania, which cost about £30,000, and is built around a central court capable of being covered in for mass meetings, appears to have been the scene of the recent interesting Scandinavian Socialist Congress. The proceedings were of a much less dramatic but more immediately practical character than those at Stuttgart. The Conference was congratulated on the action of Northern Socialists in counteracting the war-spirit which so recently threatened to embroil Norway and Sweden, on the close bonds existing between Trade Unionism and the political movement, and on the electoral position of women in Finland. The discussions turned principally on such practical matters as co-operation, the collection of statistics, shorter hours, temperance, and education.

RABBI, MESSIAH, MARTYR.*

THERE would be greater pleasure in commending this admirable little book if the author of it were yet alive to hear its praises. It is, in a sense, the natural outcome of his larger work, "Tent and Testament," which appeared last year. The first-hand acquaintance with the Holy Land acquired in the journey therein described is turned to the best account in giving graphic clearness to the story of the life of Jesus. Mr. Rix was not the first to write a "Life of Christ," nor the first to explore the sites of the Gospel narrative. But he has succeeded in doing what very few of his predecessors have done, so far as I am aware. He has given the facts of the story in their natural connection as incidents in the life of a young Jewish carpenter, and he has wisely left out all the critical discussions which are needed to establish those facts. He gives the results, not the processes, of his own close study of the criticism of the Gospels. And in doing so he has supplied a want which many readers must have felt who have not had the training needed to grapple with one of the great "Lives of Christ." They want to know what is the outcome of all that bewildering series of learned arguments? What is left of the real Jesus at the end of it? They want the story of his life told as the story of a real man, amidst the natural conditions and social intercourse proper to the time. Mr. Rix has given them just that. Renan attempted to present the human Jesus apart from theological preconceptions; but Renan lacked the first essential for his task—sympathetic reverence for Jesus himself. There was too much of Renan in the "Vie de Jésus." Mr. Rix's book is in striking contrast to its pretentious forerunner. It is written with perfect simplicity and reverent sympathy, and without any straining after effect. One would have thought it well nigh impossible to write of Jesus without being influenced by the knowledge of the subsequent developments of theological speculation about him. But Mr. Rix has succeeded in doing this to a wonderful extent. He has told the story as it might have been told by some contemporary, only as a narrative and not as an apologia. The reader finishes the book with the thought that now he knows, on the whole, how the facts really stand in regard to that life; and he sees them, not as isolated facts, but combined into a harmonious series. They do not reveal the whole of what Jesus was. But they do serve as the outward frame in which to set the figure of Jesus, such as we discern him to have been through our own study of the Gospel. Whether in all respects the lines of Mr. Rix's sketch are correctly drawn is a question on which opinions will differ; but not to an extent which can seriously lessen the value of the whole. As a whole it is extremely good, and ought to be read and studied by every one. For no one will care to admit that he takes no interest in the subject of it. May it be of such benefit as its author would most have wished.

* "Rabbi, Messiah, Martyr." A Modern Picture of the Story of Jesus. By Herbert Rix. (London: P. Green. 1907. 1s. net.)

TO BOSTON FOR THE CONGRESS OF RELIGIOUS LIBERALS.

To tell of a first voyage across the Atlantic in these days of constant travel may seem to promise too little of general interest to make it worth while. But one who is charged with the duty of sending to the INQUIRER a record of the International week in Boston may, perhaps, be allowed to tell the story from the beginning. He has also a special interest in this connection which he would like to chronicle. For eleven years he had formerly the privilege of being minister of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, in Liverpool, and when, on September 11, he sailed for Boston by the White Star s.s. Republic, he could not forget how, 272 years ago, the first minister of the Ancient Chapel, Richard Mather, also sailed for Boston, not indeed from Liverpool but from Bristol; and under what different conditions he made the great adventure of those days across the ocean.

For ten weeks Richard Mather's voyage lasted in the summer of 1635, with delays in the Bristol Channel; first of all from contrary winds and other causes, and then, seven weeks out of sight of land, and a final week along the American coast, with the one great storm they met, before Boston was reached—ten weeks, as it had been also with the Pilgrim Fathers fifteen years before, when they sailed from Plymouth, and there was as yet no Boston, and they had to make for themselves a new Plymouth on the distant shore.

"It was very delightful," Mather wrote in his account of the voyage, "while we took pleasure and instruction in beholding the works and wonders of the Almighty in the deep; the sea being sometimes rough with mighty mountains and deep valleys, sometimes being plain and smooth like a level meadow, and sometimes painted with a variety of yellow weeds. Besides it was a pleasant thing to behold the variety of fowls and mighty fishes, swimming and living in the waters." And again: "It was comfortable to us, by means of the fellowship of divers godly Christians in the ship, and by means of our constant serving God morning and evening every day."

The great storm came upon them when they were nearing the end of their voyage, and, not far from Cape Ann, were in great danger from the rocky coast. They lost their three anchors and cables, their sails were rent in pieces, "as if they had been but rotten rags," and they seemed to be driving straight on a great rock that stood up above the waters. But, happily, though they had lost all control of their ship, they escaped the peril of the rocks. The storm abated; they had leisure to fit the ship with other sails and so proceeded on their way.

Reading the narrative of such a voyage one realises how immense has been the advance of recent years in the command of the deep. We met, indeed, no storm in our seven and a half days across the Atlantic; but the sea was by no means always "like a level meadow," and on the upper deck sometimes it was not easy to stand against the wind. But through it all the great ship ploughed her way, driven, in spite of wind and rain, in a straight course by the resistless power of steam; and for the Republic it must be said that she is a splendidly steady boat. It was Wednesday evening (September 11) that we slowly made our way down the river from Liverpool, and cautiously, as it seemed (for perhaps there was not too much water), crossed the bar. The night was hazy, and we saw nothing of the Welsh coast, but next day, soon after seven in the early morning, the fog lifted, and there was Ireland close at hand. It was a glorious sunny morning, and the sail along the Irish coast, with a long call at Queenstown, anchored at the entrance to the bay, was delightful. By five o'clock that evening land was practically out of sight, and for six days we hardly saw even a sail, and seemed to have the ocean to ourselves. Marvellous it was to be in the midst of that great expanse of waters, and day by day to see our course steadily traced on the chart, as we drew nearer and nearer to America. The sea was our great companion, sometimes brilliant with a glorious depth of blue, like the sky overhead, yet nearer still, but filled with motions of delight; at others times, in a less joyous mood, with a dull grey; but even then, as on Sunday morning, when the clinging mist was all about, which soon turned to rain, for a few moments the sun broke through, and there was a vision of the moving waters and a long line of light through the parted shroud, which made that day also memorable. And the nights also, though there were times of mist and rain, had the growing splendour of the moon, which had come almost to the full when we reached Boston. Our last day at sea was the most beautiful of all, and the night also. That morning (Wednesday, September 18) on the sunny sea, far away on the horizon we saw the gleam of white sails, fishing boats most likely which we knew had put off from the American coast; and the day before, when the sea had a lovely hue of soft green, we had been told that we were crossing the Newfoundland banks. The day was perfect, and the sun went down clean into the sea; then the soft light deepened into an orange glow with a marvellous effect—the horizon seemed absolutely clear, and the sea, deepening in blue to meet the glow, was very peaceful. Later, with the darkening sky, came the moon and a perfect glory of mystic light.

That night we were told that we should be in Boston in good time next day, (Thursday, September 19), and so it proved. The sun rose out of the sea into a cloudless sky, just before half-past five, and as we turned from that glory in the fresh, keen morning air, and looked northward over the placid sea, there was land at last, a long low line, which soon grew nearer, and with a good glass showed human dwellings, and promise of the city of our hope. To the left, also, as we looked forward, there was more land, and we knew that Boston lay in between, though still far out of sight. And there, flitting past in the quiet morning, and settling for a moment in the rigging, was a little land bird, such as Richard Mather also saw as his vessel drew near the coast—a little land bird, "with blue-coloured feathers about the bigness of a sparrow." Fortune favoured us in that hour, and brought our memories of the sea still nearer to those of the old Puritan, for then, also, close at hand, we saw for the first time a whale, the unmistakable spouting, followed by the great dark form rising for a moment out of the sea. All this time the coast was drawing nearer and nearer, and those to whom it meant home recognised with delight one after another of the familiar points of Boston Bay. For us it had the fascination of approach to a new country, but as we came actually into Boston Harbour on that Thursday morning, the early promise of the day was gone, and the city was shrouded, so that we could not see the dome of the State House as we passed along and turned to our mooring at the Charlestown Wharf. But even the aggravation of two and a half mortal hours spent amid the senseless toils of Custom-house officials was soon forgotten, when we found ourselves actually in Boston, and clasping hands of cordial welcome at the Association headquarters in Beacon-street.

When Richard Mather came to Boston in 1635 it was to a new country, to a city in its infancy; and he came as a man silenced by ecclesiastical authority, driven from his ministry at the Ancient Chapel to seek across the Atlantic liberty of conscience that he might minister freely of the things of God. Though he had been to Oxford, and as a young man submitted to ordination by the Bishop of Chester, that act had become to him a matter of very serious regret. He was in the whole spirit of his life a Puritan Nonconformist, and one of the charges against him was that throughout his ministry at Toxteth he had never once worn a surplice! He was a firm believer in "the Congregational way" in church order, and when he came to Boston he found himself at once in a thoroughly congenial atmosphere. The year after his landing he became minister of the church newly gathered in Dorchester, and there remained till his death in 1669. He held a position of much influence in the community. It was he who drafted the Cambridge Platform, which was a declaration of the congregational constitution of the churches of New England, and he had a hand with others in the production of the Old Bay Psalm Book. The father of Increase and the grandfather of Cotton Mather, he is a man of honoured memory, in which our churches both in the Old Country and in New England may gladly claim their share.

A successor of Richard Mather in the pulpit of the Ancient Chapel comes in these days to a very different Boston, but here also, as at Toxteth, he finds the church to which the old Puritan ministered now in the Unitarian fellowship. It will be his privilege to preach (September 29) in the First Church in Dorchester. The Boston to which delegates from many lands have come to the International Congress of Religious Liberals is for us a city of many thronging memories, somewhat bewildering in these first days. Here on a fine site, next to the State House and close by Boston Common, is the fine building of the American Unitarian Association, the headquarters also of the International. Close at hand is King's Chapel, and the Old South Church, rich in historic associations, and a little further down in the crowded business quarter is the old State House, now an historic museum, while an inscription on the front of the building reminds us that "From the balcony was proclaimed the Repeal of the Stamp Act, 1766; the Declaration of Independence, 1776; Peace with England, 1783." Down the shaded walks of Boston Common, and across the beautiful Public Gardens, one comes at the furthest corner to the monument to Channing, erected in 1903, the bronze statue framed in a massive canopy of granite and marble, a longer inscription at the back, and in front, with the name and dates, the simple statement: "He preached with spiritual power, and led a great advance towards the Christian ideals. He breathed into theology a humane spirit and proclaimed anew the divinity of man." Across the road is the fine Arlington-street Church, the successor to the Federal-street Chapel, in which Channing preached. On either side of the pulpit are white marble monuments to him and to his colleague and successor, Dr. Gannett, and next to the Gannett monument the entrance from the church rooms is also framed in white marble as a memorial to Brooke Herford, with an inscription above, recording, with other dates, his ministry there from 1882-1892. Not much further out from the centre, and very near together, are both the First and Second Churches of Boston, the latter in Copley-square, where are also the new Old South Church (Dr. Gordon's) and Trinity Church, where Phillips Brooks ministered. On the roll of the ministers of the Second Church are Increase Mather, Henry Ware, and Emerson.

But these memories must not tempt us further now. The local committee has presented to all the members a splendid supply of literature, including a special edition of E. M. Bacon's "Guide to Boston," with an introductory chapter giving many interesting particulars of thirty-two Unitarian churches in Boston and the immediate vicinity. There is also a booklet of "Forty Portraits and Biographical Sketches" of present and past presidents of the International and other officers, readers of papers, and members of various grades of distinction, some of the portraits most excellent, one or two rather libellous; a very interesting collection of "Types of Unitarian Churches" in America, with illustrations; and an admirable series of portraits of "American Pioneers of Pure Religion and Perfect Liberty," with a characteristic passage from the writings of each of them, selected by the President, Dr. S. A. Eliot. Among these are Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Channing, Elias Hicks, Whittier, Lowell, Holmes, Emerson, Parker, and lastly Abraham Lincoln, with his well-known saying, as to the church he would join if only he could find it, with the sole qualification the acceptance of the Saviour's statement of both Law and Gospel, Love to God and Man. Among the other pamphlets were Channing's famous Baltimore sermon (1819) on "Unitarian Christianity," and Emerson's Divinity School address.

These notes are concluded late on Sunday evening (September 22), after a splendid opening meeting in Symphony Hall, which was crowded by an audience of at least 4,000 people, many hundreds being turned away. Of this we must tell next week, and only add here that it has been a very happy Sunday, full of sunshine, and many of the visitors from afar have been most ospitably welcomed to Boston pulpits. Mr. Tarrant preached at Arlington-street, Mr. Street at King's Chapel, Professor Réville at the First Church, Mr. Bowie at the Second Church, Miss von Petzold at Brighton, Mr. Webster at Roslindale, Mr. Hugenholtz (of Amsterdam), at Lexington, Mr. Jozan at Brookline, Mr. Felix Taylor at Jamaica Plain, the writer at Cambridge. Over forty pulpits were thus filled by visitors. Dr. Hunter was to preach at the famous Plymouth Church, New York.

These notes must seem rather belated, as they can only appear at least a week after the Congress will be over. Perhaps our readers may have at the same time the President's address, and the report of the Rev. C. W. Wendte, the devoted secretary of the International Council.

ROBERT COLLYER,

DOCTOR OF LETTERS.

We are indebted to the Yorkshire Post of September 27, and to Professor Phillips, who has kindly allowed us the use of the manuscript of his speech, for the following interesting account of the conferment of the Degree of Doctor on our reverend friend. The ceremony referred to took place on Thursday, September 26.

Dr. Robert Collyer, the veteran American preacher, whose return at the age of 84 years to the scenes of his boyhood in Yorkshire has revived the story of a remarkably varied and romantic career, was yesterday honoured by the University of Leeds with the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters. Thus, he will take back with him to the United States one more link in that complex chain of brotherhood, sympathy, youthful remembrances and sentiment which binds him to his native land. This home-coming of his has drawn from friends on this side a continuous flood of kindness and solicitude, prompted by curiously intermingled feelings—on the one hand, of patriotic attachment for a Yorkshireman who has risen from obscurity to renown along the noble path of learning; and, on the other hand, of respect and admiration for a man who has played an honourable rôle in life, and who still has a touching simplicity of character, bearing his honours with a modesty and personal charm that are quite refreshing. The function yesterday, though clothed in a good deal of formality, was yet full of human interest, and Dr. Collyer himself was deeply moved by its significance and meaning. Massive featured, with a head crowned with flowing white hair, and set off by a wide-brimmed scholastic hat, he had the appearance of a figure cut out from the patriarchs, and, in truth, his style and bearing had quite an old-world dignity about it.

The members of the Court, the Council, and the staff entered the Hall of the University in procession, wearing their picturesque robes. The Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Bodington) presided, and among others in attendance were the Pro-Chancellor (Mr. A. G. Lupton), the Lord Mayor (Mr. J. Hepworth), the Deputy Lord Mayor (Mr. Robert Armitage, M.P.), the Vicar of Leeds (Dr. Bickersteth), the Town Clerk (Mr. R. E. Fox), Alderman Sir John Ward, Alderman Kinder, Alderman Hepton, Alderman Lupton, Alderman Midgley, Alderman Pickersgill, and the Rev. C. Hargrove. The hall itself was filled with friends who attended out of a feeling of regard for Dr. Collyer's life and work.

A Sketch of his Career.

Professor W. R. Phillips, LL.M. (Dean of the Faculty of Arts), in presenting Mr. Collyer for the degree, spoke as follows:—

Mr. Vice-Chancellor,—Eighty-four years ago, Robert Collyer, who now stands before you, was born at Keighley, in this county of York. After having as a child toiled for twelve hours daily in a linen mill at Fruston, in 1838 he was apprenticed to a blacksmith in Ilkley, where for more than twelve years he worked at the forge. Not yet had descended upon the industrial world its modern malady in which the thinker cannot labour and the labourer cannot think, for seventy years ago Robert Collyer read divinity as he blew the bellows and saw from the smithy door not merely the circle of the moors but flammaria mœnia mundi, the flaming ramparts of the world. Theologian, blacksmith, and horse-doctor, one imagines that he was already saying with Manæchmus in the Latin comedy, Cogito utrum me dicam medicum ducere an fabrum.

In 1850 he emigrated to the United States. The members of Plato's Republic were to be taught that though they were all sprung from the earth, those of them who were fit for rule were born not all earth but partly gold, whilst in those who were fated to serve, instead of gold these were brass or iron. For a republic not that of Plato, Robert Collyer continued to work as a blacksmith for nine years, and then it was discovered that he was not of iron but of gold, and he was welcomed into the intellectual aristocracy of the nation.

Having become the minister of the Unity Church in Chicago and afterwards of the Church of the Messiah in New York, he became also the personal friend of Emerson and Longfellow, of Wendell Holmes and Hawthorne, and is amongst us now the solitary survivor of that group of men, who, an American citizen will forgive me saying, made the Victorian age as brilliant in the United States as it was brilliant in the United Kingdom.

It was not with Robert Collyer as with those who are so devout that they have no time to be religious, which to be, according to St. James, is to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep one's self unspotted from the world. The life of this man has been of untiring beneficence. Throughout the Civil War he was a member of the Sanitary Commission of the United States, and in that character he visited battlefields and hospitals, attended to the wounded and buried the dead, displayed a rare combination of administrative ability and personal charm, and received for his services the public thanks of the Government and the private benediction of thousands of sufferers.

To him, surrounded by the fierce activities of the New World, there often presented itself the picture of the village among the moors, and he became, with Mr. Horsfall Turner, the joint author of that excellent monograph, "Ilkley, Ancient and Modern," in which the slow and orderly development of a rural English community is made to illustrate the growth of the nation at large. He has written many other things, and he has spoken much and he has said and written nothing base, but he is about to receive from your hands a degree honoris causa because he is regarded by our kinsmen across the seas as a great power for righteousness.

Looking upon this venerable man, as I now present him to you, and remembering the long life which has led up to this moment, I say with the Psalmist, "What man is he that desireth life and loveth many days that he may see good? Keep thy tongue from evil and thy lips that they speak no guile."

I present Robert Collyer for the degree of Doctor of Letters.

The Vice-Chancellor then formally conferred the degree of Doctor of Letters, and expressed a desire that Dr. Collyer should give an address.

Dr. Collyer Recalls his Young Days.

Dr. Collyer, in returning thanks, said that when he first heard that the University intended to confer this degree upon him, he shrank from the prospect, because he felt that the degree of Doctor of Letters was one that should always be conferred upon men higher in the world of letters than he had ever hoped to be. The present moment was one which carried his mind back over the eighty-four years of his life. "That life of mine in the factory," he continued, "was a sore burden. I can never forget it;" and now, when he came back again, and found the hours of labour reduced, saw the Saturday half-holiday an established institution, and saw, further, how the people of the great cities were able to rush away to the green fields and the seaside, he felt tempted to exclaim: "Oh, that I could have had such a youth!" He might have made another man. And yet he did not know, after all. (Hear, hear.)

The old bell that waked him from his sleep at five o'clock in the morning seemed to him then to be the most infernal mechanism that ever broke the silence of the heavens. (Laughter.) Regarding this bell, Dr. Collyer told an interesting story, how when the Leeds Corporation were building their waterworks in the Washburn Valley he heard that they intended to pull down the old factory where he worked, and, no doubt, break the bell up as old metal. He therefore wrote and asked if he could have a bit. (Laughter.) But a few friends on this side actually sent him the entire bell across—(more laughter)—and it was now hanging in one of the departments of the Cornell University. Furthermore, he was the first person to ring it after it had been re-hung. "But, do you know," added the Doctor, "that instead of the infernal clang which I expected, its sound was sweet and musical. (Laughter.) In the old Methodist Evangelical language, it had become converted, regenerated, sanctified, and glorified." (Laughter.)

His Love for Books.

To relate anything like an account of his life would, he continued, be wearisome. He traced the beginning of his intellectual life, however, in an interesting incident, when as a boy of five years he went to a shop with a penny to buy some candy, but seeing a copy of "Dick Whittington and his Cat" in the window, he lost all idea of the candy and bought the book instead. (Laughter, and hear, hear.) That was the beginning of a passion for reading which had remained with him ever since, and that one little book was the foundation of a library which now numbered some 3,000 or 4,000 volumes. (Applause.) And so, through all his life of sunshine and shadow, he had just been a great reader, and if ever he failed so that he could not read any longer he would do what Southey did—go through his study patting his books on the backs as if they were children, and giving them his blessing. (Applause.) It had been a great joy to him to find how many Yorkshire people cared for him, because when he went away he wanted to be remembered and cared for. He confessed to being a "very happy old man," and he thanked the University, which was so full of promise, for having conferred that degree on "an old ex-blacksmith, who did as well as he knew how, what God gave him to do." (Applause.)

The Vice-Chancellor added a few words of thanks to Dr. Collyer for his address, and declared the Congregation ended.

THE YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN CLUB DINNER TO DR. COLLYER.

A COMPLIMENTARY dinner, arranged by the Yorkshire Unitarian Club in honour of Dr. Robert Collyer, took place on Saturday night at the Leeds and County Liberal Club. It was a gathering that gave genuine delight to the guest, and included representatives of several other denominations, especially those of the Methodist Church with which he was associated at the beginning of his career. More than two hundred ladies and gentlemen shared the repast, which, owing to the pressure, had to be served in two rooms. Lord Airedale would have been in the chair, but was unfortunately prevented by temporary indisposition, and his place was taken by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot. The Lord Mayor (Mr. Joseph Hepworth) attended, as did also the Rev. Principal Gordon, of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. Several gentlemen who could not be present sent personal tributes to the guest of the evening, including the editor of the Yorkshire Post.

In giving the toast of "Our Guest," the Chairman said there was no Unitarian in Yorkshire but would be proud to propose the toast. They were there to welcome and also, unfortunately, to say "good-bye" to Dr. Collyer, though they hoped they might yet again have him amongst them. They congratulated him and also the University of Leeds, now that he was a Doctor of Letters of that body. (Applause.) He was the friend of everybody, a man of great personality and magnetic influence, and the reason for this was because he had lived the life they would all desire to live if they had only the power and ability, and the strength and goodness of heart. "I feel," added Mr. Talbot, "that theological disputations are almost a thing of the past, and that if Unitarianism, nay, if Christianity is to be the force in the world we desire it to be, it will be through the lives of men who live as Christians, and do their work among us as Christian men, and that is the example which Dr. Collyer gives us." (Applause.)

Dr. Collyer, who was most enthusiastically received, gave a brief but delightfully characteristic reply to the toast. "I have lived a long life," he said, "and I have had a great many pleasant days, and I have had a great many friends, but I don't feel sure that I ever had a finer feeling of fellowship, of gratitude, of friendship, than fills my heart to-night. Friends from my own church are round about me, and friends from other churches—my old mother Methodist Church for one. She let me go when I felt I ought to go, but she was kind to me, and she didn't spank me very hard." (Laughter and applause.)

Telling the story of his first sermon in the old Methodist chapel at Addingham, forty-nine years ago, Dr. Collyer said that next day he went into the cobbler's shop, and the cobbler said, "Ah want to speak to tha, lad."

I said, "Do you?"

He said, "Ah went to hear tha' preach last night."

I said, "Did tha?"—you see, I was waiting, and didn't know what was coming.

He said: "Does tha' want to know what ah thought of it? Well, if tha' wants to know ah want to tell tha'—tha'll never mak a preacher while tha' lives. (Laughter.) Don't mistake what ah mean; tha' won't mak a preacher for us in t' Methodist Church. Tha' may do somewhere else, but tha' won't do for us." (Laughter.)

Then, added Dr. Collyer, he said what I have always thought a very striking thing. "When tha' preaches a sermon tha' must say, 'Thus saith the Lord,' and not lose thi' way reasoning about it. (Laughter.) Ah fear tha'll want to reason ower much, an' if tha' does tha'll have to get away." (Laughter.)

Next I met the miller, said Dr. Collyer, and he said: "Ah heard tha' preach last night."

I said, "Did you, sir?"

He said, "Ah'll tell tha' what they're going to do wi' thee—they're going to mak' a spare rail of thee; they'll put thee into every gap there is—now thee look out." (Laughter and applause.)

"And the curious thing has been," added the doctor, "that I have seemed to myself to be put into all the gaps that came my way." (Applause.)

Speaking of his early life in Chicago, he said when the minister was leaving the Unitarian Church there the congregation could not get supplies every Sunday, so they got the old spare rail. (Laughter.) He preached the old sermons that he preached in the Methodist Church, and he preached some of them still, so what he said could not be very bad. (Laughter.) Over the Atlantic he still treasured recollections of the home, and the pastures, and the bank where the primroses grew, and the place where he knew he could find the throstle's nest. All this he dreamed of whilst he was away. He had come back to verify it once more, and it was all true—true, but with a certain passing away. "Still," said he, "it is England for me, my mother England, and will be as long as I live. So I thank you to-night for this gathering to greet me. I shall carry it across the water with me, and when I get there I shall tell them of the good fellowship of the Christian Church, and of the good, sound heart of old Yorkshire that I love so well." (Loud applause.)

Replying to the toast of "The Visitors," proposed by Mr. J. H. Brook, of Bradford, Principal Gordon rejoiced to take a small part in "rendering homage to the glory of old Yorkshire and the pride of New York."

The Lord Mayor, who also responded, said that although a Methodist, he had been uplifted and encouraged many times by reading Dr. Collyer's books.

"The Cause of Liberal Religion" was a toast submitted by Mr. E. O. Dodgson, and acknowledged by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, who observed that breadth was a characteristic which belonged more to the individual than to any sect, and Dr. Collyer exemplified in his own person the meaning of Liberal religion.

THE LYRICS OF THOMAS STANLEY.

THOMAS STANLEY (1625-78), is, perhaps, best remembered as the author of the first English History of Philosophy, and as a translator. For being anything else he is only half remembered. Readers who care for the post-Elizabethan love lyric will do well to make his closer acquaintance in the volume of his Original Lyrics, published by Mr. Tutin, of Hull.* Mr. Tutin has laid us under obligation for many little anthologies, and for complete editions of several poets of importance, of his own editing and publishing, all of which have been labours of love. The edition of Stanley to which we direct attention has been made by Miss L. I. Guiney, who also has added a charming brief introduction, complete textual notes and a bibliography. The volume, compiled from the readings of 1647, 1651, 1657 is "the first complete reprint of Stanley ever published; it is his original and inclusive output." This collated text has been modernised, special regard has been given to punctuation, a few useful corrections have been made; and the book, in all respects, is as satisfactory as one could wish it to be. The chronological arrangement of the pieces helps to an easy understanding of Stanley's poetical genius, which, as is pointed out, was capable and successful in much more than the work of translation. A beautiful photogravure, by Mr. Emery Walker, of Lely's fine portrait of Stanley in the National Portrait Gallery is prefixed to our copy. A companion volume is shortly to follow, for Mr. Tutin contemplates the publication of a limited edition of Stanley's verse translations.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

ONE of the books I read in the summer holidays was a "Life of Florence Nightingale." It is good to read some such real story of a great man or woman in among the lighter odds and ends of reading one does on wet days in country or seaside lodgings, or on fine days out in the open.

Florence Nightingale was called after the city of Florence, where she was born on May 20, 1820. She is still alive, and you may reckon through how many reigns she has lived, and try and picture the history that has happened in her lifetime, and all the changes she has seen. One of the greatest changes is in the lives of girls and women and in people's ideas of what women are for and can do in the world. It is because Florence Nightingale was one of the first among those who last century gave us a new and nobler ideal of girlhood and womanhood, and in her own brave, unselfish life showed new ways by which girls and women can do their share equally with boys and men for the good of all, that she is so much loved and honoured.

Her father was a country gentleman, who lived on his estates, during the summer in Derbyshire and during the winter in Hampshire. In those days a squire and his wife were often ignorant, selfish, sport-loving people, but Mr. Nightingale spent his time looking after the welfare of the cottagers, and was a great lover of books and pictures, while Mrs. Nightingale was a charming, cultured lady, a good housekeeper, and beloved by her neighbours for her kindness. Florence and her elder sister were far better educated than most girls of their time. Under a governess and their father they learnt Greek, Latin, modern languages, mathematics, natural science, music, and painting. Their mother trained them in housework and needlework, and while they grew up strong in body from a healthy out-door life, her wise influence always taught them to behave like ladies, and in this their training was better than that of many modern girls. By the time they reached womanhood there were few squire's daughters so graceful, accomplished and lovable, yet so clear thinking, orderly and self-reliant, with minds and souls so easily touched by all that was true and beautiful and good. A very happy child was Florence in those beautiful country homes, with her garden and her pony, loving flowers and animals and all the people round her, and very soon finding that even a little girl can do many things to add to the happiness of her family, or to ease the lot of those less fortunate than herself. Her taste for nursing was early shown in her tender care of several sick dolls, and her first real live patient was a shepherd dog, whose leg she saved from lameness with much patience and cleverness. Everyone brought their wounded pets to "Miss Florence," and as she grew older her skill and devotion began to be of value to the sick poor people as well.

Though she filled her time with the usual young ladies' benevolences of Sunday-school teaching, school-treats, bazaars, and so forth, and with the gaieties of society, spending the season in London, and being "presented" at one of Queen Victoria's earliest Courts, the idea of doing some definite work in the world took shape. That work should be nursing, for which she was conscious of a special gift. For nursing she would train. In this purpose she was encouraged by a meeting with Elizabeth Fry, whose dedicated life among prisoners had always made an impression on her. A woman who took up work without the necessity for earning a living was a novelty in those days. The notion that women needed training as men do for work was also new, and nursing was a new work for educated gentlewomen, unless they were nuns. A study of the awful condition of hospitals in London and abroad, and of the ignorance, coarseness, even vice of the nurses, both hospital and private, showed Florence Nightingale, the great need for women of training and refined minds and religious spirit to devote themselves to the care of the sick. Happily her parents were glad that one should obey this new call to God's service. In 1849 she entered a Home lately founded by a Pastor Flidner at Kaiserswerth in Germany to give Protestant women much the same training and experience among the poor as Roman Catholic sisters have had. We are so used to seeing our friends don their simple nurse's dress and lead a self-denying life that we cannot realise the boldness of the step thus taken by the first English lady-nurse. Then Miss Nightingale returned home and started what we now call District Nursing among the poor. She next became the hard-working matron of a home for sick governesses in Harley-street, London, largely paying for the institution out of her own pocket.

But a greater opportunity was to come for the exercise of her special gift. She had been faithful in a few things and was now to be made ruler over many. The Crimean War began. Tales came of the horrible condition of the hospitals for the wounded, and of the mismanagement of the nursing arrangements. An appeal was made to the women of England to go out and nurse the soldiers. There were many offers, few from ladies experienced in nursing, and only one from a lady thoroughly trained in that work, and with knowledge and character enough to manage a hospital. That one lady was Florence Nightingale. It is God's way when a new need arises in the world to find some man or woman with just the new powers and experience required to supply that need. Miss Nightingale's letter, offering her services as a nurse, was crossed by one from the Secretary of War (an intimate friend of hers) asking her to go to the East as Superintendent of Nurses, with full command over all arrangements connected with the care of the wounded. The story has often been told of "The Lady in Chief," as she was called. How she became head of the great barrack hospital at Scutari, and eventually of many others, visiting camp hospitals often in great danger; how she looked to the proper supply of stores, arranged for the cooking, herself nursed the wounded and cholera-stricken with tenderness and skill, and by degrees put trained women nurses, some as noble-souled as herself, in place of the well-meaning but incapable "orderlies"; in short, how she brought order, cleanliness, comfort and wholesomeness out of scenes of disorder, filth, misery and pestilence. You can read in Longfellow's poem how she came to be known as "The Lady of the Lamp," because often at nights she went round the dark wards with her shaded lamp, the love of God, and Christ-like trust in God and love of the sufferers shining from her face, and inspiring words of consolation to the sick and the dying.

After her return home at the close of the war in 1856, she herself became an invalid for the rest of her life. But her sick-room, whether in her lovely country homes till her parents' death, or in her present London home, has been the centre of work by writing personal advice and sympathy, which has helped in making all hospitals, public or private, fit and beautiful places, and in filling them with trained, self-sacrificing women nurses. Nor did she forget her old friends, the soldiers. Her ideas for improving their life in barracks as well as in camp and hospital have been carried out by different Governments.

So she lives on, a very old lady, rich in the honour and love of her countrymen, still doing according to her opportunity God's work in Christ-like love of her neighbour. She has seen realised the higher and more practical education of girls and women for which she pleaded, and largely by her example has the world come to see that the life of God's great human family is healthiest and noblest when men and women are equally free, and both trained to exercise their best powers for the good of all. "I would say to all young ladies who are called to a particular vocation," she wrote, "qualify yourselves as a man does for his work. . . . Submit yourselves to the rules of business as men do, by which alone you can make God's business succeed, for He has never said that He will give His success and His blessing to sketchy and unfinished work." When she was young, people used to talk very foolishly, though in a well-meaning way, about women, and what they could and might do without being unwomanly. "Surely," wrote Florence Nightingale, "woman should bring the best she has, whatever that is, to the work of God's world. . . . No one has ever done anything great or useful by listening to the voices from without. You want to do the thing that is good, whether people call it 'suitable for a woman' or not. Oh! leave these jargons, and go your way straight to God's work in simplicity and singleness of heart!"

These sentences are good for both boys and girls to read. We are each "called to a particular vocation," and as you are growing up you should be finding it out, and fitting yourselves for it in your home and school life, and later on in the many ways of training for the many kinds of work. Then you will be never without the means of livelihood whatever may betide, and this is the right and duty of every human being. Then whatever your lot may be, you will be ready with both paid and unpaid labour and always with the love of God to do a man's and woman's share for the welfare of your family, town, and country, and to "bring the best" you have "to the work of God's world."

MODERN THOUGHT AND THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

FATHER GEORGE TYRRELL is one of the most interesting personalities and one of the most powerful writers in the world of theological thought at the present time. He has written many books, he is the master of a fascinating style, and in all he writes there is a spirit of deep religious earnestness and sincerity. The attempt to reform the Catholic Church from within may seem to many of us perfectly hopeless, but it ought to appeal to our admiration and respect. The position of a liberal Anglican clergyman who disbelieves in the literal truth of the creeds and that of a liberal Roman Catholic priest is not identical. We find it difficult to sympathise entirely with a heterodox Anglican in allowing love for his Church and its associations to blind him to the fact that he is sacrificing veracity on the altar of his affections. There are, of course, all degrees of heterodoxy, and in many cases the limit beyond which veracity must be sacrificed is not attained. We have no desire to judge harshly even the most advanced clergyman who, while denying Incarnation, Atonement, and Resurrection in any orthodox sense, still clings to his Church. We would not blame such men, but we look at them with a certain imperfect sympathy.

It would be better and bolder to come out at whatever loss of position and influence, and at whatever pain to themselves.

But a Roman Catholic priest is the member of a much larger, older, and, in a sense, more flexible Church. Additions to doctrine may be made at any time by the authority of POPE and Councils, and if additions, then subtractions also. The theory of development is inherent in the conception of a divinely guided Catholic Church. Further, it does not lie with the individual priest to decide what does or does not constitute heresy. There is a central authority whose business it is and in whose power it lies to excommunicate and to unfrock any priest whose teaching goes beyond the limits of Catholic truth. The depository of Anglican truth is the Prayer Book, with its Creeds and Articles, and a clergyman ought to be able to decide for himself whether his faith is in accord with these statements. The depository of Roman Catholic truth is—if we understand it—the living authoritative voice of the Church. A priest may know he is running into great danger of divorce from the Church he loves by outspoken liberalism, but he cannot tell whether he is transgressing the limits of Catholic truth until he tries.

Father TYRRELL is not going to secede, and we see no reason, on the grounds of veracity, why he should. He has written two striking letters on the recent Encyclical of the Pope in The Times of Monday and Tuesday last. "To secede," he says, "would be to allow that our calumniators were in the right; that Catholicism was bound hand and foot to its scholastic interpretation and to its medieval Church polity; that the POPE had no duties and the people no rights. It would be to abandon what we believe to be the truth, at the moment of its greatest betrayal."

Nothing could be more hopelessly out of touch with modern thought and science than the POPE's Encyclical; it might well make Catholics of a less heroic faith in their Church lose heart. But, as Father TYRRELL points out, it is not an oecumenical or infallible utterance. "It is a disciplinary measure preceded by a catena of the personal opinions of PIUS X. and his immediate entourage." It leaves room for the retreat of those who differ from it; there is no immediate expulsion of the heretics.

The religious belief of the POPE and his circle as summed up by Father TYRRELL from the Encyclical is worth notice:—

"Religion is derived by deductive reasoning from natural and miraculous phenomena. God is not reached through inward religious experience, but by argument. The divinity of CHRIST and Christianity can be thus argued so as to coerce the understanding. The Roman Catholic Church, with the Papacy, the sacraments, and all its institutions and dogmas, was, in its entirety, the immediate creation of CHRIST when upon earth. There has been no vital development, but only mechanical unpacking of what was given from the first. The Scriptures were dictated by God, and are final in questions of science and history. All doctrinal guidance and ecclesiastical authority is mediated through the infallible POPE from God to the Church. The Church is the purely passive recipient of the guidance so received. The Bishops are mere delegates of the POPE; the priests of the Bishops. The laity have no active share of any kind in ecclesiastical concerns; still less in the so-called growth of the Church's mind. Obedience and pecuniary succour are their sole duties. Science is subject to the control of scholastic theology; secular government is subject to the control of ecclesiastical government in mixed matters. Their jurisdiction is in the same order, only in different departments. There has been no true enlightenment and progress in modern times outside the Church. There is no element of truth in any other religious system."

It is an amazing position. What the devout liberal Catholic will most deeply regret, says Father TYRRELL, "is the loss of one of the Church's greatest opportunities of proving herself the saviour of the nations. Rarely in her history had the eyes of all been waiting upon her more expectantly, in the hope that she might have bread for the starving millions, for those who are troubled by that vague hunger for God on which the Encyclical pours such scorn. Thousands of the most deeply religious souls, scandalised by the crude identification of scholasticism with Catholicism, will be kept from those graces, sacraments, and helps to which they have infinitely more right than many 'children of the kingdom.'" To a sympathetic outsider the tone of the Encyclical seems to prove that the battle of liberalism within the Roman Catholic Church is lost, and that there is no room in her fold for liberal Catholics of the FOGAZZARO type in Italy, of the LOISY type in France, or of the TYRRELL type in England. It will be especially interesting to watch the cause of religious liberalism in Italy, on which FOGAZZARO's "Saint" casts so impressive a light. Hitherto "Italy has not had faith enough to make a heresy," it has been said. There is faith enough in "The Saint" to make one of the most important heresies of modern times. We cannot help hoping that the liberal Roman Catholics of Christendom, when driven out of their old Church, as seems to us inevitable, will not sink themselves in already existing sects, but will combine together in the attempt to form the Church of their ideals and of their dreams. There are elements in the Roman Church, apart from its priestcraft and its arid dogmatism, which it would be well for the Protestant world to realise. It is impossible to say whether liberal Roman Catholics are capable of forming a Church free from the errors and bigotry of Rome while retaining all that is beautiful and good in that august communion. We should like to see them try. Even failure in such a cause would be worth while.

THE Tribune of September 28 gives the following cable note from Boston:—"At the Religious Congress at Boston on Thursday a resolution was submitted for the erection of a monument to Calvin at Geneva. The meeting, however, was divided on the question, and the matter dropped. Another resolution in favour of a monument to Servetus, the Spanish writer, who at the instance of Calvin was burned for heresy at Geneva, was unanimously adopted.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

PRESENTED BY REV. CHARLES W. WENDTE, OF BOSTON, GENERAL SECRETARY.

THE Executive Committee of the International Council of Unitarians and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, under whose general auspices these international meetings of religious liberals are held, heartily greets its members and friends assembled for the fourth time in conference. It congratulates them that through the hospitable invitation of their American fellow-workers they are enabled to hold a congress on American soil and in the very city where our International Council itself was born seven years ago. We meet to-day in a community identified in the world's esteem with civil and religious liberty, and with which the life and labours of Dr. William Ellery Channing, Theodore Parker, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Hosea Ballou, John Greenleaf Whittier, Phillips Brooks, and other eminent advocates of religious enlightenment and freedom were long associated. The Executive Committee congratulates you on the general increase and inspiring promise of this movement for the federation of the religious liberals of all lands. Organised in Boston in the year 1900 by a few earnest spirits representing half a dozen of the more advanced church fellowships of Christendom, its founders could not foresee its timeliness and adaptation to the needs of the liberal religious community throughout the world. With faith and hope they sowed the seed of religious enlightenment and fraternity in the dawning light of the new century, and have been rewarded beyond their most ardent expectations by its surprising growth and early fruition. At our Congress to-day are assembled the representatives of four of the great world-religions; namely, Judaism, Christianity, the Theism of India, and Mohammedanism. Men and women of 4 distinct races and 16 different nationalities participate in it. The members of 33 separate church fellowships will address us, and 57 religious associations, other than single churches, have sent us official delegates. If we were to take into consideration the church affiliations of the 106 honorary Vice-Presidents who have cordially permitted us to affix their names to the invitation to this Congress, our sympathisers and friends would be still larger. 1,520 persons have enrolled themselves as members of the Boston Congress, paying the customary fee—a number likely to be considerably augmented before the close of the sessions. Of these 242 belong to foreign, mostly European countries, 132 delegates from Great Britain are in attendance on the Congress, while the religious liberals of Austria, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Italy, Sweden, and Switzerland, as well as Australia, New Zealand, India, and Japan, are also, and for the most part officially, represented.

Such results may well encourage the promoters of this international endeavour to bring into closer union for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims the historic liberal churches, the liberal elements in all churches, the scattered liberal congregations, and isolated workers for religious freedom and progress in many lands.

This purpose is being more and more realised as each successive meeting of our association brings the religious liberals of different nations into closer personal relations with each other. Our previous Congresses at London, Amsterdam, and Geneva were impressive in their numbers, the intellectual and moral weight of their testimony, and the catholicity of their spirit. To all who attended them they were profoundly instructive and moving—red-letter days in their spiritual history. But the best result of these Congresses was the brotherhood of soul which they generated, the mutual personal acquaintance of thinkers and workers for religious freedom, separated from each other by long stretches of sea and land, but closely affiliated in thought, in sentiment, in aspiration, and in common labours for the advancement of truth and the practice of the good. Whatever else this International Council may have accomplished, it has certainly brought the advocates of religious freedom in many lands into closer touch and acquaintance with each other. We are no more strangers; we are friends. We will tell each other of our individual experiences since last we met—our trials and defeats, our triumphs and gains, our undying trusts and hopes for "pure religion and perfect liberty." When we return to often difficult and lonely posts of duty in far distant countries, the memory of these days of spirit-communion will remain with us as an encouragement and an inspiration. Truly, it is good for us to be here.

But, in the midst of our mutual felicitation, a shadow falls across our minds as we recall tenderly and sorrowfully those brave and ardent spirits among us who since last we came together have ceased their faithful labours on earth and been called to more glorious service in heaven. The past year has deprived us of the companionship and council of one of the most widely honoured and influential of our fellow-workers, Professor Albert Réville, of Paris. Eminent as a scholar and theologian, he was still more distinguished as the eloquent champion of a free and rational Christianity and for the loftiness of his moral and spiritual ideals. At our last Congress in Geneva his voice was still vibrant for religious freedom and unity, and its echoes can never die out of our hearts.

One of the first to acclaim the formation of our International Council was Signor Fernando Bracciforti, of Milan, who pleaded at our London meeting with all the impassioned earnestness of his race for religious liberty and progress, and later translated into Italian several of the papers of the Congress. A brave Garibaldian soldier, he stood for years almost alone in his native country for the Unitarian form of Christianity. He fought nobly for us, and we reverently render him the tribute of our grateful remembrance.

At the Geneva meetings in 1905 the proceedings were impressively opened by a prayer from the venerable lips of Pasteur L. Audemars, of Lausanne, a patriarch of ninety-two years, a devoted adherent of liberal Christianity. In the fulness of his years and labours he has since been gathered to his fathers, and confides the never-completed task of religious emancipation to our loyal hands and hearts.

Rev. Richard Little, a Unitarian clergyman of Monyrea, Ireland, was a delegate to our Congress at Geneva. His early death called out a remarkable demonstration of regard and sorrow on the part of his compatriots. The whole community gave itself up to mourning. Protestants and Catholics, liberals and orthodox, priests and ministers, walked side by side in long procession at his funeral, thus testifying to a noble life spent in the service of his country and his kind, and affording a striking illustration of that religious breadth and concord for whose promotion our International Council was organised.

The lamented death of Ananda Mohun Bose, the eminent Hindu lawyer and statesman, a leader in the Brahmo-Somaj, or association of Hindu Theists, affiliated with our Council, is a misfortune to us as well as to modern India. So, too, in recalling the comparatively early decease of the brilliant preacher and writer, Rev. Albert Kalthoff, of Bremen, we unite with our German fellow-believers in deploring the loss of one who, while often at variance with us in religious science and philosophy, was ever faithful to the fundamental verities of freedom, truth, and God.

The interval of time between our biennial Congresses is usefully occupied by your officers and Executive Committee in labours for the cause it represents, in carrying out so far as possible the decisions of previous meetings and preparing for the next one. During the past two years a large correspondence with fellow-liberals the world over has been conducted by the General Secretary, by President Edouard Montet, and various members of the committee. By this agency the knowledge of our aims and methods has been much extended and our acquaintance with the conditions and needs of religious liberals in other lands enlarged, while we, in turn, have been enabled to reinspire many brave and devoted labourers for religious enlightenment and progress who suffer from the isolation and material privation which often attend their lot or who are the victims of dogmatic intolerance and ecclesiastical oppression. Nor have we always contented ourselves with words alone. Despite the fact that our Council has as yet no treasury, no funds, and no stated income, means have been found in some cases to make a modest contribution for the relief of individuals and agencies representing our principles and needing our help. An interesting instance of such international co-operation is to be found in the organisation a year or more since, at Geneva, of a society for promoting general Protestant, and more especially French Protestant, interests in the present religious crisis in that country—a society whose aims our Council was glad to further in both material and moral ways. The happy results attending this practical co-operation with our fellow-workers in other lands makes the creation of a central caisse, or treasury, for our association seem more than ever desirable

In many communities there is no way in which our struggling cause could be more surely established than by a timely and needed grant of money for the support of a minister, the maintenance of a religious journal, or the dissemination of liberal literature.

This leads us to acknowledge with gratitude the large help our cause is receiving from the liberal religious journals of the world. Papers like the Christian Register and Universal Leader of Boston, the Inquirer and Christian Life of London, Das Protestantenblatt and Die Christliche Welt of Germany, Le Protestant and La Vie Nouvelle of France, De Hervorming of Holland, give large space to the announcements of our International Council, and express great sympathy with its spirit and purposes. The journals named have recently issued as supplements two large bulletins giving information concerning the approaching session of the Boston Congress, thus assuring the latter a widespread and effective advertisement. Besides these journals, however, there are twenty others in the various countries of Europe, America, and Asia which are in accord with our aims and cordially second our endeavours. It should be our constant effort to repay this countenance and support by furnishing original contributions and intelligence to the columns of these journals, securing subscribers and advertisements for them, and in every way in our power aiding them to increase in their own country and vernacular the sway of enlightened and liberal religion.

In this connection we may allude to three recent literary events of characteristic importance to our cause: first, the institution of a new theological and philosophical review, the Harvard Journal of Theology, to be edited by the theological faculty of Harvard University; second, the appearance of a new definitive American edition, in eighteen volumes, of the writings of Theodore Parker; and, third, the issue in Germany and other countries of several different series of popular handbooks on theological, philosophical, and religious topics, written by eminent scholars, which enjoy already a very large circulation—a gratifying proof that the conclusions of modern historical and critical science are no longer to be the exclusive possession of the learned classes and the university, but are to be brought increasingly to the knowledge and comprehension of the plain people of God.

During the past two years interchanges of sentiment and service between the religious associations which make our Council the organ of their larger and international relations with each other have been increasingly frequent. A striking instance of this was the presence of some twenty foreign delegates, representing ten different countries, at the last annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. At recent sessions of the Protestantenbond, or Union of Dutch Liberals, the Swiss Verein für freies Christentum, the Protestantenverein and the Freunde der Christlichen Welt in Germany, the American Unitarian Association, the Brahmo-Somaj of India, greetings were brought by envoys from liberal bodies in other and foreign countries. At a number of these gatherings our International Council was represented in person or by letter. We trust the day may come when this Council shall be enabled to maintain an agent constantly in the field, who shall regularly visit the more important of these meetings of religious liberals in all countries and become an intermediary between them in the interest of their common aims.

One of the votes of the Congress at Geneva was that its Executive Committee should collect, edit and present to the next Congress the creeds, declarations of belief, working principles, statements of purpose, &c., in present use by the various associations and church fellowships affiliated with this International Council. It was felt that such an exhibit of present-day faith and purpose among religious liberals the world over would be of mutual interest and helpful to our common cause. In accordance with this decision a circular asking this information was sent to a large number of associations and churches. Many replies have been received, but, as a number of the parties addressed have not yet reported and the material in hand needs careful sifting and editing, your committee advises that the matter be re-committed to them for further consideration and as early publication as possible. The one general and gratifying conclusion which we have derived from the reading of the statements of faith thus far submitted is that it is not essential to unity of action among religious liberals that there should be uniformity of belief among them; that the ideal we should keep in mind is not similarity of opinions, however advanced, but the Unity of the Spirit amidst large diversities of gifts and operations.

Each of the Congresses we have thus far held has had its own characteristics and made its peculiar contribution to our cause. At London we discovered each other and ourselves. We laid the foundation for a lasting fellowship of the spirit, and learned to know the opportuneness and promise of our international movement. At Amsterdam we came into touch with the Teutonic element, represented there especially by the sturdy Dutch nation, the historic champions of civil and religious liberty. Here, too, we solved the linguistic problem of our Congress, four different tongues—Dutch, German, French and English—being used by the delegates, but mediated to our understanding by one Pentecostal spirit of truth and fraternity.

At our Third Congress in Geneva we beheld the surprising irony of history by which this ancient stronghold of Calvinism has been transformed into a seat of freedom and enlightenment, an acknowledged centre of liberal religion. Here we came into closer relations with the Latin races, especially with those using the French idiom, while liberal Roman Catholics as well as Protestants participated in our conferences.

The Boston Congress is the heritor of the insight and experience, the brotherly spirit and moral momentum, acquired through our previous gatherings. The names of tried and honoured friends and fellow-workers appear on its programmes side by side with allies new gained for our cause.

It is a matter of disappointment to our Council that some of its most devoted members have not been able this year, for various reasons, to undertake the long journey across the ocean and participate in the proceedings of the Congress in Boston. The list of these is too long to enumerate, but we may at least express our regret that Dr. Herbert C. Smith, of London, to whose inspiring initiative is largely due the splendid action taken by which the transatlantic journey of so large a number of our British delegates to the Congress was assured, is unable, through illness, to be one of the cheerful company of pilgrims over sea which his zeal has made possible.

We sadly miss at this meeting also Dr. Joseph Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford, and Dr. Henricus Oort, of Leiden, the Presidents of our First and Second Congresses, respectively; Mrs. Humphry Ward, detained at home, "to her great regret," by literary engagements; Revs. Stopford Brooke, James Drummond, P. H. Wicksteed, and James Harwood, of London; Professor Chantre, of Geneva; Revs. James Hocart, of Brussels, Loenen-Martinet, of Holland, Altherr, of Basel; J. Émile Roberty, of the Oratoire, Paris, and Rev. Charles Wagner, the well-known author of "The Simple Life" and other books; Father Hyacinthe Loyson and Professor Paul Sabatier, of France—all of whom have been deeply interested members of our previous Congresses. Until the last moment we had hoped for the presence of Professors B. D. Erdmans, of Leiden, and George Boros, of Kolozsvár, active members of our Council, but prevented by home duties from attendance. Professors Rudolf Eucken and Heinrich Weinel, of the University of Jena, had promised to read papers at our Boston Congress, but are unable to come because of unexpected professional engagements. The former, however, sends an important paper, which will be read. Many letters of regret have been received, by prominent scholars, thinkers and divines of all branches of the Church the world over, which will be printed in the volume of the Proceedings and Papers of this Congress to appear in December next. To these and all friends and allies of our international movement we send greeting and good will, and our appreciation of their earnest and effective services to the cause of religious freedom and progress.

Our Boston Congress is held under the auspices of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, but calls itself simply a Congress of Religious Liberals. On our list of officers and reception committees, as well as on the programme of our meetings, are to be found the representatives of many different branches of Christendom and the Church Universal. Once again the religious world is afforded the edifying spectacle of a great body of men and women, belonging to nearly two-score different households of faith and distinguished by large varieties of opinion, coming together in peace and good will to exchange ideas, and to consort and worship together in the spirit of freedom, reverence, and charity.

Even the Roman Catholic Church, of all existing fellowships surely the least likely to sympathise with the aims and methods of a body like ours, is to-day represented at our Congress by one of its most scholarly and courageous priests, while well-informed Protestant divines, laying aside all prejudice; are to treat of the higher interests of this ancient and mother Church of Christendom in a profoundly sympathetic spirit. The inter-religious and inter-racial character of our gathering is still further evidenced by the presence and participation in it of eminent representatives of other great world-religions and branches of the human family, the Brahmin, the Jew, and the Mahometan—the sons of Asia and Africa as well as of Europe and America—while at our opening session last Sunday evening at Symphony Hall, with mighty unison of heart and voice, the great congregation sent forth to the religious world the greeting and message of our Congress, that angelic song which to-day, as ever, brings glad tidings of deliverance to mankind—"Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will toward men!"

For, while we call ourselves liberals, we are religious liberals. It is in the truest sense a religious movement which we have inaugurated, a movement which finds its chief inspiration in the positive affirmations of faith, and not in criticism and negation. Doubts and denials we are not unfrequently compelled to give free and fearless utterance to, but they are only incidental to our main purpose, which is to cherish and develop the religious life. We believe that the religious sentiment is natural to man and of surpassing importance; that, whatever may befall its accidental and transitory embodiments in dogma, sacrament, and ritual, religion itself will endure for ever, the very life-blood of the soul of man, the inner power which lifts him above the solicitations of the senses and the distractions of the world into communion with God and self-sacrificing devotion to mankind.

Furthermore, we are liberals in religion, not because we maintain this or that set of opinions, however advanced; not because we deny or antagonise other people's opinions, not because we hold our opinions loosely or have no opinions whatever. Liberalism is to us a temper, an attitude of mind, a disposition of the heart towards truth. Liberalism is the supremacy of the spirit over the letter in religion. It is the mind in a state of growth, and is thus differentiated from orthodoxy, which is the type of a mind that has stopped growing, which accepts finalities in religion and claims that its opinions are infallible. We are liberals because we believe in freedom, in growth, in evolution in religion, as in all else; because we believe in sincerity and courage and hope in our treatment of religious questions.

But, above all, we are liberals because we cherish a tolerant and sympathetic spirit towards those with whom we differ in opinion. No mind can be truly liberal which entertains a hateful, scornful, temper towards another type of mind. The true liberal not only speaks the truth, but he speaks it in love. He not only tolerates, he loves his fellow-men. He is charitable towards their intellectual errors and sympathetic with their endeavours after truth. He reverences their reverences. He is not impatient with error if it be error held in the spirit of truth. The only unpardonable sin in his eyes is uncharity—a loveless heart, an intolerant mind.

This it is to be a religious liberal, and of such a spirit and purpose is the International Congress of Religious Liberals which invites you to-day to its deliberations and concerted endeavours for religious freedom, truth, and charity. It is persuaded, like the apostle, that "where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Therefore, it would "serve the Lord in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter," striving

"To build the Universal Church
Lofty as is the love of God,
And ample as the wants of man."

OPENING ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, REV. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, D.D.

THE significance of this gathering is that it is composed of men and women who, in the pursuit of truth and righteousness, dare to commit themselves unreservedly to the control of the law of liberty. This Council is the unfettered servant of truth, freedom, and brotherhood. The type of religious thought and feeling represented here is broadly inclusive. It is not to be identified with any one form of sectarian opinion or organisation. The universal religious consciousness creates here a meeting-place for a score of different races, traditions, doctrines, names, and allegiances.

The intellectual characteristic of this company is open-mindedness. We do not desire to promote uniformity of opinion. We are no one-ideal regiment, marching with the dull monotony of a hayfoot-strawfoot discipline. We are a persistently independent and self-reliant people, tolerant of exceptionality, eager to recognise and apply individual power and aptitude. We rejoice that in this gathering lonely thinkers find themselves least lonely, and brave workers find themselves most positively furthered.

We come together out of our separate and peculiar traditions, our local or provincial prejudices, our legitimate preferences for certain familiar beliefs and habits. We come with our little sectarian jealousies, our misunderstandings, our possible antipathies, and we discover that our very differences represent not so much the diversities as the universality of religious faith. Here we come into the atmosphere of cordial fellowship and good will. We lay aside our narrower pursuits, the ambitions that divide us, the cares and fears that so easily beset us, and refresh ourselves with a nobler reach of vision. We meet for social intercourse and for the exchange of opinion and experience. We enjoy the stimulus of intellectual variety, we broaden our horizons, we lift our instinctive prepossessions to the higher levels of rational and friendly debate. We form enduring friendships. We discover unexpected identities of spirit and purpose. We learn how much of breadth and true liberality there is in nations or communions we had supposed to be exclusive and despotic. We emphasise the convictions that all good men hold in common. We unseal again the fountains of idealism where the thirsty soul, weary of materialism, has so often refreshed itself. We renew faith and courage, and we return to our homes re-enforced by a new sense of the grandeur of our life together and the irresistible attraction of our common hopes and ideals.

But, while thus inclusive and hospitable, the field of this Council, as I understand it, is not unlimited. It is confined by the boundaries of religious thought and action, and it is practically limited to the people who believe that theology is a progressive science, and not a sealed and final "deposit of faith." It commands primarily the allegiance of people to whom religion is not a matter of outward form or stated observance, but a sentiment which expresses itself in unpretending devotion to the truth, in habitual consideration for others, in steady adherence to certain well-recognised ideals of private and public duty.

It is a commonplace to say that immense changes are taking place in the thought and life of all religious organisations. The adherents of the different communions are no longer homogeneous. They not only tolerate, but acknowledge a great and growing diversity of opinion within their own ranks. To say that a man is an Episcopalian or a Presbyterian, a Lutheran or a Calvinist, a Catholic or Protestant or Jew, no longer defines his spirit or his convictions. He may be forward-looking or backward-looking, conservative or progressive, bound by some outward law of constraint or delivered into allegiance to the law of liberty. The progressive men of all communions feel themselves in closer sympathy with men of the same spirit in other communions than with those of an opposite temper in their own, while the reactionaries of all communions are drawn together by their common opposition to the theological reconstruction which modern knowledge demands. The traditional and historic dividing-lines grow dim, but the new alignments grow more and more distinct. As the progressives of every name carry forward their principles to their logical conclusions, the reactionaries relapse toward mediævalism in their doctrines, their habits of worship, and their conceptions of the religious life. The members of this Council obviously belong to the progressive wings of the different communions. We are a people who hold it to be the task of each generation to interpret religion afresh in the light of growing knowledge and experience and in the thought and speech of their own time. We are a people temperamentally disposed to accept modern conceptions of history, science, and philosophy.

But, while the members of this Council are liberals, they are in no sense iconoclasts. They cherish the law of historic continuity. They have no tendency to mistake restlessness for progress, or revolution for reform, or the removal of their neighbour's landmarks for the enlargement of their own territory. They believe that to develop a nobler future we must use the impulse of the toiling generations behind us. Amidst the diversities of gift and operation they seek to discern the one spirit. Reaching for things before, they hold securely to something behind.

There is nothing controversial in the purpose of this gathering, there is nothing polemic in our discussions. Though the statement of our principles appears sometimes to arouse heat in those who do not agree with us, we disclaim any desire to criticise or inflame. Our appeal is never to passion or prejudice, but to reason and good will. Our attention is not given to the defects or failures of other systems of religious thought or methods of religious organisation, but solely to the development of the creative and constructive forces. We are concerned with the promotion of certain positive and universal principles of thought and conduct. Our spirit is affirmative, not negative. We desire not to destroy, but to fulfil.

And, if we are not iconoclasts or controversialists, neither are we apologists. The great convictions we hold in common rest not on the authentication of any ancient book, not on any decree of Council or of Church, but on their appeal to the conscience, reason, and experience of men. We make no unreal distinction between religion and the world, between things sacred and things secular. Religion, as we conceive it, is not something apart from life, dependent upon a special and supernatural revelation, but a part of life, simply the consummation and transfiguration of human experience.

It follows that the members of this Council are, by temperamental necessity, optimists. They believe in human nature, they have confidence in the good purposes of the universe, they commit themselves to unfaltering trust in the ultimate victory of truth over error and of right over wrong. They are people who squarely face the unquestionable and inscrutable tragedies of human life, who have a clear perception of the narrow boundaries of human knowledge, and the evils and ills that oppress and hinder mankind. They do not expect to fathom the unfathomable, yet they find ample scope, within the obvious limits, for the exercise of noble faculties, for flights of fine imagination, for disinterested and prophetic achievement. They discover no limits to the possibilities of the soul's expansion. They believe in spite of prevalent discontent, in spite of disappointment over some of the results of liberty, in spite of the inability of science to solve the ultimate mystery of existence, that life is eminently worth living and that underneath are the everlasting arms.

The leaders of this Council do not deceive themselves into thinking that their ideals are easily attained or to be immediately realised. Theirs is the joy of pursuing ideals that ever journey before them. Their good obtained is only tidings of something better. Their castles of hope shine ever along new horizons. They rejoice in a religious confidence which is allied to, and not at war with, the fundamental instincts of honour and justice, which is in harmony with the beauty of the visible universe and with the sweetness of family love. Theirs is the cheerful faith that knows that this marvellous life is not a vision that fades, but an everlasting trust. Such a faith justifies an illimitable expectation. The potential kingdom of God and brotherhood of man is here. In modest confidence, let us pledge ourselves to our high calling, resolved to do what we can that freedom and truth may more abound, that men may have life, and have it more abundantly.

Brethren of the Liberal Faith, our greeting is no empty form, no merely personal word, no conventional welcome. It is full of proud and happy memories, of bright hopes, of inspiring challenge to new courage and loyalty. To greet you, we gather the spirits of the great departed. Search the careers of the men whose names are inscribed on these walls, and you will find that they were animated by the ideals to which this gathering is pledged. These names materialise themselves into the forms of the Prophets and Poets, the Scholars, Statesmen, and Seers we have loved to honour and obey. These were men who refused to believe that God had exhausted His creative energies; men who gave themselves not to any material end or transient object, but to quickening the primal influences by which character is moulded and truth perfected and life made more abundant; men who deserted no righteous cause because it is unpopular; men whose chosen way was freedom, whose end was righteousness, brotherhood, and truth. These were men who dared after the way called heresy to worship the God of their fathers; men who followed the truth that made them free, who cherished the love of God and man that it is the fulfilling of the law; men who mightily believed and wrought, that the unity of the spirit which is the bond of peace might be made real on earth.

If this silent band of heroes could speak to us, who can doubt what their questions would be? They would ask us what use we were making of the freedom they won for us. They would ask if the blessings of religious liberty were now the common possession of the people. They would ask if freedom had, as they believed it would, led on to brotherhood and unity and honourable serviceableness. What answer can we make to such questions? Is our answer nothing more than an excuse for our own insufficiency? Have we been true to the trust they left to us? It is for us to determine whether these names shall abide among the immortals. It is for us to perpetuate their principles and unfalteringly to pursue the ideals they have set before us.

Thus co-pioneers of pure religion and perfect liberty greet you to-day,—in the words of the elder prophets that still ring down the ages,—“Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon you!”

LETTERS FROM THE WEST.

THE CANADIAN CHURCHES.—II.

MONDAY, September 16, is past, and with it has ended the series of meetings and services at which the delegates of the B. and F.U.A. have come face to face with the Canadian brethren. In my former letter I spoke of the visits to Toronto, Hamilton, and London (Ont.). Since the events there recorded we have come eastward to Ottawa and Montreal.

The former of these two cities is the political capital of the Dominion. Its architectural crown is formed by the Parliament Buildings, which not unworthily serve as the government centre of a great nation. The streets are not so numerous nor so long as those of Toronto; yet, if evidences of wealth are not so conspicuous, evidences of prosperity and comfort abound. It is just over a century since the great-grandfather of one of our young Unitarian supporters here was the only white settler at this point on the shore of the noble river that gives its name to the city. It is less than a decade, I think, since the Unitarian Church was built. Vigour and promise are by no means all it has to boast. Here are gathered already a number of keenly intelligent men and women, including some of the foremost minds in the city. The present minister, the Rev. C. W. Casson, is an untiring missionary of the faith: Day by day his paragraphs appear in the Citizen, giving the world assurance of a living religion, instinct with modern ideals. It is said, indeed, that these pithy utterances of his, and his other journalistic work, have won the esteem of not the least of the “powers that be” in this heart of the land. Assuredly, Unitarianism is a real force where such a people and such a leader are to be found.

We all reached Ottawa on Thursday afternoon (September 12) after a long and at one time wave-tossed journey. Mr. Casson's abounding energy soon solved our baggage and lodging problems, and by the evening we were “all at home” at the pleasant gathering arranged in the schoolroom. Here, in addition to addresses by Mr. Bowie, Mr. Street, and myself, short speeches were given by Mr. Herbert Lawford and the Rev. F. Summers. Mr. Lawford's remarks, as a typical layman of the Old Country, were very happy and well received. Better than formal speeches were the cordial expressions in the general conversation which followed. Perhaps the same might be said about the Sunday services (to congregations of eighty and a hundred and twenty), which I had the privilege of conducting on the 15th. At any rate, the greetings and messages given me at the close from so many new friends, who seemed old friends already, were very stirring to me. By that day “my company had gone before” to Montreal; I only caught them up in time for the meeting on Monday evening.

Montreal is far away the oldest Unitarian congregation in Canada. After a tentative effort “begun in sorrow and ended in disappointment,” the now flourishing church really began its existence in 1842. The Rev. John Corder, of Belfast, became its first minister; the Rev. W. S. Barnes, the present highly respected pastor, who is in his twenty-eighth year of ministry here, is the second to hold this office.

The congregation, after worshipping in a church nearer to the centre of the present city, is moving out into the residential suburb close to the fine University buildings, and its new home, which the old year may see completed, will clearly be an ornament to the district, and a permanent monument alike of the devotion and fine taste of the pastor. Service was held on Sunday in the spacious schoolroom by the Rev. C. J. Street, some two hundred or more attending. On Monday evening a large gathering assembled in this beautiful structure (to be known as “Martineau Hall”), and addresses were given by the three delegates, who were very heartily received, and by Mr. Lawford, the Rev. C. Harvey-Cook (who touchingly referred to Philip Pearsall Carpenter's connection with Warrington and his grave in Montreal), and the Revs. Professor Montet (Geneva), and Tony André (Florence), whose eloquent French recalled Conferences held long ago. Other brethren from overseas were present, for we were now in mid-current of the tide of arrivals for Boston; but time would not allow of lengthening the programme. All were happier, however, for the interposition of a visitor from one of the Montreal Presbyterian churches (Mr. Drysdale), who bore unstinted testimony to the high worth of the Unitarian community in the city, and especially of its minister. The whole left an impression of excellent work accomplished, and still better things to come.

One cannot but regret that brief notes like these are all that can just now be presented as a record of so gratifying and (may I say?) so important a visitation. The abounding kindness, the stimulating intercourse, the splendid prophecy of the whole land around us, have made the deepest possible impression, I am sure, on the minds of us all who have had this great privilege. It is but little, perhaps, that we could give in return, but that little has been greatly magnified by the attachment of our brethren here to our faith and to our fatherland. Whatever may be the results to them of our brief sojourn among them one at least is certain in us—an abiding personal interest in the pioneers whom we have come to know—an interest which must surely bind us (and I hope many others) very close to them in coming years.

W. G. TARRANT.

A BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND INQUIRERS.*

At the time we are giving an enthusiastic welcome to Robert Collyer—a welcome that would be extended far beyond the bounds of his native Yorkshire if only the infirmities of his eighty-fifth year allowed of his accepting it—it comes opportunely that we should be reminded of another son of a poor weaver who won to high distinction in his day as a preacher of the liberal faith, and still more as a platform orator, who in the great days of the Anti-Corn Law Agitation, did much service in the cause, and won the highest commendation of men like Guizot and Bright. The former of these quotes from his speeches as “the most finished examples of oratory which the great conflict produced,” and assigns to them the higher merit that “they gave a philosophical character to the agitation”; while Mr. Bright says of them that “they were far the most eloquent contributions made to that great national debate.” His works were collected and published in twelve volumes shortly after his death in 1864, but the edition was a limited one, and they have become very scarce.

To the younger generation his name is almost or quite unknown, and much which he spoke and wrote fifty and more years ago has lost interest for readers of to-day, but the addresses delivered in 1848-9 at South-place Chapel on “The Religious Ideas” might be preached as of the newest in these days of “The New Theology,” and our association has done well in reprinting them in a cheap form so as to bring them within the reach of the elder classes in our Sunday-schools, and make them available for Postal Mission work.

The basis of Mr. Fox’s faith was his belief in the universality of religion. There was for him not one true and many false religions, but certain few and simple religious ideas, which, diversified by the various influences of race and tradition and circumstances, are the material of which every religion is constructed. And these ideas have their root in human nature, they are the natural growth of man’s intellectual and moral constitution, for there is in human nature an internal impulse toward the divine. It is these which constitute “a religion of humanity, the proof of which is in our own conscience and consciousness, a religion which cannot perish in the overthrow of altars or the fall of temples, which survives all particular forms and which, if every form were obliterated, would recreate religion and fashion for it such forms and modes of expression as may best agree with the progressive condition of mankind.”

Neither believers nor unbelievers can deny the immense importance of the inquiry as to the reality and nature of “these few and simple ideas.” If they are merely inherited superstitions and delusions let them be exposed as such. If, on the contrary, they are as real as humanity itself, let them be made evident and cleared from the entanglements and confusion which so readily beset them. So only shall we find firm ground to stand on, though it be only what Cardinal Manning called, and not by way of disparagement, “the good solid clay of human nature.”

“Revelation, God, Providence, the sense of right and wrong, duty, redemption, heaven, these and such as these,” says Mr. Fox, “are the primeval elements of religion.” The words are simple and well known, the meanings attached even to the simplest and most august of them will vary indefinitely. And yet there is something the same throughout all differences of understanding them. The God whom the child imagines as sitting upon a throne up in the sky is the very same as the Infinite and the Absolute of the philosopher. The difference is rather in the mode of conception than in the concept itself.

Mr. Fox was of course adjudged a heretic in his day. No progressive thinker who speaks his mind can escape the accusation, which indeed is quite justified. For is not the man a heretic who takes his own way and walks apart from his fellows, whether it be in advance of them or, as is more often the case, in some side path, or behind? His Christianity would certainly be accepted of many now who are reckoned among the more conservative of liberal theologians. “The universal and enduring,” he taught, “are in Christianity; and, allowing that they exist in all religions, the result of a complete and fair examination will be, I apprehend, that they exist more truthfully and efficiently in Christianity than in any other of these specific forms.” And after dwelling on “the things eternal enshrined in Christianity which no storm can shake, no discovery in science supersede,” he concludes with an eloquent exhortation, which might be of last Sunday, to “disregard the temporary and accidental, that which has only a failing evidence, which grows weaker with the lapse of time, and cling to that which has the ever-renewed evidence of the tendencies of human nature.”

We would earnestly commend this little book to the attention of teachers and inquirers. It may serve the purpose of supplying to some the resting-place which they have been seeking in vain in one after another of the religious systems, new and old, which plead for attention. It is not a manual of Unitarianism or any ism, but an earnest attempt to make clear the foundations on which all religions are built up. “Time,” he said, “is rapidly bearing the world on to more enlightened opinions than any of us in the present generation hold,” and he was fully conscious of the defects of what was only intended as “a summary of his own truthful thoughts for the contemplation of truthful minds.” No treatise on this great subject, however complete and extended, could be other than provisional, a statement to be corrected in the fuller light of developed revelation and research; but these fifteen lectures of sixty years ago may yet stand for the best to which we have hitherto attained.

A WARNING.

SIR,—I desire to warn your charitable readers against an impostor who has recently obtained money from me by false pretences, and has since, by the use of my name, victimised some of my friends in Liverpool and Southport.

He is a painter by trade, and told me he had been a member of our congregation in Lancashire, but he alters his story from time to time and adopts several aliases.

His age is about 40, and his appearance excites sympathy, being asthmatic, weak and tremulous.

CAMBRIDGE SERVICES.

SIR,—The services at Cambridge commence on Sunday, October 13, at 11.30 a.m. in the Assembly Rooms, attached to the Liberal Club in Downing-street.

We should be very pleased if readers would tell anybody coming up to Cambridge of these services, and we should also be glad if anyone coming up would let us know their name and address so that we might send them a card with the list of preachers for the term.

I shall be very pleased to supply any further information to those that desire it, if they will write to me either at The Acacias, Old Chesterton, Cambridge, or to Caius College.

FRANK H. WATSON.

WE know that there have been lives which were beautiful exceedingly, that there have been souls which were perfect in their loving obedience. And we are assured that for us also there is a way in which we may walk, and which will lead us to that perfection for which we were manifestly intended.—John Dendy.

* “The Religious Ideas.” By the late William Johnson Fox, M.P. London: British & Foreign Unitarian Association. (Cloth, 1s. 6d., paper covers, 6d.)

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bradford: Manchester.—The harvest festival services were held on Sunday last. The chapel was decorated very tastefully by the teachers and scholars. The Rev. W. E. Attack preached both afternoon and evening. At the evening service an excellent address was given on "Praise ye the Lord." The choir rendered very appropriate music. There was a record attendance and collection.

Brighton.—At the first social evening of the season, a resolution was cordially passed recognising the valuable services of Mr. James Johnson as secretary of the congregation, and expressing regret that his departure from Brighton had necessitated his resignation of the office he has so ably filled. Regret was also expressed at parting from Mr. Bowes, who has been another faithful and consistent helper. Mr. H. J. Smith, of 74, Ditchling-road, was appointed secretary, with general gratification that he was willing to take up the work. Arrangements were made for the winter's work, including the reading circle and a course of weeknight lectures by Mr. Prime, on "John Ruskin." The Ladies' Glee Society is expected to resume its meetings shortly, and the Boys' Life Brigade, in which the superintendent of the Sunday-school (Mr. Dallaway) is greatly interested, is already at work.

Maidstone.—Our minister, the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, has just returned from his holiday, and has commenced the winter activities with characteristic energy. Last Sunday the church was again crowded to excess, with many sitting in the aisles.

Mossley.—On Sunday afternoon last, Mr. Charles Darnay gave a recital in the church. It has been the custom to hold a Service of Song during September; but this year a change was made, and Mr. Darnay rendered a number of pieces in a very clever manner, riveting the attention of his hearers. The scholars sang a number of special hymns, and a profitable afternoon was spent.

Pendleton: Manchester.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday last, September 29, by the minister, Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A. The attendances at both services was very good. Special music was rendered by the scholars and the choir, soloist in the evening being Miss Gertrude Weston. The Rev. A. O. Broadley, of the Bible Christian Church, Salford, gave a very interesting address to the parents and scholars at the afternoon service.

"How long, O Lord!" His people cried.
"So many lands beneath Thy sun
Which mountains part or seas divide!
Lord! hear our prayer, and make them one."

And He:

"One world, one home, one family,
One blood on every land or sea,
One household of my own shall be:
For this I make my children free."

Edward Everett Hale.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND "PUBLIC OPINION."

The Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P., Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of "PUBLIC OPINION":

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

DEAR MR. PARKER,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE would draw the attention of our readers in the home counties to the annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties advertised elsewhere in our columns. The meetings take place at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, on Thursday, October 24, and promise to be of exceptional interest. There will be public worship in the morning at 11.30, when Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., will preach. At the evening meeting and conference at 6 Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, will read a paper on "Congregational Independence in a Co-operative Age," to be followed by discussion. Luncheon and tea will be provided for ministers and delegates, and the Rosslyn Hill congregation will gladly entertain for the night any who are too far from their homes to reach them conveniently after the evening meeting.

REV. JOSEPH WOOD, as President of the National Conference, will begin his fourth preaching tour on Sunday, October 13, when he will preach the re-opening sermons at Atherton. The following are the places where Mr. Wood will preach :—Tuesday, 15th, Staleybridge; Wednesday, 16th, Mottam; Thursday, 17th, Memorial Hall, Manchester; Friday, 18th, Macclesfield; Saturday, 19th, Ashton; Sunday, 20th, morning, Stockport; evening, Dukinfield; Monday, 21st, Knutsford; Tuesday, 22nd, Nantwich; Wednesday, 23rd, Denton. On Thursday, the 24th, Mr. Wood will attend the meeting of the London Assembly at Hampstead, and read a paper on "Congregational Independence in a Co-operative Age."

THE Liverpool '96 Club were fortunate enough to secure Dr. Collyer as their guest to dinner on the night preceding his return to New York. There was a large gathering, members of the '88 Club being also present. Rev. C. Hargrove, Mr. Richard D. Holt, M.P., and others being guests. Mr. C. Sydney Jones presided, and, after the King and President Roosevelt had been toasted, he welcomed Dr. Collyer, and bid him God-speed on his voyage. Dr. Collyer responded in one of his delightful minglings of humour and pathos, made doubly impressive by his grand personality. The sense that in all human probability this was the last time he would visit the Old Country added to the importance of the occasion. Other toasts were proposed and responded to, that to the guests drawing forth a charming speech from Mr. Hargrove, who happily said that at Leeds they had fêted Robert Collyer, had feasted him, and then, as was fit, had Doctored him. The venerable guest departed amidst the enthusiastic farewells and good wishes of all.

THERE is a very interesting letter by Mrs. Humphry Ward on "Evening Play for London Children" in The Times of Tuesday last. The "eight play-centres which were in existence at the beginning of 1906 have grown to ten, and the weekly attendances, which a year ago in the summer term were 5,000, have been this summer nearly 10,000, and will be from 12,000 to 14,000 in the winter. A play-centre means the opening of an elementary school-building and playground five nights a week and on Saturday mornings to the neighbouring children for play and recreation after school hours. Each child comes twice, many three times a week; once for hand work, once for drill and gymnastics, and once for quiet games." "The revelation of our three years' work has been the unsatisfied hunger for hand occupation in the London child from 11 or 12 to 15." Mrs. Ward appeals for helpers and subscriptions toward this most beneficent work of giving children real recreation and interests and keeping them off the streets. She surely will not appeal in vain.

MR. PRICE, M.P. for East Norfolk, made a powerful plea for disestablishment at the Church Congress. "Times had changed very much since the Church of England became established by law. Before that time the Church of England was almost the only Church in the nation. Now it was probably not even the Church of the majority of the inhabitants of this land. Were Churchmen with their Established Church doing the very best that they might do in God's work? When he went to any function held by any of the Non-conformist bodies, he generally found ministers of other denominations there; but the Church clergyman did not go. That was a very great pity. It surely was a great help to have a new place of worship erected in a country village. (Voices: No, no; we do not want it.) A State Establishment gave the Church great dignity and authority, but he doubted whether these were half as valuable as the dignity and authority which the Church might earn for itself. It was supposed that State Establishment made Protestantism the State Religion. He was himself a strong Protestant, but he should have no fear about the existence of Protestantism in this country whether they had an Established Church or not."

A HOT debate took place at the Church Congress on the subject of "the Prayer Book and modern needs." A paper was read by the Dean of Lichfield, which was a carefully reasoned historical defence of the use of Eucharistic vestments. "The only way to bring peace to the Church was to permit without enforcing the use of vestments." The Dean of Canterbury, on the other hand, asserted "that the vestments were those of the Roman Mass." His vigorous denunciation of the Roman Mass was resented by many. He went on to assert "that there was no trace of the use of Eucharistic vestments until the ninth century, and maintained that those whom he represented objected to them from no narrow Puritanism, but because they wished to follow the earliest and best centuries of the Christian Church rather than the darkest." Most speakers deprecated any alteration in the Prayer Book, each one appearing to believe that the Prayer Book favoured his own views.

LORD HALIFAX, in the course of the discussion, severely censured Dr. Fremantle for talking as he had done of the great service of Eastern and Western Christendom in a way which was unworthy of the Dean of Canterbury. He also said "that he was quite sure they were all coming to the conclusion that the Acts of Uniformity were dead and buried, and that what was required for the order of the Church must be done by the Bishops on their own responsibility." This is to ignore the State, and to claim complete self-government. It may be a consummation devoutly to be wished, but it is only compatible with Disestablishment.

By the death of the Rev. John Aldis, in his hundredth year, the Baptists have lost one of the most notable men among them. Not only was his own career laden with honours, but his sons and grandsons gained a unique family record of University distinctions. He himself attained the highest distinction his denomination could offer when he was made Chairman of the Union in 1866. One of his sons, Mr. William Steadman Aldis, was Senior Wrangler and Smith's Prizeman at the University of Cambridge in 1861; another, Mr. James Arthur Aldis, was sixth Wrangler in 1863; a third, Mr. Thomas S. Aldis, was second Wrangler and Smith's Prizeman in 1866. Further, a son of Mr. J. A. Aldis was fourteenth Wrangler in 1892, while yet another was second Wrangler in 1900.

An interesting sketch of the career of Dr. Algernon Sidney Crapsey, who was expelled from the American Episcopal Church for heresy, appears in last week's Christian Commonwealth. The visit to America two years ago of the Archbishop of Canterbury suggested to Dr. Crapsey the topic of the relation of the political to the religious life, the topic developing into a series of lectures, in one of which he uttered these words:—"I am not alarmed, I am relieved, when scientific research teaches us that Jesus, the son of Joseph, was born as we are born, and died as we die; that from cradle to grave he was under the guidance of the same Divine Providence that carries us from birth to death; that miracle is not a help but a hindrance to the understanding of his personality, character, and mission." Those words, uttered in February, 1905, were made the pretext for a heresy-hunt, which only terminated in December, 1906, when, after a trial of five days, Dr. Crapsey was suspended from his spiritual functions for having violated the vows of his ordination, a judgment which brought to an end his ministry of thirty-three years in the Episcopal Church, of which twenty-eight had been spent in the rectorship of St. Andrew's, Rochester.

THAT Bibliolatry dies hard we have rude reminders from time to time. Dr. Beet, having written an article on Biblical fallibility, an "Old Supernumerary" discusses it in a letter to the Methodist Times. The editor prints the letter without comment, and this is an excerpt:—

"Dr. Beet in this article has made another attempt to elevate 'the inborn moral sense' above the Bible, as if God had made it the final court of appeal on all moral questions instead of His own written Word. But in this, as in other cases, he has utterly failed to produce a single scrap of support for his position from the Book of God. And it would be well for all concerned to remember the admonition with which His Book closes: 'If any man shall add unto them (the words of this book)

God shall add unto him the plagues which are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part from the tree of life, and out of the Holy City, which are written in this book'! And no wonder, for the inspired writers 'spoke from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost'; and in what they have spoken we have 'a more sure word of prophecy,' by far, than 'the inborn moral sense.' And the royal psalmist, who had only a small portion of our Old Testament Scriptures, knew how to appreciate the written Word of God when he wrote the 19th and 119th Psalms. But we have all the New Testament, as well as the whole of the Old."

DR. R. F. HORTON continues his vigorous crusade against what he terms the Corrosive Press. It is most desirable that a healthy public opinion should be aroused. In all probability the matter will come before the Congregational Union at its Autumnal Assembly next week. The following resolution was adopted by the Baptist Union at Liverpool:—

"That this assembly of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, realising the immense power for good or evil of the daily and weekly Press, deeply deplores that the evidences of its prostitution to unworthy purposes have recently multiplied at an alarming rate, especially:

"1. In the encouragement of the gambling spirit.

"2. In the publication of betting news and the giving of tips and starting prices.

"3. In competitions with a small entrance fee and large prizes, tempting men to trust to chance rather than to industry and skill, and to strive after unlawful gains.

"Above all, the assembly protests against the pornographic character of many of the columns in Sunday and other newspapers.

"The assembly, believing that combined action on the part of the members of the Churches of Christ would arouse many, who are now indifferent, to recognise this grave and increasing evil, urges all members of the Churches in the Union to abstain from purchasing, reading, or advertising in journals guilty of such offences, and to do all they can to dissuade others from patronising them in any way."

WE regret to note the death of Professor David Masson, at the age of 85. His monumental Life of Milton is a rich quarry both of inspiration and material. It is the life of one of the greatest Englishmen living in one of the greatest periods of English history. Professor Masson's book is a daring and most successful combination of biography and history. We not only have Milton's life, but we see all the history of his time, as it were, with his eyes.

SUCH visits as that of members of the Paris Municipal Council to the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the City of London, which took place this week, have lost some of their novelty, but none of their significance. It is in the frequent exchange of such tokens of goodwill and the frequent study by many representative men of each country of the good institutions of other lands that a real entente cordiale is maintained and produces lasting benefits. The President of the Paris Municipal Council, speaking at the Civic Banquet, declared that the cordial understanding between England and France was ready to spring into being before it took its place in diplomatic convention. Merchants and the industrial masses had, in this respect, gone ahead of the diplomatists. The entente cordiale threatened no one. It had been born of the natural aspirations of two great peoples, from identical wants, from interests almost concurrent, and an equal love of progress. Each having given liberty to the world, aspired to give it peace as proof of the love which it had for humanity at large.

THE International Miners' Congress has passed a resolution which we hope will eventually win the support of the main body of British miners against the employment of children under fourteen years of age in connection with mines, or, for underground work, under sixteen years; also that women's labour, which it was stated was on the increase, should be prohibited in the mines. The reasons against women's labour that were urged by the British delegates were the cheapening of labour by the competition of women, the degrading influence on women of the work, and its interference with the duties of motherhood. The same objections apply to a great part of the factory work undertaken by women who are mothers, but the legal prohibition of female and child labour in the mines of all countries would be a good move, and less open to question than in many other industries.

MISS MARY S. KIMBER, of New York, writing in last week's Friend, describes some of the educational work now being carried on among the American negroes. These now number ten millions, and about half of those over 10 years of age are able to read and write. Their condition is still very poor, their average property amounting to only about £6 per head, while only 173,000 own their own farms. But progress is being made, thanks largely to the great Normal and Agricultural Institute at Hampton, with its daughter at Tuskegee, and scores of other similar educational establishments. From such institutions thousands of young educational apostles have gone forth on their beneficent errands, among their own people, building up even in the course of a few years a new social order in many a negro village.

THE American Government has decided to establish a national employment agency in connection with the Bureau of Information. Offices for supplying immigrants with information as to the conditions of employment in all parts of the Union will be opened in the large ports of entry. This will, doubtless, prove of considerable assistance to immigrants, who now, for lack of this information, tend to remain in the eastern cities only to swell the ever-increasing number of the unemployed there.

IN one of Mr. Keir Hardie's letters from Canada he states that English emigrants, especially of the class sent over by the Salvation Army, are unpopular, owing to their propensity for grumbling and their lack of adaptability. On the other hand, Scotchmen, Welsh, Irish, and Scandinavians are welcome, and in the order named. The fact seems to be that city life unfits the poor for life in the colonies; and some intermediate training in self-reliance and independence is necessary. He found conditions specially bad in Winnipeg, which he describes as a sort of clearing house for the West, where workers are often temporarily stranded in unemployment.

CITIZEN Sunday will be observed at a large number of the churches and chapels in London on October 27. The Citizen Sunday Committee suggests that the claims of the child and of the home might be a fitting subject for clergy and other ministers to bring before their congregations. There is a widespread conviction which has expressed itself in many ways lately that the most hopeful way of reform is to look to the physical, mental, and moral influences on child life, and improve them so that when the children grow up to be men and women a larger proportion of them may be able-bodied, capable, and responsible citizens. The protection of children from the evil influences of the public-house is especially mentioned in the circular which has been issued; also improper feeding during infancy and childhood, and contact with the vice, selfishness, cruelty, and hunger of many of the over-crowded areas in the richest city in the world. These and the various phases of home life, housing, and education afford plenty of scope for a practical sermon.

"WOMEN as Inspectors" is the title of a threepenny pamphlet issued by the Central Bureau for the employment of women. It gives in concise and useful form information of especial value to women who are thinking of seeking appointment as inspectors under Government, under the London County Council, under the City and Metropolitan boroughs, and in the provincial towns with upwards of 100,000 inhabitants. Qualifications, salaries, and conditions of employment are carefully noted, and brief indications of the nature of the work in each department. To the public, also, it should be of interest to learn the extent to which women are already employed. There are only 36 with appointments under Government, and one can readily see how important it is that women should be employed in every department to which they have been appointed. Under Government or local authorities they already do work which only women could do satisfactorily as inspectors of factories, reformatory and industrial schools, public schools, midwives, "nuisances," shops, for the protection of infant life, and for the maintenance of public health. In many directions they might be further employed: it must be noted as unsatisfactory that there are no women inspectors of prisons, and the amount of work requiring to be done is greater in many departments than it is possible for the number of women inspectors adequately to perform. Evidently the position of inspector, male or female, requires great ability and strenuous work.

ATTEMPTS AT THE CHURCH CATHOLIC.—II.

THE Leicester Conference on Free Communion was formed in 1877, and created some commotion. But ten years earlier a previous venture had greatly interested readers of THE INQUIRER, though it caused little flutter elsewhere. The story of the Free Christian Union is not a long one, and it has been told in connection with its chief figure by Dr. Drummond and Dr. Carpenter. But a generation has gone by since its hopes ran high, and not many take interest in it to-day. Yet the revived faith in catholicity should pay tender homage to its memory. It is a significant chapter in the history of attempts at the Church Catholic.

Its chief events are soon set down. The initial step was taken at a private meeting, in Nottingham, on March 13 and 14, 1866. The convener of the meeting was the Rev. P. W. Clayden, and the chief conspirator was the Rev. James Martineau. It was decided then, with very slight difference of opinion to form a Free Christian Union to serve as a representative organisation of congregations which rested on an undogmatic foundation. Peter Clayden and Edward Enfield were appointed secretaries.

The next step was out into the open with a bold bid for action. On June 14, 1867, a large meeting assembled in University Hall "to consider the means of forming a closer union among Liberal Christian Churches and persons for the promotion and application of Religion in Life, apart from doctrinal limitations in Thought." It will be noted that the proposed representation is now extended from congregations to persons, and the aim widened on to the application of Religion. Dr. Martineau moved the following somewhat cumbersome resolution:—"That whereas religion in its essence is not contingent upon right opinion on matters of history, criticism or metaphysics, and in its application to life, has become encumbered with a load of superfluous conditions, it is incumbent on those who comprehend it all in the two great affections of love to God and love to man to unite their scattered forces both for closer communion in work and worship, and for resisting every intrusive interference with the intellect and conscience of men." He afterwards was willing, as the result of much discussion, for the insertion of the word "Christian" as describing, but not defining, the term religion, and this amended resolution carried the meeting, two only dissenting. A consultative committee was appointed then to prepare a scheme and submit a constitution.

The third step was a meeting at the Freemasons' Tavern, on November 21 following, at which a draft report and constitution were provisionally adopted and ordered to be printed and circulated. The preamble to the constitution, in which Dr. Martineau's hand is evident, contained the essential part:—

"Whereas for ages past, Christians have been taught that correct conceptions of Divine things are necessary to acceptance with God and to religious relations with each other:

"And, in vain pursuit of Orthodoxy, have parted into rival churches, and lost the bond of common work and love:

"And, whereas, with the progressive changes of thought and feeling, uniformity in doctrinal opinion becomes ever more precarious, while moral and spiritual affinities grow and deepen:

"And, whereas, the Divine will is summed up by Jesus Christ himself in Love to God and Love to man:

"And the terms of pious union among men should be as broad as those of communion with God:

"This Society, desiring a spiritual fellowship co-extensive with these terms, invites to common action all who deem men responsible, not for the attainment of Divine truth, but only for the serious search of it; and who rely, for the religious improvement of human life, on filial Piety and brotherly Charity, with or without more particular agreement in matters of doctrinal theology. Its object is, by relieving the Christian life from reliance on theological articles or external rites, to save it from conflict with the knowledge and conscience of mankind, and bring it back to the essential conditions of harmony between God and man."

The fourth step was taken in the following June, when a further meeting at the Freemasons' Tavern settled the constitution in final form, after amending one or two expressions in deference to objections.

In the June following (1869) a Public Anniversary service took place, attended by a large concourse of sympathisers from many sects, and conducted by a Baptist (Rev. W. Miall), a Unitarian (Rev. J. Martineau), a French Protestant (Pastor Coquerel), and an Anglican (Rev. C. Kegan Paul). A crowded meeting assembled on the following evening, and the prospects of the Union seemed most encouraging. Froude wrote that it was the one movement of the day, which he regarded with unqualified interest and sympathy, and Dr. Martineau could rejoice that "representative men joined it from every British church." But the committee's report, whilst able to record increasing evidence of concurrence with their object, had also to admit that much of this approval was yet latent, and that there was no corresponding accession of open adhesion. Further they had not been able to carry on the larger operation of the scheme.

The second annual meeting (June, 1870) showed, not prosperity but, a falling away; it marked, indeed, the beginning of the end. Projected plans of union came to nothing; reluctance and caution met every practical suggestion; unanticipated personal difficulty blocked up every way. Ultimately, but perhaps too quickly, it was deemed both right and expedient openly to admit defeat, and Dr. Martineau, with heavy heart, himself moved that the Free Christian Union should be dissolved, and this was done at a special meeting held at the end of the year (December 8).

Why did the Free Christian Union come to such an untimely ending?

The disbeliever in the possibility of Catholic unity amid doctrinal diversity will laugh at the very attempt, and say it was doomed from the outset.

The believer in an ultimate Church Catholic may think that the hour was not yet ripe, and call this attempt a well-meant, but ill-conceived, mistake. So be

it. To-day's failure must prepare the achievement of to-morrow.

But minor causes, in more or less number, seem together to have caused the disaster. The operative idea was not sufficiently single and clear. First it was to be a union of Free Trust congregations, but this aim, nay, its very existence even, was not sufficiently pressed upon the congregations, which alone were in a position, and might have been willing to join. As a result, three only did join the Union, viz., the Octagon, Norwich; Oakfield-road, Clifton; and Little Portland-street, London.

Next it was to comprise other congregations with different traditions, and also to include individuals—always a disastrous compromise. The total number of enrolled members was 146. Amongst these were some strong names. The laity were represented by Signor Bracciforti, W. S. Cookson, Edward Enfield, Rogers Field, James Heywood, W. B. Hodgson, Stanley Jevons, W. J. Lamport, Herbert New, F. Nettlefold, Follett Osler, W. Rathbone, Henry Sidgwick, Russell Scott, Wm. Shaen, Goldwin Smith, and Anna Swanwick. The ministry included Richard Armstrong, Charles Beard, Peter Clayden, Estlin Carpenter, Wm. Hy. Channing, Enfield Dowson, George Dawson, Robert Crompton Jones, William Knight, James Martineau, Wm. Miall, Kegan Paul, Richard Pilcher, Thos. Sadler, John James Tayler, John Hamilton Thom, Alfred Worthington, Charles Barnes Upton. Truly a goodly company, of whom five only are living to day. One would have imagined that such splendid men could have kept alive this Free Christian Union and established it on a lasting foundation. But they were all busy men, each with his own place and vocation, and separated in many cases by long distances, so that the bonds of cohesion were neither local nor feasible. Moreover, the death of John James Tayler removed Dr Martineau's chief supporter, and cast a sad shadow over the whole venture. Mr. Tayler's pamphlet, entitled "A Catholic Christian Church," was virtually an exposition of the principles of the Free Christian Union, and a defence against objections.

Then, again, the issue between the Theist and the Christian, which was raised at the very opening, gave a false impression of intended exclusion. It was stated that neither Miss Cobbe nor Francis Newman could join; but I find Frances Power Cobbe's name amongst the subscribing members, and to his dear friend Newman Dr. Martineau wrote: "I would adopt any name which would draw you into our brotherhood, for you are about the best Christian I know."

But how easy it is to criticise and pounce upon objections! The denominationalists of all sects condemned the Union, of course. Still, had there been a deep and wide desire for the realisation of this Catholic Church idea, all opposition would only have been a spur to greater and truer endeavour. But the distinctly Church idea was neither adequate nor urgent; it was not a compelling power. Union for union's sake can never take the place of that.

A generation has passed away. Would a Free Christian Union have any better prospect to-day?

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF RELIGIOUS LIBERALS AT BOSTON.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

"THE members of this Congress, the fourth biennial gathering organised by the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, having been received in Boston with a boundless hospitality, desire to express their heartfelt gratitude to all who have contributed to the signal success and happiness of these days of meeting, and especially to the Hon. Curtis Guild, Governor of Massachusetts, for his cordial reception of the Congress, to the ministers and members of the Churches of Boston and the vicinity, to the President of Harvard and other members of the University for their much appreciated welcome, and finally to the members of the executive and other local committees, under the leadership of Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, the President, and the Rev. Charles W. Wendte, the devoted secretary of the Council."

Such was the resolution passed by acclamation at a crowded meeting in the Saunders Theatre of Harvard University at the last full session of the International Congress on Thursday morning, September 26. At the same time the following resolution was also passed:—

"The members of this International Congress of Religious Liberals assembled in Boston, Mass., September 22-27, send greetings to those in all lands 'who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty,' and a message of special sympathy and encouragement to those who labour amid difficulty and hardship in lonely places, that they may stand fast, and realise the greatness of the fellowship to which they belong."

At the opening of that meeting the delegate of Manchester College, Oxford, handed to the President the following letter from Dr. Carpenter, the Principal of the College, who was the first President of the International Council, at the London meeting in 1901, and took an active part in the subsequent meetings, at Amsterdam in 1903 and Geneva in 1905, but to the general regret was unable to be present at the Boston meeting:—

Manchester College, Oxford,
August 14, 1907.

MY DEAR DR. ELIOT,—My friend, the Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., asks me to send through him a message to your great meeting from this College. Permit me, then, on its behalf to offer a few words of respectful and affectionate greeting. Its dedication "to Truth, to Liberty, to Religion," with no limiting restrictions of name or creed, points to the broad platform on which you are gathering brethren from so many Churches in fraternal concord; your Congress will supply a noble example of that faith which is growing stronger year by year throughout all civilised lands, in the fundamental unity that underlies the partial expressions of our different theologies. Great, indeed, are the labours that yet await us in the attempts to disengage the sentiments that unite from the thoughts that divide; to bring them into clear expression amid the rivalries of sects; and set them in vital relation with the social needs and reforming energies of our time. In this task we are sustained by each other's sympathy. The Churches which will assemble under your earnest and genial presidency may lie far apart from one another in various lands, under divers forms of ecclesiastical polity. But they will all feel the quickening of a wider life as they realise that they are not mere isolated units; they have a common fellowship, they form a company of their own in the great army which is vowed to the warfare with ignorance and indifference, with selfishness and sin.

May the meetings which have been organised with so much devotion fulfil your warmest hopes. May those who come from the East and the West, from the North and the South, feel that they do indeed sit down in that kingdom of God which is not the dream of a distant future, but the constant presence of the Spirit within us.

Believe me, with the warmest regards, always faithfully yours,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

The aspiration of that letter and the hopes of those who organised the Boston meetings have been amply fulfilled. Over two thousand enrolled members, far more than was anticipated, have put the utmost strain upon the organising ability of the local committee, but they rose magnificently to the occasion, and the sense of a great fellowship was uplifting and delightful throughout the days of meeting. Representatives from many lands were present, and from all parts of the United States. There were American delegates present who had travelled as far across their own continent as those from abroad who crossed the Atlantic, and this Congress was marked, beyond those which preceded it, by the cordial co-operation of members of different denominations in the country itself.

To the Sunday morning preaching in Boston and the vicinity of many ministers from afar, on September 22, we have already referred. That afternoon a long succession of friendly motor cars carried many of the guests from the head-quarters of the Congress, the American Unitarian Association building, 25, Beacon-street, through the pleasant sunshine by charming country ways to Wellesley and by the Women's College there, to West Newton, where the company was most hospitably entertained to afternoon tea in the Parish House of the Unitarian Church.

Then in the evening came the magnificent opening meeting in the Symphony Hall, where large numbers were turned away and the Hall was crowded by some 4,000 people.

Dr. S. A. Eliot presided, and a strong choir of the Handel and Haydn society rendered first of all with great effect, the chorale of Luther's hymn, "A Mighty Fortress is our God," after which the whole assembly joined in singing the following hymn, written by the Rev. F. L. Hosmer for the occasion:—

"For he looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God.—Hebrews xi. 10.

O Pilgrim city by the sea,
In thee we meet on kindred ground,
Pilgrims toward better things to be,
By one high faith and purpose bound.

The separating seas are crossed,
Each heart is understood of each;
On this our day of Pentecost
Fade out the lines of race and speech.

One heritage alike we share,
Unspeakable and still more vast,
The widening thought, the hope, the prayer,
The nobler life of all the past.

And one the goal to which we press
By toilsome paths as yet untrod,
Earth's longed-for reign of righteousness,
The shining City of our God.

O Thou through whom our fathers wrought,
From age to age our trust and stay,
Still keep us open to Thy thought
And speed us on our pilgrim way.

This was followed by a responsive reading of selections from the Psalms, and the chorus, "And the Glory of the Lord shall be Revealed." The Rev. T. R. Slicer, of New York, was the first speaker, and he took for his subject the first clause of the words chosen for the rejoicing utterance of the meeting: "Glory to God in the Highest, and on Earth Peace, and Goodwill to Men." "God and the Soul," said Mr. Slicer, are the only words essential to religion. Religion is natural to the human soul. There the revelation of Divine truth is found. But the soul must be true. Only transfigured character can be the instrument for the regeneration of the world. The choir then sang "How Lovely are the Messengers," and Dr. Edward Everett Hale followed with an address on "Peace on Earth." When he had first come upon the platform leaning on the arm of Dr. Booker Washington, the whole audience rose to give him an enthusiastic greeting. Dr. Hale recalled the fact that at the last meeting of the congress at Geneva the joyful news of peace between Russia and Japan had arrived, and he went on to speak of the lesson they had learnt in the United States through the establishment of their supreme court, and the unbroken peace they now enjoyed. That must be a lesson and example, he said, which he firmly believed would lead ultimately to the establishment of the United nations of the world. After his address this other hymn, also written for the occasion by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, was sung:—

Hail! Mount of God, whereon with reverent feet

The messengers of many nations meet;
Diverse in feature, argument, and creed,
One in their errand, brothers in their need.

Not in unwisdom are the limits drawn
That give far lands opposing dusk and dawn;
One sun makes bright the all-pervading air,
One fostering spirit hovers everywhere.

So with one breath may fervent souls aspire,
With one high purpose wait the answering fire.

Be this the prayer that other prayers controls,—

That light divine may visit human souls.

The worm that clothes the monarch spins
no flaw,
The coral builder works by heavenly law;
Who would to Conscience rear a temple pure
Must prove each stone and seal it, sound and sure.

Upon one steadfast base of truth we stand,
Love lifts her sheltering walls on either hand;
Arched o'er our head is Hope's transcendent dome,
And in the Father's heart of hearts our home.

The final address was by Dr. Booker Washington, on "Goodwill to Men," As an ex-slave and as an American citizen, he said, he counted it a privilege to be allowed to join in that welcome to the International Congress. "My first introduction to the world of religious thought was in this way: One morning before dawn, just prior to her departure for the work of the day, I recall the picture of my now sainted mother bending over my body as I lay upon a dirty floor, wrapped in a bundle of rags, earnestly praying that Abraham Lincoln might succeed, and that one day she and her boy might be free. I am here to-night to celebrate with you the answer to that prayer, I join all the more heartily in this festival of religious freedom of thought and activity because my race in America, as has been true of the oppressed in all lands, owes a peculiar debt of gratitude to those of the liberal faith." He went on to recall the names of those past souls of the liberal faith, who could not live with slavery in the land, Lincoln, Channing, Lowell, Whittier, Parker, James Freeman Clarke, and others, "and our own living saint and sage Edward Everett Hale." And he went on to express his unabated faith in human nature and the future of his race. A fine rendering of the "Hallelujah Chorus" and the Benediction pronounced by Dr. Hale brought the meeting to a close.

It was a magnificent beginning for the Congress, and a further brilliant occasion was the reception on Monday evening at the Hotel Somerset, when the President and the Governor of Massachusetts, the Hon. Curtis Guild, offered a very cordial welcome to the Congress, and a number of distinguished guests from abroad responded to the greeting. As each rose in turn, the band played a strain of the national anthem, and his country's flag was displayed. Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, replied for the English delegation, Professor Jean Réville for France, Professor Meyboom for Holland, Professor Pfeiderer for Germany, Professor Montet for Switzerland. Among the guests there were also several from the far East, Mr. Saichiro Kanda, secretary of the Japanese Unitarian Association, Tokyo, Mr. S. C. K. Rutnam of Colombo, Professor G. Subba, of Calicut, a representative of the Brahmo Samaj, Mr. D. J. Joshi, of Bombay, Mr. Barakatullah, an Indian Mohammedan gentleman, Mr. R. R. Wornt, of Surinam, Dutch Guiana, and others.

Monday morning and afternoon were devoted to meetings of the American National Conference, which curtailed its usual Autumn meetings within that limit, so as to unite with the International. The meetings were held in Tremont Temple, which is a great hall, the Sunday home of a Baptist Church, which was in festive garb, with mottoes of a free spiritual faith prominently displayed, and the names of many leaders of all countries ranged round the hall, the names of Channing and Martineau holding together the place of honour over the platform. The Hon. Carroll D. Wright presided, the report of the Council was presented by the Rev. Paul R. Frothingham, of Arlington Street Church, and a number of fine addresses were given. These are all published in full in the Christian Register of September 26, and we hope that readers of the INQUIRER may also have some of them before long. Monday afternoon was also generously given to the guests from abroad for an excursion to Concord, which in spite of drenching rain was greatly enjoyed. A special train took them past Thoreau's Walden Pond to Concord, where they were met by a large number of carriages, and were driven by friends (Miss Emerson, in spite of the heavy rain being one of them) to the points of interest, the Concord bridge, to the beautiful cemetery, to the Alcott and Emerson houses, and finally to the First Church, where tea was most hospitably provided.

Then with Tuesday, September 24, began the regular work of the Congress.

Attempting a record of this crowded week, one is daunted by the mass of material, and the impossibility of furnishing any real account of some fifty papers and addresses which have been given during the sessions of the Congress. Some of the papers will appear in full in THE INQUIRER. Here we must be content with a general description of what took place.

There was morning prayer in King's Chapel on each day of the regular sessions of the Congress, and on Wednesday it was a communion service that was held, conducted by the Revs. H. N. Brown, minister of the chapel, Dr. S. A. Eliot, and Dr. C. G. Ames, who gave a beautiful address. Among the eight ministers and laymen who helped in the distribution were the Governor of Massachusetts and Judge Lowell. General Oliver O. Howard, one of the surviving and greatly loved heroes of the Civil War, was among the congregation.

At ten o'clock the sessions opened, on Tuesday and Wednesday, in Tremont Temple, which is close by King's Chapel, and on Thursday in the Sanders Theatre of Harvard University out at Cambridge. On the morning of Tuesday, September 24, Dr. S. A. Eliot gave his presidential address and struck the true note of fellowship, and an inclusive and far-reaching sympathy. Here, he said, "we emphasise the convictions that all good men hold in common, we unseal the fountains of idealism, where the thirsty soul, weary of materialism, has so often refreshed itself. We renew faith and courage, and we return to our homes reinforced by a new sense of the grandeur of our life together and the irresistible attraction of our common hopes and ideals." The report of the secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendte, followed, in which he was able to amend the figures in the copy printed beforehand, and announce that over 2,000 had enrolled themselves as members of the Congress.

Among the papers a considerable number were reports of great interest on the present religious condition of the various countries represented. Thus, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie spoke of "the Unitarian Movement in England," the Rev. A. Webster of "The Progress of Theology in Scotland," Professor Jean Réville of "The Religious Crisis in France," and Dr. Max Fischer, of Berlin, of "The Protestanten Verein of Germany." Another aspect of the situation in France was presented by the Abbe Houtin, of Paris, one of the leaders of the Liberal movement within the Roman Catholic Church, and Professor Rade, of Marburg, editor of the Christliche Welt, also spoke on "The Religious Situation in Germany." Professor Bonet-Maury reported on the past and present condition of the Protestants of France. Professor Lindeberg spoke for Sweden, Mr. Theo Berg for Denmark and Norway, Dr. Rochat, of Geneva, for his part of Switzerland, Professor Groenewegen, of Leiden, for Holland, Dr. Tony André for Italy, Professor Masaryk, of Prague, for Austria, and the Rev. N. Jozan for Hungary.

The numbers of papers was so great that on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons the Congress had to be divided into sections, which met simultaneously, and on Wednesday evening also there was a double section. On Tuesday afternoon a section on Religious Education met in King's Chapel, under the presidency of Principal Southworth, of Meadville, when addresses were given by the Rev. H. T. Cope, secretary of the Religious Education Association, the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, and others. A section on Theological Progress met in the Pilgrim Hall of the Congregational House, exactly opposite the A. U. A. Buildings, under the presidency of the Rev. G. A. Gordon, when the Rev. C. J. Street read his paper on the "Relation of Christianity to Religion," and the Rev. G. Schoenholzer, of Zürich, gave a stirring address. Professor Eucken, of Jena, was unable to be in Boston for the Congress, but he contributed a thoughtful paper on what is required for a genuine Free Christianity. A third section on "New Americans," under the presidency of Dr. E. E. Hale, was to have been in Channing Hall, but was transferred, as was the Women's Meeting next day, to the larger Ford Hall, close by. At that meeting, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe was present, and said a few words, and next morning she attended the greater part of the session.

The sections on Wednesday included one on "Comity and Fellowship," over which the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, presided, when addresses were given by Dr. J. M. Whiton, chairman of the New York Conference of Religion, Mr. H. W. Wilbur, secretary of the Society for the Promotion of Friends' Principles, and others. In the section on "Social and Public Service," in the Old South Church, where Dr. J. H. Crooker presided, Mr. Fred Maddison, M.P., gave an address and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant read his paper on "The World War with Intoxicants." The section on Women's Work in Ford Hall was so crowded that an overflow meeting was held in Channing Hall. In this section

Miss van Eck of Leiden spoke of the work of the Postal Mission and other liberal religious work in Holland, and the Rev. G. von Petzold on Women as Ministers. Over a fourth section on "Press and Publication" Dr. Bisbee, editor of the Universalist Leader, presided. Among the papers read at the session in the Second Church on Wednesday evening was one on "Religious Forces in Japan," by Mr. Saichiro Kanda, secretary of the Japanese Unitarian Association, Tokyo, and another on "The Ideals of the Brahmo Somaj," by Professor G. Subba, of Calicut, India.

The Congress sermon was preached in Arlington-street Church, by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow, on Tuesday evening, September 24. The church was crowded, and for those who could not get in another service was held in the First Church. At Arlington-street, the Rev. P. R. Frothingham began the service with the words of the address from Dr. Martineau's "Tenth Service," followed by the hymn, "O God, our help in ages past." Isaiah xxxv. was the lesson, and the choir rendered some beautiful music. The service and sermon together lasted considerably over two hours, and that at the close of an exhausting day.

The text was from Psalm cxxx., "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord . . . for with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption," and the sermon, which we hope our readers will before long have in full, was a very earnest plea for greater depth of spiritual life, with a warning against the shallowness which too easily besets liberal thinking in religion. Dr. Hunter quoted at the outset the saying of the old mystic, "If thou sinkest deep enough into the human, thou wilt find the divine." The closing hymn was Eliza Scudder's "Thou Grace Divine, encircling all."

A pleasant interlude in the sessions of Wednesday was the reception at the State House by the Governor of Massachusetts, who was attended by several members of his staff, and cordially welcomed hundreds of members of the Congress.

The last full session of the Congress was held, as we have already noted, at Cambridge, in the Sanders Theatre, of Harvard University. The morning prayer in King's Chapel was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, after which a number of special cars left the subway station for Cambridge.

In Sanders Theatre, the Hon. John D. Long, formerly Governor of the State, presided, an address of welcome was given by President Eliot, who said that nowhere could that Congress be more welcome than at Harvard, since its principles were those on which the University were founded—pure religion and perfect freedom, and voluntary co-operation in the service of mankind.

After the President's welcome, the resolutions already recorded were passed, and a third resolution, fixing the next meeting of the International Council to be held in the year 1910, the centenary of the birth of Theodore Parker, and the 400th anniversary of the birth of Francis David, the martyr bishop of the Unitarians of Hungary; and cordially accepting the invitation received from the Protestantverein of Germany to hold the meeting in Berlin.

Professor Montet then gave an address on "John Calvin and the Reformation Monument at Geneva," after which a resolution was proposed by Dr. J. M. Whiton, stating "That this Congress has learnt with great satisfaction of the movement initiated at Geneva, and seconded in various European countries and in America, to mark in 1909 the 400th anniversary of the birth of John Calvin by a monument in that city commemorating that illustrious man, and the influences proceeding from him and the great men to whom he passed on the torch of progress for the advancement of freedom, education, and ethical religion." And further, "Recognising a just distinction between what Calvin inherited from his great master Augustine, and what he himself contributed to the thought of his time," the resolution commended the proposed memorial to "all who stand for a free church in a free state, for individual liberty under individual responsibility and for the religious unity of all faithful souls."

When the resolution was put, there was a considerable volume of dissent in the crowded theatre, but it was declared by the chairman to be carried, and this further resolution was then passed with practical unanimity:

"That this Congress also expresses its sympathy with the action taken towards the erection of a monument in the ancient city of Vienne, France, in commemoration of its former distinguished citizen and good physician, Michael Servetus, a martyr of freedom of thought and religious veracity."

After this, Professor Pfeleiderer delivered in English a valuable lecture on "The Tendency of Positive Religions to Universal Religion," and Professor Peabody, in the short time remaining before lunch, showed some interesting historical pictures of Harvard University on the screen, with explanatory comments.

The guests from abroad were most hospitably entertained to lunch at the Harvard Union, and the American members at the Parish House of the First Church (Dr. Crothers'), and parties were afterwards taken round the University grounds and buildings and to the Longfellow house in Cambridge, while later in the afternoon Dr. S. A. Eliot, president of the congress received the members at his house for afternoon tea. That evening a brilliant dinner was given by the Unitarian Club of Boston at the Hotel Somerset, where a company of about 400 assembled, and after dinner Dr. Crothers, who presided, gave a delightful address of welcome, and among those who responded were Mr. Herbert Lawford, ex-president of the London Laymen's Club; Miss Richmond of New Zealand; Mr. Fred Maddison, M.P., and the Rev. J. Lloyd Jones, of Chicago.

On Friday, September 27, an excursion to Plymouth, with its memorials of the Pilgrim Fathers, brought the Congress to a fitting close, while on Sunday, September 29, unfortunately a desperately stormy day, which decimated congregations, there were many preachings in and about Boston by visitors from abroad.

This is a poor, bare record of a delightful and inspiring week, but it must now suffice with a final note of the new Committee which was appointed: Professor G. Boros, Kolozsvár, Hungary; Rev. W. Copeland

Bowie, London; Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, Oxford, Dr. S. A. Eliot, Boston, Mass.; Professor Erdmans, Leiden; Dr. M. Fischer, Berlin; Rev. G. A. Gordon, Boston, Mass.; Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, Amsterdam; Professor Montet, Geneva; Professor Pfeleiderer, Berlin; Professor Rade, Marburg; Professor Réville, Paris; Rev. G. Schoenholzer, Zurich; Miss M. B. Westenholtz, Copenhagen; Rev. C. W. Wendte, Boston, Mass., secretary.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE CAMP AND THE PICNIC.

THERE were twelve of us in all. We were men, that is, students, for in truth we were but boys of the same university, and for the most part of one college. We had laid our plans for a holiday expedition up the river. We decided to divide our forces into two parties which formed the crews of the two boats, which were re-christened for the occasion the Hippopotamus, which, as you know, means "river-horse," and the Crocodile, which means "he'll have you if he can." The preparations, which demanded great attention for weeks beforehand and seriously threatened to ruin our chances of success at the exams., were at last brought to a successful conclusion, and the Hippopotamus and the Crocodile were launched with their light-hearted crews clad in whites and sweaters—juvenile readers will ask their fathers, please, the meaning of unfamiliar words—and cargoes consisting of tents and ground-cloths, kettles, saucepans, frying-pans, tripods for suspending the witches' cauldron, bags of bread and oatmeal, and jam-jars full of butter as well as of jam, crockery, dry grocery in neat packets, knives and forks, rugs and coats and "macks," matches, soap, a four-gallon earthenware water-bottle for each boat, &c., &c., &c. The kind of craft selected for the trip was that known amongst boatmen as a randan, which, like some of our merchant ships, is more adapted for safety and capacity than for speed. Up in the bows sits one man with a long oar, away in the stern sits another, and between them sits a third with a pair of shorter and lighter oars known as sculls. A fourth man steers, and the other two go to sleep or otherwise amuse themselves until it is time for them to take their turn at the oars. Sometimes a song enlivens the way, and there is more chaff than grain in the boats, much debating of plans, and even occasionally of politics, and now and again a race between the two crews to the next lock gates. So the day wore on until late in the afternoon, when, a suitable camping ground having been sighted—a dry and level patch of grass, and some trees near by for companionship and as a source of fuel—we moored our boat to the bank, disembarked, brought all our cargo ashore, jumped into the water and had a swim, both Crocodiles and Hippos, crawled out and set to work to rig up the tent and cook the evening meal. Now there was a rule in camp to which everybody was required to agree, and did so willingly, and this was to leave no camping ground the worse for our dwelling upon it. There were many packages, which meant much papers which might easily have been left about; and empty bottles which had contained pickles or lemonade or what-not, which might have afforded a moment's amusement if flung at the trunk of a tree, or pelted by stones and broken to shivers. Orange-peel and potato parings and other rubbish readily collect at a camp; but never a sign of any of these was allowed to be about, still less left behind when we continued our voyage.

There is no camp supper without a fire, but even the fire had strict orders to leave no sign of itself, and not even to injure a blade of grass. The order was obeyed. The cook's first operation was to take his big clasp knife and cut out a circular sod, a foot or more across and with plenty of soil upon it. In the cavity thus made the fire was kindled with dry sticks gathered from the trees. In the camp I am now recalling we remained for a day and two nights, re-embarking the second morning after our arrival. Just for the delight of it we kept the fire going all night, and took turns at watching. This gave one an opportunity of seeing and hearing some things he would not be likely to observe at home in Manchester or London. The plop of the water-rat into the river, the V-shaped ripple extending on either side in an ever-enlarging tale of his track, as he swims in the moonlight across to the opposite bank; the owl, swooping like a ghost along the hedge and catching in his talons the mice which, in avoiding the perils of the daylight, have only betrayed themselves to a still greater peril of the darkness; the night-jar making his strange, weird rattle in a neighbouring copse; while a corn-crake, safely hidden alike from view and from pursuit in the adjoining field of standing wheat, continues for hours to utter his untiring, aggravating croak, despite all the names and sticks and stones the perplexed sentinel hurls at him. The guardian of the camp makes up his fire and lies down beside it, watching the crimson glow in the white powder of ash and feeling the warmth on his cheek, until it is time for him to turn in—for it is between one and two o'clock—and call up his comrade, who will be able to watch the mist over the reeds getting whiter and whiter as the sun comes up in his golden chariot; so he calls the mist the dust of his wheels.

On the second morning the captain of each boat summons his men for the start. Both tents are taken down, and, along with the ground-cloths, rolled up and packed in bags. The hardware is washed, polished, stowed away. All other goods, neatly done up, disappear in the stern of the boat. Then, waste papers and oddments being consigned to the fire, water is poured plentifully over the ashes and fire-hole, the turf is brought out from the cool shelter of long grass in which it has been kept fresh, trodden carefully into its place, and a bucket of water poured over it. This ceremony was known as the sacrifice to the Spirit of the Camp.

A few minutes after we were afloat. "Time!" cried the steersman as our oars went into the water.

* * * * *

I had a long walk in the country yesterday. As I crossed Hedley Heath about noon I noticed that a large wagonette had just drawn up, and the party were alighting for a picnic under the grove of pine-trees at the top corner of the heath. It is a lovely spot, shady and with that touch of solemnity which pine-trees always have. Being so high up and exposed to south and west, there was always wind enough on the calmest day to make music in their tops. Just now, at the latter end of August, the heather is splendid. There is a sheer half-mile of royal purple immediately before you. And then, as you gaze over the great plain stretching from the foot of the hill to the sea twenty miles away, what a view there is! What corn-fields spread out in laughing wealth! What wide billows of dark woodland! What fair, sunny meads and nestling homesteads! See the cattle feeding, no bigger than bees. Trace that narrow serpentine track until it is lost from sight on this great chequered board of green and gold and blue. It is the railway line. Did you not hear that faint whistle? Here comes the train, and, like its guardian spirit, a white snake flies along just over it, keeping pace with it all the way.

On my way home in the evening I returned by the ridge. I should be in time to see the sunset from the pine grove. I was hoping that the picnickers had left. As I drew nearer I could hear no sounds of voices. Yes, they had gone. I had the grove, the heath, the plain, the sun all to myself. What a day to be remembered the townsfolk must have had! And now the great world of peace and beauty is left to me. I will stay till the dusk and the dew; I will take off my boots and rest my feet in the sweet air, in this goodly ground. Stay! I had kicked against a broken bottle. One of the ponies which are turned loose here might tread upon it—they do sometimes, and hurt themselves badly on the splinters of glass. I spent several minutes gathering up the fragments and dropping them into the midst of a furze-bush. Then I went on, but as I came up to the rounded bank of fine soft grass at the edge of the firs, I was hurt to see how strips had been carved out of the turf in the form of letters—the initials, doubtless, of the spoilers. Papers, banana skins, a battered fruit-basket, a bit of torn ribbon, littered the ground all about, while the embers of a fire which had been lit on the roots of one of the pines, and near enough to the stem to scorch it, were still smouldering.

The sun went down. I could not watch it. It was hidden behind clouds of wrath to me. I hurried on. That sacred spot had been desecrated, and I longed for the tempest to roar over the hills and scour the woods of the abomination.

SPEAKING of the Baptist Union meetings, it transpires that when the President called on the assembled delegates to rise and repeat the Apostles' Creed after the Bishop of Liverpool, a considerable sprinkling refrained from doing so. Protests have subsequently found their way to the Press, not merely on the ground that the Creed contains statements to which they cannot assent, but because liberal Baptists prefer not to pledge themselves publicly to any general confession of faith.

LONDON, OCTOBER 12, 1907.

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."

WITH the present month of October the Hibbert Journal begins its sixth year of life. It has increased continuously in importance and influence, and has gained a world-wide recognition. An American Editorial Board has been formed as a result of Mr. JACKS' recent visit to the United States, and henceforth one-third of the articles in each number will be written by Americans. We cordially welcome this development. No two nations are more capable of helping one another in noble thought and useful action. They are united by the bonds of a common language, by many memories and traditions, and by an ingrained affection which, in spite of occasional strains, is far deeper and stronger than the alliances with foreign nations formed under the stress of political exigencies.

The present number of the Hibbert begins with a philosophical article of great interest by Professor WOODBRIDGE, of Columbia University, and is followed by a brilliant article by Mr. JACKS on very much the same subject. No one reading these articles can think of philosophy as "harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose."

Professor WOODBRIDGE's article on "Naturalism and Humanism" begins with a very sympathetic account of Naturalism, or the mechanical theory of the Universe. He regards this theory, indeed, as "emotionally bankrupt. In such a world one star does not differ from another star in glory: the difference is to be expressed directly in terms of mass, and inversely in terms of the span of the distance. To speak of glory in such a world is to speak theatrically." But he considers naturalism to be "the superficial exhibition of a profounder view of life." That profounder view is the realisation that "man is a part of nature, carried on by her forces to work the work of intelligence. In him she bursts forth into sustained consciousness of her own evolution." Man "is no mere commentator on the world or spectator of it: he is one of its integrations, so to speak, a supreme instance where nature has measurably evaluated herself. His comments are nature's self-estimate." These words of Professor WOODBRIDGE might be regarded as the text of Mr. JACKS' article.

Mr. JACKS has accustomed us to look for an article by him in the October Hibbert. We are particularly interested in the present one, partly because it is philosophical, and therefore in a line with his own special studies, and partly because it contains the promise of another. Mr. JACKS' thesis is, not only that man is a product of the universe, but that man's interpretations and theories of the universe are products of the universe. "The philosopher who explains how all things come in must not forget to explain how he happens to come in himself. The secret of the universe being, for instance, matter and force, is it a fact of no significance that the universe has somehow managed to find out and publish its own secret, and to grow hilarious, contented, sadly pessimistic or heroically defiant, as the case may be, over the discovery?" "Three schools of philosophy," he says, "Dualism, Naturalism, and Pragmatism, either beg, borrow, or steal a point of view clear outside the universe before they can tell you anything about it." In a highly original, and even amusing, manner he ascribes this tendency to "the tyranny which ideas of private ownership exercise in the thinking of the West." "We talk," he says, "of man having experience, having impulses right and wrong; having a soul which he may sell; and so on through a very auctioneer's catalogue of man's effects. But who is the owner of these job-lots? He is behind the scenes; but if you seek him there you will not find him. When you think you have got him, he turns instantly into one of his own possessions. Who, then, is man? Is he the selfless owner of himself? We flounder in a realm of nonsense trying to catch the hare we cannot cook."

Mr. JACKS hardly does justice here to the Dualist, who would say man is a soul. No sensible Dualist would talk about man's having a soul. He would say I have a body and am a soul. Perhaps even this is dangerously loose and implies that the body is a corpse. SHAKESPEARE avoided that difficulty when he makes HAMLET sign himself, "Yours, while this machine is to him."

Mr. JACKS finds a further example of the tyranny of the idea of private ownership in the ear-marking of particular philosophies as belonging to individuals. "Whose is it? disturbs the significance of any interpretation of the universe we may happen to consider. It is PLATO's; it is SPINOZA's; it is KANT's; it is HAECKEL's. We cannot rid ourselves of the obsession of the possessive case." This appropriating temper is most active in the sphere of philosophy and theology. "My philosophy will always pass current; my religion is condoned but my science is absurd." "The subject of science may safely be trusted to walk abroad by itself; but metaphysical entities must always be accompanied by the owner, and led by a string."

The sum of the whole argument is that "to one who professes monism, every interpretation of the universe is itself an element in the universe to be interpreted. To every monist the most thought-compelling fact of the universe is the continual effort it seems to be making to get its own nature expressed. Every system of philosophy, so far as it is true, he will regard as the self-confession of Reality."

But now comes the unsolved problem with which Mr. JACKS leaves us face to face. If every philosophy is the self-confession of the universe, why does it confess itself so variously to various men? Why does the universe tell so many contradictory stories? If it told the truth to SPINOZA, then it must have been playing tricks with Dr. MARTINEAU. It looks as if the universe, on monist principles, were not quite to be trusted. Whence comes error? Mr. JACKS recognises this as the gravest difficulty of his monistic system, and promises to deal with it in another article. A stubborn dualist, ignorant of HEGEL, might add that there is another difficulty which Monism has to face, and which he does not believe Monism can answer. Whence comes sin? If all human thought is part of the self-expression of the universe, so are all human actions. Many thoughts are what we call untrue; many deeds are what we call wrong. The plain man, on a mental level with MOLIERE's cook, is inclined to ask, how is it that the universe tells lies and commits crimes? If we are to retain any respect for the universe and for ourselves as part of the universe, this must be explained. If not, we, who are manifestations of the universe, and hopelessly involved in its performances, must greet one another like Roman Augurs, with a wink, and confess that we are shams.

We shall look forward with the deepest interest to Mr. JACKS' treatment of this problem.

SIR JOHN GORST, lecturing recently to the Edinburgh branch of the Independent Labour Party on "The Power of Democracy in the United Kingdom," declared that neither of the older political parties had shown itself able to gratify the wishes of the people for social amelioration and reform. He believed one of the chief reasons lay in the fact that their members did not themselves suffer from the necessity for these in the same degree as did the poorer workers. But it was the poverty and ignorance of the people which seemed to him to be the greatest hindrance to reform and menace to the country. If only the democracy were instructed and wise, they might raise their condition to that of the Swiss or of the New Zealanders. But working towards that end, he urged them to cherish the political independence of the Labour Party.

THE value of these eloquent essays by Dr. K. C. Anderson is that they show us the fight proceeding within the camp—if the general body of Nonconformity can any longer be regarded as such a solid entity; and we learn from them what are the particular points selected in these days for attack and defence. It is instructive to notice both how Dr Anderson's treatment resembles and how it differs from the manner and method of our own non-subscribing churches. Perhaps it is just because we are free that we pay more attention to the need of re-constructing, whereas the New Theology men still fill their pages with challenge, and the cry that rallies for the onslaught. This joy of battle no doubt accounts for some haste, and for a manner of conviction that is sometimes a little self-satisfied, a little vain.

All this, however, is perhaps naturally incidental to any fresh and fascinating movement. And surely the message here delivered is momentous enough. The writer will have nothing to do with compromises and saving clauses. We meet with no mystifying identifications such as "Jesus is God, and so are you." He asks for honest truth. "A perfect passion for vague statements seems to dominate the pulpits. A doctrine may mean anything or everything. Only be vague enough, and one may be as orthodox as one pleases." The Reformation creeds and confessions "cannot be revised" and we must begin all over again. "We do not say that the Nicene Creed is wrong, and the Sermon on the Mount is right, and that the Christian Church to-day should reject the first and adhere to the second. Such is the assumption that underlies the cry that has become the new cant of our day, 'Return to Jesus. Go back to the first century.' It is impossible ever to return to the old, whether the old be the Nicene Creed or the teaching of Paul or Jesus." So our author is very radical, and remains oblivious to the need there is of developing from that solid heritage transmitted to our time, the Christian consciousness which is so much more and greater than any formulated doctrine, new or old. Yet he might have learnt how impossible is a sudden breach with the past, and how continuous even down to our day is the real development, from the skilful sketch which he gives (p. 137, &c.), of the quite modern evolutions in Trinitarian doctrine. These consist (1) in a sort of Patristic conception, according to which the atoning sufferings of Jesus are transferred to the Father, and Christ is practically put in the place of the Father. (2) In putting Christ in the place of the Holy Spirit, as in the phrase "The Living Christ." Much insight is shown in these discussions, and, similarly, the best part of the book is that which points out how vital is the truth of the Immanence of God in view of the salient features of popular Romanism. Thus, saint worship and Mariolatry and transubstantiation are quoted as examples of that fatal tendency to remove the living God further and further into the background, whenever the sense of "Immanence" is blurred over, and mediation is interpreted to mean substitution, whether on the divine side or the human.

In all matters, indeed, where criticism has to detect the sources of "orthodox" error, our author's probe is very sure. And, no doubt, large numbers of people are just at the stage of development where they can be helped and encouraged by such a genial, whole-hearted faith in the possibility of a present revelation, a God here and now. They will therefore accept the vigour of the attack upon the older ideas as a substitute for the evangelical note, which is certainly missing. Others will desiderate not merely the possibility of a revelation, but the substance of one, and this, again, is scarcely supplied. The idea of God here propounded, is that somewhat emasculated substitute for a Heavenly Father, the unity of things, "a system of essential relations 'with part fitted to part, a living, breathing, growing system, slowly evolving itself, with a precision and a symmetry that finds its symbol in the unfolding structure of the rose or the forest tree'" The universe "is an organism, not a mechanism; there is a background of unity which renders it impossible for anything to be really independent, complete in itself, and utterly separate from everything else." And Emerson's lines from "Brahma," "They reckon ill who leave me out," &c., are (rather badly) quoted. Well, no doubt, it is partly a question of words, and Dr. Anderson's Theism is hearty and vigorous enough. But so far as the statement of it goes, there seems to be no religious future for Brahminism of this kind. This "unity in diversity" teaching chimes sympathetically with one of the potent philosophical dialects of the day. Further, one can say for it that it voices a profound and perennial need of man's mind—the need of finding unity in our world of experience. This has been one of the compelling forces that have driven the men of our time at a breathless pace along the path of natural science, and there is no wonder that they sometimes mistake one aspect for the whole, law for God, unity for Reality. The Immanence teaching of which we have heard so much lends itself with ease to such half-views. The All, the Unity which Science exhibits to us, is taken to be the proper foundation for our thought of God. This result, however, is only got by confusing different senses of the word "unity." Let us consider that the original and inexpugnable "urge," which compels us to seek for unity in the world, has several quite distinct forms, and that trouble arises from confusing these. (1) There is the intellectual demand for connectedness, law, order, in things. This is the special interest of Science, and its key-note is Inclusion. The world is thus thought of as a whole with parts, or as a living body made up of organs. From this point of view, Immanence means that "the unity of the whole is immanent in all parts," just as the tragic-spirit of Macbeth is immanent even in the porter scene. (Professor H. Jones' view, in the Hibbert Journal, "Divine Immanence") (2) There is the unity which we find in personal relationships. At its highest, this is equivalent to what Jesus prayed for, "that they may be one, even as we are." But it may subsist in other degrees. A horde of savage men in a state of quarrel and fight is still a unity; for they could not even fight unless there were certain reciprocal relations between them. Again, while this is all the unity that at present actually exists among them, there is also an ideal, potential unity, for their dissensions will by and by teach them to agree, and out of the mere reciprocity which blows teach will spring a truer reciprocity of brotherhood. Thus the lower unity predicts the higher. Immanence from this point of view means the interpenetration of persons by the personal influence of others. Another example of this would be the hypnotic influence by which a general imposes his will and spirit upon a great army of men. (3) There is the unity of a moral kingdom. This subsists between a ruler and his subjects, whether obedient or disobedient; between a father and his son, whether prodigal or repentant. It does not mean agreement. The laws are there, even when they are broken. Conscience voices this unity, both in approval and blame. Immanence here means the permeation of our judgments upon life by the moral standard. Such unity may co-exist with any amount of "diversity." "My brothers!" cries Carlyle. "Yes, they are my brothers; hence this rage and sorrow." Now, when we have considered these different meanings of "unity," we shall see how little it expresses what religion means by "God." The nearest approach to the religious idea is in the unity of moral relations, where, as we have seen, unity has to include not merely diversity, but antagonism and rebellions. But religion also aims at the unity of personal influence, the communion, where God's will shall be all in all; and this is clearly not the same thought as what we have called the unity of a moral kingdom. Again, religion has an interest, although a subordinate interest, in the unity of the physical world, whose ideal is inclusion. But it is very plain that these are quite different matters, and must at all costs be distinguished in our thought. To allow the ideal of Science (the first kind of unity) to dominate us in our religion means that we forego the sense of personality. To allow the second (personal) kind of unity to rule means that a thin mysticism will blot out the sense of sin. We must begin with a moralised universe, for the unity which we find either in the region of physical science, or in that of personal communion, is not on all fours with the "diversity" of our moral experience. Neither physical immanence nor personal immanence will give us moral transcendence. And when we have got so far, of what particular use is the formula of "unity in diversity"? Unity is doubtless one aspect of the religious view of the world; but to tear it out of its living context and make it stand for the whole is disastrous.

P.S.—Since the above was written, Mr. Jupp in his last interesting letter has admitted that unity cannot be reasoned out and is given only in feeling. The explanation of this seems to lie in what is said above as to personal union.

OPENING OF THE FREE LIBRARY AT ILKLEY BY DR. COLLYER.

ON Wednesday, October 2, Dr. Collyer fulfilled the special purpose which brought him across the Atlantic in his 84th year, by opening a Free Library in the town of Ilkley, where he worked as a blacksmith for 12 years. The ceremony began with the presentation of a gold key to Dr. Collyer, with which he opened the new buildings. In an inner room were two busts, one of Dr. Collyer, and the other of Dr. Andrew Carnegie, who has given £3,000 to the Library. After the busts had been unveiled, an address was presented to Dr. Collyer. The following extracts from his reply, in the Ilkley Free Press, will interest his many friends.

DR. COLLYER'S ADDRESS.

Dr. Collyer, who met with a resounding ovation, the whole audience rising in their places, spoke of the intense pleasure the receipt of the address had given him. When their invitation came, some months ago, to be with them on this memorable day, from his dear friend Mr. Jackson, his first impulse was to claim exemption on the ground of his age. It was a far cry from New York to old Ilkley, and, like the tribe of Ephraim in the Scriptures, he had begun to think that his strength lay in sitting still. "But," added Dr. Collyer, "my children said, 'You must go, father, by all means.' And so here I am."

LIFE'S RECOLLECTIONS.

Proceeding, Dr. Collyer said it was 69 years since he came over Denton Moor by the short cut to Ilkley, where he was to serve his time to John Birch, the blacksmith, who had taught his (the speaker's) father the noble craft, and had promised to do the same to the son. He was then turned fourteen, and graduated, as the custom was, when he was twenty-one; but did not leave the forge, because the old man wanted him to stay and offered higher wages than he had ever paid before. These only amounted to 7s. per week, with meat and lodgings. (Laughter.) So he worked for this old man until he died, and then for the man who took the business until the spring of 1850, when he laid down his hammer, doffed his leather apron, rolled down his shirt sleeves, shook hands with his employer and said "Good-bye" with a tone of regret, because he was a good man to work for and would fain have had him stay.

He could not stay because he had made up his mind to emigrate to the United States, and so in mid-April he and his newly-married wife set their face westward on the good ship Roscius. She landed them in New York in four weeks to the day. This was almost 12 years after he crossed Denton Moor to learn his craft, and he touched the memory because, as he looked backward from the eminence of his many years, these years came home to him now as perhaps the most pregnant of his life—the years when we bridged the space between our boyhood and manhood, and had come into possession of our chart and compass, and were ready to "make the spoon or spoil the horn."

STRAIGHT TO ILKLEY.

'And before this journey to the Motherland—the last I can hope to make—I have crossed the ocean seven times to see my kith and kin first, and then make a bee-line, as they say, to Ilkley; with my heart in my mouth—to stand beside my graves in your churchyard, drop in to see the old friends whose life was blended with mine, and talk with them of the days that are no more, and yet are for evermore while I live on the earth; steal into the old church and touch there the memories of the living and the dead, mellowed by the enchantment of time and distance. For, like Jacob and Esau in the ancient days, we all set up our stones of memorial by the hearths, the altars, and the graves. May I say, also, that when I left the dear old town, and yet took it with me, there was a touch of longing in my heart that I should not be forgotten or be as the mist I still remember, that would linger on a soft summer morning over one spot in the west woods, to be caught up in the forenoon by the sun. And this might well have come true when, on each journey to my Motherland and my town, more and more were missing I would fain have found in the old homes; and now there is not one man—so far as I know—of my own age whose hand I can clasp as a friend of the time when I left Ilkley 57 years ago.

THE BENEFACTOR.

'But my welcome when I came over nine years ago to the new Ilkley brushed away the touch of fear, and now you have honoured me beyond my dreams or my deserving, for which I can only thank you from a full heart. You might well have done this for my friend, Andrew Carnegie, whose gift is enclosed in this beautiful structure, and who is worth more than all his wealth as he stands on his own sturdy feet, and pours out wealth without stint or stay for all noble uses in the old world and the new. I knew a good man many years ago who was very rich, but by no means generous in his giving, and would say it was not to be expected that those who gather much money should give much, because the hand that holds the money takes the strength from the other hand that should give. But with your friend and mine the hands hold the balance even, or if there is any distinction the hand that gives is still the stronger.

NO LEISURE IN YOUTH.

'When I crossed Denton Moor all those years ago, I had worked in the factory on the Washburn almost seven years, and through most of the time 13 hours five days in the week and 11 on Saturday; but I had read all the books I could lay my hands on, all the books in the house that would stay my hunger, and all my father could borrow in the factory commune—I brought the hunger with me to read on the old terms—by daylight and candle-light, and when these failed, by the open fire, so that Master Birch said I should be blind if I kept on before I was out of my time. And so it has been down to this day. The story is told of a minister who went to see one of his members, a woman of great age, and said to her: "Would you tell me for what you feel most thankful as you look back on your long life?" And she answered, "Good victuals, sir." It was a good confession, in which more was meant than met the good man's ear; yet, if you should ask me the question, I should answer, "Good books." And so I say with a noble man: "God be thanked for good books that are now within the reach of all who will read them, and genius sends its light and fire into the poor cottage as into the mansion." "I have sought for repose everywhere," St. Francis says also, "and have found it only in a little corner with a little book." Joseph Choate, our ambassador, tells me how he went with Wendell Holmes, our good poet, to call on James Russell Lowell when he was laid up with rheumatism; and when the poet asked him how he fared, he said: "I have forgotten my pains; I am reading 'Rob Roy.'" (Laughter.)

THE SELECTION OF BOOKS.

'And now may I tell you what I mean by good books from my own experience, for I can find no better way. There are books which stimulate you as the wines do, of which you can sip slowly, feeling the glow and glamour, to be aware in time that you want something which holds a fiercer fire. And books you can read as some take drugs, to relieve their pain, or shut out the desolation, or afford you blissful visions for the time, leave a greater desolation and visions of the pit. You may devour books in an over-measure; that, it may be, will do you no harm, except to waste your time and prompt the question: "Will a man fill himself with the east wind?" These are only what the sea-foam is to the sea at the best—the beaten syllabub of book nature, so that when I read them they remind me of the sign I once saw over a soda fountain in the Far West, with the inscription, "Sweetened wind." Yet here I must slip in a word about novels, for these I have read with profit and delight, from the time when the first I ever read came in my way—"The Vicar of Wakefield." John Stuart Mill says well and truly: "It is not what our youth can repeat by rote, but what they have learned to admire, which forms their character—the stories which fill our imagination in the earlier years with pictures of noble men and women and set forth noble examples." A fine thinker says again: "Novels are week-day preachers, who should always take us into clean and good company. For things have come to a bad pass with us when we smuggle our company into our homes, and hide them in a closet. My best and truest manhood bids me wash my hands in innocence when I read my novel." And now, may I still dwell for a few moments on my own experience, and what I have learned at prime cost, in the full seventy years of my reading. If, when I read a book about the God and Father of all, in whom we live and move and have our being, I find it has removed Him farther from me; or about man, that it has removed me farther from him; or about the world—which is my home—that the book has shaken down upon it a new desolation; or about life, that it has made my own life less worth living; or about moral principles, that they are not so clear as when the author began to talk with me; then I know that on these primal and cardinal things in life, the book is not a good book for me. It may be good for another—I say nothing to that, I only know this for myself. But if the book touches the soul

In me, and brings God nearer to my heart and life; if it be of humanity, and brings me nearer to the heart and life of my fellow men; or in philosophy and science, if my book makes the world and the universe glow with new truth and grace—a poem, a story, a book of adventure, or history, or biography—and I feel it makes me all the more a man, more sincere and true, more upright and downright, then, no matter who wrote the book, or what men say about it, the judgment seat is set in my own soul, and the great woman of the last age shall be my mentor, who says and sings:

"We get no good
By being ungenerous, even to a book,
And calculating profits—so much help
By so much reading. It is rather when We gloriously forget ourselves and plunge
Soul forward, headlong into a book's profound,
Impassioned for its beauty and salt of truth,
'Tis then we get the right good from a book."
(Applause.)

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL.

INDUCTION OF

REV. JOHN C. BALLANTYNE.

ALTHOUGH the present chapel in Stamford-street, on the south side of the Thames, is considerably under a hundred years old, the church of which it is the home has a much longer history. It dates as far back as the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662. Two of the congregations which came into existence in consequence of that Act—that of Prince's-street Chapel, Westminster, and that of St. Thomas's, Southwark—united, and erected the present quaint building in Stamford-street. It was opened for public worship exactly eighty-four years ago to-day, namely, October 12, 1823. Since then there have been thirteen ministers, Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, whose induction took place on Friday evening, the 4th inst., being the fourteenth. It is interesting to note that so far back as 1858-62 Rev. T. L. Marshall (a former editor of THE INQUIRER), who happily is still with us, ministered there with conspicuous success; while from 1861 to 1873 it was the scene of the labours of the late Rev. Robert Spears, founder and editor of the Christian Life, during whose ministry the chapel was in a particularly flourishing condition. In 1897 the old Blackfriars Mission, founded in the year 1667, and whose headquarters were originally in Carter's-lane, amalgamated with Stamford-street Chapel, the two former ministers of the united congregations having been Rev. Frederic Allen (1898-1903), and Rev. W. L. Tucker, M.A. (1904-1907). An incident worthy of notice in connection with the ministry here of Mr. Tucker, as with that of Mr. Ballantyne, is the fact that prior to entering college both these gentlemen were for some years active workers in the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel. Before coming to London, Mr. Ballantyne, who had already qualified as an analytical chemist in Edinburgh, and is, we believe, a Bachelor of Science, had no thought of taking up the work of the ministry. It was in working at Stamford-street that he felt that call, and determined to enter Manchester College, Oxford, where for two years he acquitted himself diligently and with distinction. He returns to his former scene of labour of love to assume the more responsible duties of a missionary minister with every promise of a noble and useful career before him, and with the hearty good wishes of a wide circle of friends, and the practical encouragement and support of a band of earnest workers.

THE SERVICE OF INDUCTION.

The induction service was attended by a large congregation. The interior of the chapel presented a fresh and neat appearance—though not perhaps what one might call beautiful—having recently undergone some extensive repairs and "decoration." Rev. Principal CARPENTER, of Oxford, conducted the service, which opened with Frances Havergal's hymn, "Lord, speak to me, that I may speak." The readings were from the sixth chapter of Isaiah, the second chapter of Mark, and the third of the epistle to the Philippians. Having offered the prayer of dedication Dr. Carpenter proceeded to give the charge, and in a very beautiful address impressed upon the young minister the solemnity and responsibility of the office to which he was dedicating himself anew that night. Referring especially to the philanthropic aspect of the missionary's work, the many and grave problems, social and economic, which he would be called upon to face and to endeavour to solve, the speaker urged upon Mr. Ballantyne the necessity of having a practical method; he would not prescribe any specific method to him—every teacher must adopt his own; but a method he must have—a method of his own. Dr. Carpenter then extended the right hand of fellowship to the young minister.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, M.A., also spoke some very solemn and impressive words to Mr. Ballantyne, advising him, among other things, never to let his work so absorb his energies that his life ran dry.

Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE, who was swayed by considerable emotion, thanked Dr. Carpenter and Mr. Wicksteed, saying with what joy he had listened to the "grand and inspiring words" they had spoken to him. He could find, he said, no language adequate to express all that had been welling in his heart that night, when he thought of all the love and friendship and kindness that had been shown him during the past few days since settlement there. He believed that a man's character was largely built up from what flowed into his life through friendship. God's call had come to him through his friends, and it was through the means of friendship first of all that he hoped to carry God's message to the hearts and minds of others. He would strive, with all his heart, to preach the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ—essentially a gospel of friendship and joy. Most sincerely did he thank Principal Carpenter and Mr. Wicksteed for all their friendship and help in the past, no less than for what they had given him of new inspiration that night. He trusted that his life and work in the ministry would be worthy of the noble and helpful words they had uttered, and of the friendship they had shown for him on that memorable occasion.

THE CHARGE TO THE CONGREGATION.

Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON, in giving the charge to the congregation, observed at the outset that for the purpose of his remarks he would regard them all that night as members of Mr. Ballantyne's congregation. What he wished to say, he went on, would probably come with a better grace if he were a layman, for "we ministers are always giving charges to congregations." In an address that was both eloquent and thoughtful, scintillating with flashes of humour, and enforced by apt quotations, Mr. Freeston proceeded to drive home to this mixed congregation of representatives, probably, from the majority of our London churches, some very straight and wholesome truths. The opportunity was unique, and good use was made of it. We wish we could reproduce the address in full. But here is the substance of it:—

"You, an old-established congregation, with a long and rich tradition, are welcoming a young man who is taking charge of his first church. It is a sacred compact on both sides, one not lightly to be undertaken or lightly broken. Outside the family circle of the home, there can surely be no relationship more personal and helpful than that between a minister and his people. It is not a business arrangement, nor yet a mere professional appointment, but a spiritual covenant. Look, then, at your part in it. The minister withdraws himself from other walks in life wherein he might also minister, generally in a very real way, in order to give himself definitely to a settled ministry with one set of people specially. He then makes their care his care, and takes on his conscience their spiritual welfare. That is what your minister has done with all his heart and soul. Make him feel that it was well worth his while. The minister, again, undergoes a certain training in order that he may meet your spiritual wants and speak helpfully to your hearts. He tries to understand his high duties carefully and to perform them honourably. If he were to stay away unconcernedly on a single Sunday and leave the pulpit empty, or in any way take his duties casually, you would say, and say rightly, that he was not treating you fairly. One wishes frequently that the laity might have a like opportunity for training in the duties of a congregation; that they might come to service with prepared minds, and learn to listen with profitable patience to sentiments opposed to their own perchance, and also deem it as important to be in their seat as it is for the minister to be in the pulpit. This is a counsel of perfection, no doubt, but we all know some people, I think, who loyally carry it out. You do not realise, perhaps, the difference this makes to the minister's peace. Be in your place for your own sake, but not less for his. And about the preaching. It must seem such an easy thing; and some persons think the minister ought only to write just the sort of sermons which they want. They must reveal a plain and simple gospel, and be original, practicable, reasonable, and altogether delightful. But a preacher is not a gramophone to be turned on to any tune! He is a man with his own way of looking, and thinking, and expressing. Do not begrudge him either the requisite freedom, or time, to proclaim what the spirit saith within. And when you feel bent on finding fault, sit down yourself and write two sermons in one week on the top of your other work. So believe, may I say, in the ministry of the laity. On whom does a church depend for its real well-being, its spiritual condition? On all of us, pulpit and pews; on the pulpit admittedly, and I would not lessen its responsibility; but on the pews in yet greater degree. The vitality of any church depends upon the congregation themselves, that is, upon those for whom it exists, the worshippers. Every earnest worshipper breathes his own temper into the spiritual atmosphere; every member in his place is a minister to the rest. Believe, then, in the preaching of the pews. The pulpit is a convenient provision for edification, but it is not the church, not the congregation. Claim more for the church, then, than for any other institution. Claim more for even a small congregation of fellow worshippers than for any vast audience of chance individuals. Claim more for the church building with its special association than for any commodious concert-room or other place of entertaining. Enter into the spirit of holy fellowship which you begin to night. Cherish this precious gift of church arrangement and environment. May the sacred compact which you now cement be blessed abundantly with personal joy and congregational prosperity. Here are the building, the institution, the external preparation for the temple service. It remains to turn these into the temple not made with hands, the living church of the living God."

A hymn, and the Benediction pronounced by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, closed a memorable service.

WELCOME TO THE REV. R. P. FARLEY AT BELL STREET MISSION.

A VERY successful welcome meeting to Rev. R. P. and Mrs. Farley, the new missionary and his wife, was held on Tuesday evening, Oct. 8. Mr. John Harrison kindly gave an organ recital from 8 to 8.30. At 8.30 Mr. P. M. Martineau took the chair and gave a hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Farley on behalf of the committee and subscribers. He told the story of an old farmer's wife in Kent, who used to say to him, sixty years ago, "Friends and fish are best fresh." He still agreed with her on the subject of fish, but he found himself more and more preferring friends who were old. It had been a grave disadvantage to the Bell-street Mission that it had so often changed its missionaries. There was no one in fault for these changes, but he hoped that to-night they were beginning a relationship with Mr. Farley which would continue with increasing usefulness and mutual goodwill for many years. Mr. Street, whose illness they all deplored, had begun to make his mark. He concluding by again welcoming Mr. and Mrs. Farley on behalf of the subscribers.

Rev. F. K. Freeston welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Farley on behalf of the London ministers. He referred to the excellent work which Mr. Farley had been doing in Lancashire, and the good which he might be expected to derive from experience of Lancashire character and energy.

There is no form of usefulness, he said, higher than that of the Christian missionary. It has enlisted the enthusiasm of the most religious men in our community. You are taking part in a work with great traditions. He went on to say that he hoped the relations between Bell-street Mission and Essex Church might become closer, and that the Essex Church congregation might more and more assist Mr. Farley in his work.

Rev. E. Daplyn gave a welcome on behalf of the neighbouring congregations, and spoke especially of the duty of those congregations to provide mission workers. Mission work is the most practical and valuable form of Christian work. Offer your own gift for the service of others, whatever it may be. In giving we also receive. We forget a good story if we do not tell it to somebody, and we forget that we possess much more important things if we fail to impart them to others.

Miss A. Sharpe gave the welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Farley on behalf of the workers of Bell-street. They were thankful again to have a captain. They were sailing in a ship which carries men and women from the land where there is wrong-doing and misery to a brighter world where love and goodness are supreme. Each little community looks to its leader to guide them in that voyage.

Mr. Farley began by reading a letter from Switzerland by Rev. S. Street, in which he expressed his great regret that he had not been able to take farewell of his friends at the Mission. The letter closed with the welcome words: "I am much better, and hope to return to England in the spring quite well and fit for work." Mr. Farley spoke of his gladness in taking up this work for which he cared so much, and his hope of help from the Hampstead and Kensington congregations. Young people who wish later to take part in public life must learn to understand social problems by actual grappling with them, and there was no better means of doing this than through Mission work. Mr. Fellows Pearson rose at the end of Mr. Farley's speech, and offered him a hearty welcome on behalf of the sister Mission at Stamford-street. After a hymn, and the Benediction given by Mr. Farley, conversation and light refreshments brought a very pleasant evening to a close.

INTENDED LIFE OF DR. CHARLES BEARD.

SIR,—I am preparing for publication an account of the life and work of Dr. Chas. Beard in Liverpool.

It is not a biography which I have in view, but simply an attempt to record some of the valuable work for the city and the still more valuable teaching for his fellow citizens which he accomplished during the period of his ministry there.

Some of his friends may be willing to allow me to see letters from him or other memoranda relating to his work in Liverpool or during his residence there. I should be greatly obliged if they would entrust me with any such documents, which I would return at the earliest possible opportunity.

I am especially anxious to have any such documents relating to his work for Manchester College.—Yours faithfully,

RICHARD ROBINSON.

APPEAL FOR MARTINEAU MEMORIAL HALL, NORWICH.

SIR,—Many of your readers will be looking for the promised information as to the opening of the Martineau Memorial Hall and Sunday-schools, now so nearly completed. I shall be grateful if you will allow me to give a few details.

The opening has been fixed for Thursday, November 14. The Right Hon. Sir John Brunner, M.P., has kindly consented to preside, and will be supported by the Mayor and members of the Corporation of Norwich, as well as by many friends from a distance, including Miss Gertrude Martineau, her sister, and other members of the family.

The proceedings will begin with a brief dedicatory service in the chapel at 2.30 p.m., at the close of which a procession will be formed to the chief door of the new buildings, passing through which the company will ascend to the large hall, where Sir John Brunner and others will speak. Immediately afterwards afternoon tea will be served in the lower hall. Friends will then disperse, those who may wish to return to London the same day being thus in time to do so; but we hope that many will remain to join us in spending our first social evening in the new premises, for which we propose to assemble at 8 p.m. Full programmes will be ready early in November, and may then be had on application to me. I may add that Dr. Carpenter has most kindly promised to preach at the Octagon on Sunday, November 17.

As to the financial position of the fund, it may be remembered that just previous to the laying of the foundation-stone in April last I was able to announce that we were about £1,000 short of the amount required to complete the fund independently of the fresh contribution of £500 then undertaken by the congregation. The amounts so kindly given on that and the following days reduced the £1,000 required to about £400; but although a few more sums have since been sent or promised, sundry necessary items have had to be added to the estimate which just about counterbalance them, so that the amount still required remains practically the same, namely, £400.

May I be forgiven for repeating that we cannot look forward without apprehension to the possibility of a debt, even for so comparatively small an amount, in addition to the £500 we are in course of raising ourselves as above mentioned, and the prospect of increased maintenance expenses. While it is difficult adequately to express our gratitude (at any rate, in such a manner as to satisfy our own deep sense of it) for the wonderful generosity with which our effort has been met, I venture once more to appeal to it in the earnest hope that the doors of the new hall may open to admit us all into buildings untrammelled by debt.

It will be four years on December 1st since, with some misgiving, yet with almost boundless hope, we began the long task which has resulted in what is largely a gift to us from those to whom the name, the work, and the spirit of Dr. Martineau is dear. During that time a number of those (both without and within our congregation) most deeply interested in its completion, have passed "beyond the veil"; but although the sense of their absence will temper our rejoicing, we must surely always be inspired by the memory of their dauntless courage and unconquerable faith in the future of the work to which they gave such whole-hearted, ungrudging, and self-forgetting help.—I am, yours sincerely,

F. A. MOTTRAM, Hon. Sec.

to the Martineau Memorial Fund.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me a little space in THE INQUIRER to inform the friends and supporters of the Suffolk Village Mission that the new Club Room at Bedfield is now completed.

There has been such a generous and prompt response to the appeal of the Central Postal Mission Committee for funds that I am glad to state that we shall be able to open the building free of debt.

The Club Room will be opened by Miss Tagart at the Anniversary meeting, on Monday, October 21, to which friends are cordially invited. The villagers are looking eagerly forward to this event. It is a great satisfaction to the Rev. R. Newell that the room will be available for the many gatherings he has planned for the winter.—Yours faithfully,

ETHEL C. LAKE,

Hon. Treasurer, Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union.

OBITUARY.

MRS. J. C. GREENFIELD.

FOR the second time within five months the Torquay congregation is mourning the loss of one of its oldest and most honoured members. Mrs. Greenfield had just entered upon her 84th year, having been born on September 18, 1824, at Tavistock, where her father, Mr. John Holder Snell, was a watchmaker, and a member of the congregation worshipping at the Abbey Chapel. Frances Ware Snell remained at Tavistock until 1860, when she married Mr. James C. Greenfield, gas manager, of Torquay, and went to reside at Hollacombe, Paignton. For many years they were unable to attend Unitarian services, except on rare occasions at Newton Abbot or Moretonhampstead, there being no Unitarian chapel in Torquay. In the spring of 1883 a series of lectures by Unitarian ministers was given in Bannercross Hall, Torquay, and shortly afterwards a congregation was established, Mr. and Mrs. Greenfield being among the earliest members. For about nine years the services were held at Bannercross, but in 1892 that hall was taken away from the congregation, and it was feared that no other meeting place could be obtained. Then Mrs. Greenfield, who was now a widow, came to the rescue and purchased a hall in Union-street, which, under the name of Unity Hall, has since that time been the home of the Free Christian (Unitarian) Church. About the same time she left Paignton and came to reside in Torquay, and was thus able to take a greater interest than ever in all the activities of the congregation. As long as her health permitted, Mrs. Greenfield was a regular attendant at our services and meetings, and she was a generous and active supporter of all the congregational institutions. Many a time her house was hospitably thrown open to welcome the members of the Women's Society or the children of the Sunday-school. Though towards the close of her life failing strength confined her to the house, she retained her warm interest in the congregation to the last. She passed peacefully away on Monday morning, September 30. On the following Friday, October 4, a funeral service, largely attended by members of the congregation and other friends, was held at Unity Hall, and her remains were laid to rest beside those of her husband in Paignton Cemetery.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bootle.—On Thursday, October 3, the Rev. J. Morley and Mrs. Mills held their annual "At Home" at the Free Church Hall. A very large company of members and friends were present, and the proceedings commenced with pianoforte solos by Misses E. Wood and A. Wilson, followed by a "glee" rendered by several members of the choir, and by a solo from Mrs. Radcliffe. These were all greatly appreciated, as were also a solo by Mr. F. K. Wilson and a violin selection from Miss M. Major. The Rev. J. M. Mil's gave an animated and inspiring address on church work and the prospects for the coming winter season, and further addresses were delivered by Mr. F. S. Yates, the treasurer; Mr. F. K. Wilson, chairman of committee; Mr. W. J. Pidgeon, Church chairman; and the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, former pastor of the congregation.

Bury St. Edmunds.—The harvest festival was held last Sunday in Churchgate-street Chapel, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion. The Rev. J. Pollard conducted the morning service; Mr. W. Rogers gave an address to the children of the Sunday school in the afternoon, and the minister, Rev. J. M. Connell, preached in the evening. At the evening service, at which there was a large congregation, the organist and choir were greatly assisted by several instrumentalists in leading the music.

Dewsbury: Unity Church.—Good congregations attended the harvest festival services at Unity Church on Sunday, when sermons were preached at the three services by the Rev. H. Cross. The sale of fruit, &c., on Monday evening was made the occasion of a social gathering, at which Mr. W. Saunderson presided. The principal feature of the proceedings was a presentation to the Rev. H. Cross, who is relinquishing his position as assistant-superintendent minister for the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, to take charge of the Viaduct Church, Carlisle. In addition to conducting services in various parts of Yorkshire, Mr. Cross has acted as pastor at Dewsbury for two and a-half years. The presentation consisted of an easy chair and two pictures, and was made by Mr. C. R. Brettell, secretary of the church. Other speakers were Mr. E. Maresden, Mr. E. D. Gaunt, and Miss Howe. During the evening refreshments were served, and a very pleasant time was spent.

Essex Church.—On Wednesday evening, October 9, the London Guilds met at Essex Church. There was service at 7.30, when Rev. F. K. Freeston preached a fine forcible sermon. Then came tea in the schoolroom, and at 8.45 a meeting, over which Mr. Talbot, of Highgate, President of the London Guilds, presided. Rev. H. Gow gave an address on "Friendship," which was followed by an interesting discussion.

Gateshead.—In connection with this church a Guild of Fellowship has recently been established, the motto of which is "Each for all and all for each." The inaugural meeting was held on October 2, when the Rev. G. A. and Mrs. Ferguson gave an "At Home" at which some 80 members and friends were present. During the evening instrumental and vocal music and recitations were rendered. A résumé of the lectures to be given during the winter was read out, comprising a varied list embracing music, history, drama, art, and education, all by well-known lecturers, including a Congregational minister and Hebrew Rabbi. Mrs. Forster, of 2, Kell's-gardens, Low Fell, will be pleased to correspond with secretaries of sister guilds.

Great Hucklow Old Chapel.—The Harvest Festival services were held on Sunday last. The chapel was beautifully decorated by the ladies. Mr. Charles Cowan, of Belper, preached both morning and afternoon to two good congregations.

Lewes.—The members of the Ramblers' Club connected with the Free Christian Church, Brighton, visited this ancient town on Saturday, Oct. 5. They spent the afternoon viewing its antiquities, and were joined by the Lewes Ramblers at the Phoenix Institute, where about 40 sat down to tea. A very pleasant social evening was spent, presided over by Alderman J. H. Every, Esq., J.P. Various items of vocal and instrumental music were very ably rendered by Brighton and Lewes friends, interspersed with speeches by the Chairman, the Rev. J. Priestley Prime, and Rev. J. Felstead.

London: Bermondsey.—The Harvest Festival service was held in the Fort-road Unitarian Church last Sunday evening. A large quantity of fruit, flowers, and vegetables were contributed, and the kindness of many friends of the church was shown in the loan of plants. For three hours on Saturday night busy workers were actively engaged decorating the church, and its appearance on Sunday morning must have given them great satisfaction. The church looked very well with the new lights that have been placed round the front of the gallery, while the sight and scent of the flowers and fruit all assisted to make the service one of joyous thanksgiving. The musical part of the service was excellent. The choir rendered two anthems, "Ye shall dwell in the land" and "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works," admirably, Mr. and Mrs. Callow being the soloists. Mr. W. P. Evershed, who kindly came down to officiate at the organ, also delighted us by rendering in an excellent manner some choice voluntaries. The preacher, Rev. Jesse Hipperson, took as his text Gal. vi. 7-9. His subject was "Sowing and Reaping." "According to the natural order of things reaping-time comes to everyone," he said. "It was therefore essential to pay more heed to the sowing." Then he dwelt upon the fact that we were soil—seed producers as well as sowers—and showed how important it was that we should select companions and books that would exert the best influence upon us. In our sowing there must be both discrimination and perseverance. We must be careful what seeds we sow, and not get weary if the sowing was difficult. For in due season the harvest would come and we should reap the fruits of our labours.

Moseley.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last, the Rev. Thomas A. Gorton, resident minister, preaching morning and evening. The church was tastefully decorated with a profusion of fruits, vegetables, corn and foliage, a noticeable attraction being a beautiful collection of flowers sent by the Lord Mayor of Birmingham.

Newcastle-under-Lyme (Old Meeting House).—Harvest services were held in the above place of worship last Sunday morning and evening. The old chapel was tastefully decorated. The congregations and collections were considerably above those of last year. The Rev. G. Pegler was the preacher.

Northampton.—During the absence of the pastor, the Rev. E. A. Voysey, M.A., the services have been conducted by supply ministers, the preacher for Sunday last being Mrs. John Page Hopps, who had good congregations, both morning and evening. Keen attention was shown by those present at the latter service, when the subject of the discourse was "Burden-bearing."

Rawtenstall.—The harvest festival was held on Sunday last, when services were conducted, morning, afternoon, and evening, by the Rev. D. Rhoslyn Davies. In the afternoon a musical service took place, when the following solos were most effectively rendered:—"O rest in the Lord," by Miss P. Scaife; "The Star of Bethlehem," by Miss H. M. Halstead; "The Lord is my Shepherd," by Miss A. Cunliffe; and the anthem "Great and Marvellous," by the choir. The anthem at the evening service was "I will greatly rejoice," and the rendering of it was especially fine. The Rev. D. R. Davies, our newly-settled minister, preached good discourses, which were greatly appreciated.

Rochdale.—On Tuesday, October 1, the Rochdale Unitarians met in the Clover-street school to give a hearty welcome to their new minister, the Rev. John Evans, B.A. There was a large gathering, including many representatives of the Unitarian churches at Bolton and Colne, where Mr. Evans has ministered. In the absence of Alderman Topper, J.P., Mr. B. Woofenden presided over the proceedings, which consisted of a series of short speeches, followed by refreshments and music. Each speaker, in extending a welcome to Mr. Evans, gave a happy address, and the meeting was bright and interesting throughout. Mr. Alec Carter read letters from absent friends, including the Rev. T. P. Spedding (the former minister) and Mrs. Spedding. Mr. Spedding wrote a letter from the boat on which he was sailing to America a few weeks ago, and yesterday also sent a cablegram from Boston—"Affectionate greetings. Congratulations." In his opening address, the chairman expressed the hope that Mr. Evans would be able to stimulate the culture of morality, good feeling, and brotherly affection. The Rev. J. M. Bass, M.A. (Chesham) welcomed Mr. Evans to Rochdale on behalf of the North-East Lancashire Mission. He congratulated the congregation on their choice, and Mr. Evans on the fact that early in his ministerial career he had been called to so responsible a pastorate as that of the Rochdale Unitarian Church. It was one of the most important churches in North-East Lancashire—a church from which the mission rightly expected support in its work. The mission was pleased with the appointment, because Mr. Evans had had the whole of his ministerial experience in North-East Lancashire. In his two previous charges at Bolton and Colne Mr. Evans had shown that he was capable of doing plenty of work of the right sort, and that he was amply qualified to fill his new pastorate, which offered larger opportunities. The religious outlook was brightening all around. The work of Unitarians had always been hard, and was hard still, because there was great misunderstanding and misapprehension concerning them, and, consequently, a great deal of prejudice. Interest in religion and theological topics, instead of being less, was greater than ever, as was shown by the "New Theology" movement. While this interest increased, and the old dogmas were losing their hold, Unitarians, who had a definite message of their own to give, had an opening such as they never had before. A welcome on behalf of the Sunday school was given to the new minister by Miss Smithies. The Rev. T. B. Evans, M.A., of Heywood; Mr. Wilkinson, of Colne; the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A., of Sale; and the Rev. O. Bins, of Scarborough, also spoke. Speaking on behalf of the church, Mr. W. W. Hadley mentioned that Mr. Evans was the twenty-fourth minister in the succession from Robert Bathe, who founded Nonconformity in Rochdale after his ejection from the vicarage 245 years ago. Ten years hence they would celebrate the bi-centenary of the first chapel in Blackwater-street. Among the ministers who had served the church were some notable men, and two were specially in their thoughts—the Rev. Thomas Carter, brave, generous-hearted, unflinching in his defence of what he believed to be truth; and the Rev. T. P.

Spedding, who left them only a few months ago, and whose affectionate greetings from America they all warmly reciprocated. Mr. Evans was the man of their own choice, and they welcomed him with all heartiness and with the earnest desire that his ministry should be full of happiness for himself and the church. Mr. Evans, in acknowledging the warm reception given to him, said this was the third pastorate to which he had been welcomed. It was his desire to work with the congregation, and he believed they would work with him. They would work together for righteousness, peace, and purity. Let it be felt as they went about their work throughout the week that they had to live their creed and let the community of Rochdale know that Unitarians stood not only for a creed and doctrine, but for purity and righteousness of life.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The autumnal meeting of the South-East Wales Society were held on Monday, September 30, at Highland-place, Aberdare. A fairly large number of delegates from the several churches associated in the society met at 3 p.m., and in the unavoidable absence of the president—Mr. L. N. Williams—who was attending the Congress of Liberal Religious Thinkers at Boston, U.S.A., the Rev. W. G. Phillips presided. Amongst matters of importance discussed by the delegates were (a) a van mission for South-east Wales during the summer of 1908; (b) the appointment of representatives to attend the Welsh Nonconformist Disestablishment Convention; and (c) the establishment of social service classes in connection with our churches. Extracts were read from the report of the president of the National Conference on his recent visit through South-East Wales, and some suggestions contained therein delegated to the executive committee for consideration. A conference was held at 6 p.m. on an able paper read by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies on "The Grouping of Our Churches." The paper and subject lent themselves to a very interesting discussion, in which the balance of opinion was in favour of some scheme of "grouping" as the best course at present for the progress of our faith. It was pointed out by more than one speaker that what was especially needed to make such a plan possible was the establishment of a lay preachers' union for South-East Wales. As a result of the discussion Mr. W. Sutherland, of Newport, was asked to take in hand the formation of such a union as soon as possible. In the evening at 7.30 a devotional service was conducted by the Rev. Arthur Golland, M.A., of Newport, and there was a fairly large congregation. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. Blount Mott, of Cardiff.

Southend-on-Sea.—To the manifest regret of the congregation, Mr. Delta Evans terminated his ministry of the church in Darnley-road on Sunday evening, Sept. 29. After the Benediction he was warmly thanked for his two years' service. The friends at Southend are anxiously awaiting the return from America of Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the Minister of the Provincial Assembly, who, it is hoped, may be able soon to arrange for the appointment of another minister. One of the local papers last week had a sympathetic report of Sunday evening's service, with an appreciative reference to Mr. Evans' work in connection with the church. Mr. Evans is not, for the present, seeking another pulpit, but intends to devote himself to further the interests of our churches in other ways. His address is 21, Derby-avenue, North Finchley, London, N.

Swansea.—A new departure in the way of meetings for men has been inaugurated. On Sunday, an Open Brotherhood, unsectarian in its scope, was begun at the Unitarian Church, and most appropriately was assisted by the presence of the Mayor, appropriately because the aim of the new gathering is to afford an opportunity for the exchanging and intermingling of views on social and civic topics by means of free discussions. The thinking man will be particularly drawn here, and the attendance of over 100 on Sunday afternoon was entirely of this class. The speaker was Professor J. S. Mackenzie, of Cardiff University, and the Mayor was also supported by Mr. Lleufer Thomas, barrister-at-law. Mr. Mackenzie spoke on the cultivation of the civic spirit, and first of all said "open brotherhood" expressed the underlying idea of citizenship. This was one of the ideas embodied in the great democratic watchwords so prominent in the French Revolution—"liberty, equality, and fraternity." Studying the development of democracy of modern times, they found the tendency was often too much to emphasise one or both of the first two, rather than, and sometimes to the exclusion of, the third. He would urge that they did not get the true conception of the spirit of democracy or the spirit of citizenship unless they put in the forefront the idea of fraternity or brotherhood. The conception naturally led on to the other two, but if they had the idea of brotherhood as the underlying conception, it would help them very much to get the other two great democratic conceptions of liberty and equality, in a truer way than they were sometimes apt to do. They found this conception of brotherhood among the Greeks and earlier Romans, and what they had to do was to try and recover that citizen spirit, not wholly lost at any time, but still not so strongly developed now as once it was. Before delving into special social problems, it was most essential they should have the spirit of social love or brotherhood. Realising that this spirit of brotherhood necessarily grew from small beginnings—as, indeed, most great things did—Mr. Mackenzie advocated civic instruction in elementary schools. The speaker dealt convincingly with some objections raised to this course. It was objected that all education was indirectly an effort to produce good citizens, but, as a matter of fact, there were certain elements that merely cultivated intellectual cleverness. We should not make education merely the development of superficial skill, but the making of good characters and good citizens. This, the speaker contended, must be done by a system of direct instruction. Mr. Lleufer Thomas (a Congregationalist) said they hoped, by gatherings of this kind, to regain some of that brotherhood of old which seemed to have disappeared with the Reformation. Interesting comments were also made by the Mayor (a Baptist), who said he had always been a strong advocate of having teachers who not only had scholastic attainments, but also had collegiate experience, because in the universities, as a rule, they got the broadened ideas which only education could give.

MANUALS OF EARLY CHRISTIAN HISTORY

EDITED BY

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.Litt., D.D.

The Early Church

Its Orders and Institutions

By A. HERMANN THOMAS, M.A.

(OF ST. CATHARINE'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE).

THIS little volume is a sequel to the manual entitled Christianity and the Roman Empire, by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A. (1893). Assuming the relations to the state described in that book, it endeavours to delineate in simple terms the complicated phases of the internal growth and organisation of the Church.

To sketch the process by which the Christian Church gradually acquired a particular kind of government, and embodied its faith and hope in special rites, which ultimately secured its predominance over all rivals, is the object of this book. Within its narrow limits much is inevitably left unsaid. But to those who desire some acquaintance with the origin of the claims and practices of historic Christianity, it is commended as a useful guide.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE much regret that in one of our front page notes of last week Dr. Fremantle was referred to as Dean of Canterbury, and the object of Lord Halifax's animadversions. The Dean of Canterbury is, as many of our readers will be aware, Dr. Wace, and it was his opinions that Lord Halifax criticised.

A SMALL institute for the training of Sunday school workers has been opened by Friends at Selly Oak. It will accommodate a warden, lecturer, and twelve resident students. Lectures and demonstrations will be given by Mr. George H. Archibald and Miss Archibald, and students will attend the Biblical lectures of Dr. Rendal Harris at Woodbrooke. The teaching includes the study of the History and Methods of Education, Child Psychology and Adolescence, beside actual departmental training in the Bournville "Model School."

A NOTABLE career has been closed by the death of Mr. Carvell Williams, the well-known Liberationist. Born as far back as 1821, Mr. Williams grew up in a political and religious world very different from that of our day. Religious disabilities abounded. But it was to the task of removing these disabilities that Mr. Williams, very early in life, put his hand, and having done so, never looked back. For thirty years (1847—1877) he was secretary of the Liberation Society, retiring to become chairman of the Society's Parliamentary Committee. From first to last he was a stalwart Dissenter, bringing great abilities and energy to many efforts for religious liberty. He saw the abolition of Church Rates, the opening of the Universities to Nonconformists, and the disestablishment of the Irish Church, besides that growth of religious liberty in general which was perhaps most hopeful of all. For eight years he sat in the House of Commons. He was chairman of the Congregational Union in 1900.

THE recent meetings in Birmingham, of the Methodist Union for Social Service were of a very enthusiastic nature, auguring well for a great and general uplifting movement in that city. The Bishop of Birmingham, who was on the platform, laid stress, as is his wont, on the significance of the ecclesiastical differences which keep churchmen and dissenters apart. But, as representing his own Christian Social Union, he recognised that both bodies had a common and urgent work in which they might co-operate. The Rev. J. Scott Lidgett spoke of the privilege of being associated with Dr. Gore on that platform. He, too, would not minimise the ecclesiastical differences which separated them, "but despite those differences, the great agreement existed that they would be traitors to Christ, to the Commonwealth, and to the great faith of his kingdom if they did not laboriously seek and patiently pursue all means of giving effect to unity in regard to the great problems of the common life."

THE number of delegates who attended the autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union of England and Wales at Blackpool this week passed all previous records. The delegates were received by the Mayor in the Winter Gardens on Monday afternoon. In the evening the Rev. Bernard J. Snell, of Brixton, preached the Union Sermon in the Pavilion. Taking as his text, "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his," he insisted on the pre-eminence of practical over speculative religion. Whether they believed in a seven days' creation by fiat or in an age-long process of evolution was not the essential matter of religion. He said that religion began with sorrow for wrong-doing, and effort to do unto others as they would others should do unto them. Religion was a matter of the soul's aspirations, not of the mind's gymnastics. Theological differences were inevitable concomitants of their growth in knowledge. From such knowledge came new interpretations and ever-enlarging views of religious truth. Such changes were not a dissolution, but a regeneration.

THE Chairman of the Congregational Union, Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., took as the subject of his autumnal address "The Church and Labour." He compared the capitalist with the elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son, while the younger brother represented labour with its clamant demand. "Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." The rank and file of the labouring classes were indifferent to Church life, and even looked upon the numerous supporters of the churches as those who were for the most part interested in keeping up the capitalist system. Then there was a broken mob of camp followers who were hanging on the rear of the industrial army. This sordid and extreme poverty was a reproach to a civilised community; He agreed with the ideas of organisation of labour, of courts of mediation for the adjustment of industrial differences, of a State system of national industries (as a reservation) for the temporarily unemployed, and of the limitation of poor relief to the disabled and aged. He urged upon Congregationalists the importance of adapting themselves to the changing social conditions of their time.

THE National Council of the I.L.P. has issued an important statement to the Press, repudiating certain charges frequently made against modern Socialism. It denies that the movement is anti-religious, asserting that it offers the most complete freedom in this respect to its members; and, while denying the charge that it is opposed to family life, it points out that the disintegration of the family is already being accomplished by the slums and factories of our industrial régime.

THE Times of a few days ago describes a most striking "Agricultural Success." Mr. Keeble, of Werekham Hall, Norfolk, came to the conclusion, as a result of careful study of scientific farming, that much might be done with land that was almost given up as waste. He bought 12,770 acres (about twenty square miles), most of it what is called derelict. For a large proportion he gave only £2 17s. 6d. per acre; for some more fertile parts he gave as much as £17 per acre. The land was divided up among 48 farmers, houses were built, the land was fertilised, a railway was run through it connecting with the Great Eastern, and salesmen were appointed in London to meet the trains and dispose of the produce to the best advantage. The sum of the whole matter is that on farm land which had gone out of cultivation Mr. Keeble has established a successful colony of small holdings: his tenants combine to make money; he in turn makes money out of his rentals. Truly what England needs is men much more than measures. When the right man comes, the man of training and insight and energy, he can make a success even in farming. It is much to be deplored that so many of our best men who love the out-door life and are interested in farming should emigrate to Canada instead of trying what can be done in their own country.

THE fear of a general railway strike, with its paralysing effects on trade and grave inconvenience to the general public, is causing many people to insist that it is not only the directors of the Companies and the railway employees who have a right to be heard, but also the users of these national highways. The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants has spared no pains to make clear to the public that what they ask for is recognition of their representatives to confer with the directors on the grievances and reforms they suggest; and Mr. Bell, on their behalf, has suggested a meeting with the directors to clear away any exaggerated notion as to the meaning of "recognition." If the directors, who are themselves represented in a combined Railway Companies' Association, and are acting in concert, continue to refuse even this preliminary conference, the position is serious. But yet there is a means of conciliation possible. Under the Act of 1896 the Board of Trade has power to inquire into the cause of a difference between an employer and a class of employed, and try to bring about an amicable settlement; and Mr. Lloyd George, the President of the Board of Trade, has publicly stated that he is watching every development of the crisis, and that his department is prepared to do its utmost to prevent a strike. A correspondent of the Spectator suggests that what is now wanted is a ballot of shareholders of railway companies, who, he believes, would not support the unpromising attitude of the directors.

In various quarters the question of the nationalisation of the railways is brought to the front by the present dispute. The Amalgamated Society passed a resolution at Middlesbrough in favour of State ownership of the railways, Mr. Bell declaring against any ideas of confiscation or unfair treatment of shareholders. It is noteworthy that the subject is calmly discussed by some financial papers, including the Financial Times, which points out that under the Act of 1844, which gives power to the State to acquire all railways constructed since that date, the shareholders would receive more than the present market price of their stock. The terms provided for by the Act are twenty-five years purchase on the basis of the last three years' dividends when under 10 per cent., with arbitration as to claims for improved prospects, or if the last three years are declared to be unsatisfactory, as an index of the earning power of the line.

ONE outcome of the recent international Co-operative Congress, held at Cremona, is likely to be closer combined action of the Wholesale Societies of various countries. The Congress registered its judgment that every country should have its own Wholesale Society, and that these should seek to develop commercial relations among themselves so as to unite and strengthen co-operative business throughout the world. Dr. Müller, of the Swiss Co-operative Union, moved a resolution suggesting that the Wholesale Societies in the different countries should form a committee to study and practise international joint buying in the world's markets. By this means it is hoped that something may be done to counteract the power of the Trusts. It is understood that the English Wholesale Society is already moving in the direction suggested. A business alliance of this kind will be a valuable outcome of the Cremona Congress, which was the scene of some marked differences of opinion between Socialist and other Co-operators. It is announced that an Italian Wholesale Co-operative Society will be formed immediately.

MR. J. RAMSEY MACDONALD, M.P., in an address given at the National Conference on Sweated Industries, held at Glasgow, advocated the licensing of home workers as the most promising method of improving their condition. He would make the home worker's licence personal to the worker, and give to the factory inspector right of access to the premises and the duty of certifying as to the sanitary conditions of the place. The employer should not be allowed to give out work to any who had not their certificates, renewable every six months. By this method the home workers would be compelled to make themselves known, and the almost impossible task of the inspectors of finding them all out in their wretched quarters would be obviated. Mr. Macdonald declared that only by registration of home workers could the problem of child labour be satisfactorily dealt with.

DR. LIEBKNECHT has been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment in a fortress and to pay the costs of the trial, for the publication of a pamphlet on "Anti-Militarism and Militarism." He urged in defence that the brochure was not written in such language as would appeal to the rank and file of the army. Where militarism is most severely upheld by the authorities, as in Germany and Russia, it is natural that the Government should be impatient of any criticism of the system. In Russia, Tolstoy's writings against killing anybody are not allowed to be published, and a man was recently imprisoned for circulating copies of the tract, "Thou shalt not kill." On the other hand, in France, the extreme anti-military crusade of M. Herve continues, and he remains a free man. Dr. Liebknecht's imprisonment may do more than his pamphlet to spread his ideas. We read in a Reuter telegram that on leaving the court after sentence at Leipzig he was received with loud cheers by thousands of workmen.

THE Government of Victoria has increased the old-age pensions granted by it from 8s. to 10s. per week, the amount already fixed by New South Wales.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE new session at Manchester College opened last Monday, October 14, when Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow and Manchester College, delivered an address on "Divine Transcendence" to the friends and supporters of the College as well as to the students. Amongst the large audience we were especially glad to note Dr. Caird, one of the visitors of the College and late Master of Balliol. We earnestly hope that his presence at the address of his old pupil means that his health is improving.

We cannot give Professor Henry Jones's brilliant and inspiring address in full, as it is to be printed elsewhere, but he has kindly allowed us to give the introduction.

The lecture lasted an hour and a quarter, and dealt with a profound and very difficult philosophical problem, but he held his mixed audience from the first word to the last. Even those who understood least must have felt it was good to be there; and, indeed, the exposition was so luminous and simple that some were surprised to find themselves understanding much more than they expected.

Professor Jones did not solve a problem; he only broke ground and prepared us to receive his solution without fear or dismay. Many of us may think that Idealists are perhaps right, but may fear that acceptance of Idealism brings with it disbelief in free will and in the self. "Solutions," said Professor Jones, "which destroy either of the opposed elements are untrue." By this we understand solutions which make free will unreal or God less than universal.

"If the Idealist doctrine compelled us to regard tragic woes and sins as unreal, the doctrine cannot stand." The solution is to be found in a deeper understanding of Immanence.

"It is a law of our thought that the circumstances which create the problem—if it is a rational one—contain the terms of its solution."

"Divine immanence implies divine transcendence, filling the universe and going beyond it."

With this slight summary, we will give our readers the Introduction, in which it will be seen how closely and enthusiastically he identifies himself with the principles of the College and of our churches:—

"In what I shall say to-day on the difficult subject of Divine Transcendence, I do not hope to do more than break ground—cut the first turf. Indeed, my sole object to-day is to lead up to the problems the idea involves, and indicate the conditions under which we can most fruitfully consider it in the future.

"But, first, let me say that I am glad to be here once more, amongst my colleagues and with my students. The opening of the academical year seems always to me an occasion for congratulation. There are few, if any, better ways of beating out the music of a good life than by the intercourse of master and disciple, where, if the relations are sound and healthy, both teach and both learn, and both gain much happiness in the process.

"I should like to-day, however, to extend my congratulations further afield, so as to embrace those who devote something of their minds to the care and of their means to the maintenance of this College.

For that, too, is a privilege. It is, perhaps, not so obvious as that of teaching and being taught, but is concealed, as many best things are, under the guise of self-sacrificing service. Still, it is a privilege to serve some causes, and your, or our, cause here is very good. You are supporting and guiding the concerns of an institution which is in some respects unique. It is the only college with which I have been connected in which the pursuit of truth in things of the spirit, and especially in religion, is as free as in the region of physical phenomena. When I survey the theological world, with its creeds and sects and shibboleths, this little College seems to me to stand out as a happy exception, like a green oasis in a vast waste, or, better, like a clear place amidst the entangling undergrowths of a thick forest. Here the path is clear to the feet, and the blue sky is to be seen overhead. The going is comparatively easy; we can move straight on in a sincere quest, guided by the simple and sincere light of the broad day.

"In caring for and supporting such an institution, you are, in my opinion, assisting a cause which is certain to arrive; for, in that slow and laborious way in which alone great ends are achieved by mankind, the time is coming when men's souls shall commune with the things of religion with the same clear brow as they hold converse with the things of nature. We will always, in our intercourse with spiritual realities, find our minds entangled in prejudices, confused by passion, and obscured by ignorance; we will always find absolute singleness of spirit, pure loyalty to what is real, utter dispassionateness and judiciousness difficult to attain; but the time is surely approaching, little by little, when the prejudices and passions which no individual can ever quite escape shall no longer bear the imprimatur, or be supported by the prestige, of institutions. Apart from theological colleges, there are now none in all the land, whether devoted to the Arts or to the Sciences, which would not be ashamed to proclaim themselves the devotees of fixed convictions, or the mere exponents of authoritative dogmata. Behind all the endeavour of these secular institutions, and forming its permanent background, is the conviction that Truth, which in its very nature is one and eternal, is also, so far as concerns the growing consciousness of man, always in the making. The truths that prove permanent are living truths; they are hypotheses which grow in security with their extended application, experience: which become mellow, like wine and wisdom, because the subtle changes of constant enrichment somehow go along with their permanence and deepen their certainty. I do not see why the concerns of the human soul, and its intercourse with its God, should be contemplated in any other spirit or by any other method than those which have animated and guided research in other quarters; nor why theological institutions should not, like others, reverence the past for the sake of the future, and be loyal to the teachings of the past because they are guides to more elevated heights from which, as the ages move, a wider and clearer survey may be gained of the way of God's dealings with mankind. In this respect, looking forward to times of fuller knowledge of the things of the spirit, the supporters and governors and officers and students and all the friends of this College are pioneers of a great cause, which is sure to prosper, if man is destined to be free.

For freedom, the freedom we prize as members and supporters of this College, is no negative freedom, which seeks to 'cut itself away from the learning and the wisdom of the past. It is because we desire to lay the whole of that learning and wisdom under tribute that we demand freedom. We believe that 'The Earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof,' and therefore we refuse to regard God as having revealed Himself only to one sect, or only to one age, or only in one book, or in the history of only one nation. We believe that 'All is one scheme, and that God is the meaning of it.' We wish to be free, not to flee from his presence, but to seek it everywhere—in every literature, in all history, under the guise of every religion and of every form of civilisation. For is it not the bedrock of all our religious convictions that God dwelleth in all things, sustaining them with his goodness? 'If I ascend up into heaven, Thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, Thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me.' We believe, to use the passing language of the day, that God is Immanent; and, having this faith, we turn back nowhere from seeking Him—not even from the obscure and troubled sea of human history, with its injustice and wrong, its suffering and sorrow, its selfish passions and follies and utter misery, its sinfulness; wrongs not rectified for the individual, sorrows not removed in this life, but sitting close to the heart till it beats no more, passions not overcome, sins whose stains remain even when their rule is broken, lives sinking out of sight into the deeps of death, still burdened by their imperfections. We believe that somehow God dwells in all, and this is a faith which we can in no wise forego. Death itself, the passing of the incomplete life, the imperfect, the burdened and weary, into a silence which is broken by no faintest echo and a stillness for evermore—death is still His dwelling-place, somehow the manifestation of His benevolence, perhaps His crowning gift, most precious stone in the crown of our present life.
